The center points out that Foley, whose sexually explicit computer messages to teenage congressional pages prompted his resignation Friday and left Republican leaders trying to contain the fallout, has a number of options when it comes to disbursing the $2.8 million. He could donate it to political party committees on the local, state or national levels, or to candidates, within federal limits. Or it could be returned to the donors or given to charity. Yet another option, according to the center: "Foley could argue to the Federal Election Commission that his remaining cash should go toward his legal bills, which could be substantial as the FBI investigates whether his behavior violates any of the child exploitation laws that Foley championed in Congress."

While lawmakers can use campaign funds to cover the expenses of holding office, "the connection between Foley's official duties and his behavior with former pages is tenuous. The FEC has allowed candidates to defend themselves from legal issues that could affect their campaigns, but Foley's political career is almost certainly over."

Graphic: A look at the issues and matchups in nine congressional districts from Las Vegas to Seattle — to Foley's district in Florida.

Read more: Global, Congress, Campaign Journal

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 6:30 pm

WSJ/NBC Poll: Iraq, Scandal Hit Bush, Republicans

President Bush and his party have lost the political initiative at a critical point in the midterm election campaign, according to a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll. The survey — taken as Americans focused on the House sex scandal and the war in Iraq — shows voters less favorable toward continued Republican control of Congress. It also shows a decline in President Bush's job approval rating to 39% from 42% earlier this month. Read more on the poll.

Graphic: Bush's approval ratings across multiple polls

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006

Permalink | Comments (3) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 6:30 pm

Blame Canada (Drugs) No More

Under pressure from Congress, U.S. Customs and Border Protection scrapped its 11-month-old policy of seizing prescription drugs imported through the mail from Canada. The practice, implemented last November, had come under fire from congressmen from both parties for depriving tens of thousands of American seniors of their drugs and protecting the high prices charged by pharmaceutical companies in the U.S. At the behest of Sen. Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs was investigating the new Customs policy. Read the full article. – John Carreyrou

Read more: Global, Domestic Policy, Business

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 6:09 pm

Foley's Lawyer Cites Past Abuse – of Foley

Rep. Mark Foley's attorney, David Roth, said the disgraced congressman "never any inappropriate sexual contact with a minor" and blamed his behavior, including the sexually explicit computer messages that led to his resignation Friday, on Foley's abuse as a teenager.

Foley

Roth said that between the ages of 13 and 15, Foley was molested by a clergyman, something Foley kept to himself though he had sought treatment in the past. This time, Foley will remain in treatment this time for at least 30 days, beginning last Sunday when he checked into a rehab clinic. The attorney refused to name the clergyman or his religious affiliation. "Finally," Roth said, wrapping up his prepared statement before taking questions, "Mark Foley wants you to know he is a gay man."

Read more: Global, Congress

DOJ_NMG_0074582

Permalink | Comments (13) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 4:01 pm

Bush Visits George W. Bush Elementary

The White House was worried enough about the scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley to schedule a surprise stop for President Bush at a school, and not just any school – but one named for him, the George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton, Calif. It's believed to be the first public school named for a sitting president.

"Frankly I was a little emotional when I pulled in" and saw his name outside the door, Bush said at a brief appearance. Of the library, named for Laura Bush, he added, "It's just a blessing to be there." (Read Bush's full remarks.)

Bush, in town for a fund-raiser for Rep. Richard Pombo, went on to say he was "dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior" in sending sexually explicit computer messages to teenage male congressional pages. Bush added that he was "disgusted by the revelations and disappointed that he would violate the trust of the citizens who placed him in office." At the same time, he offered a vote of confidence for embattled House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

The president also noted that he had instructed federal officials to search for a response to the recent spate of school violence, capped by the shootings at a one-room schoolhouse in Amish country near Lancaster, Pa. Coincidentally, Stockton was the scene of a 1989 school shooting in which a mentally ill man with a semi-automatic rifle opened fire on a playground killing five children and wounding 29 others and a teacher. – John D. McKinnon

Read more: Global, Domestic Policy

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 2:56 pm

North Korea Musical Draws Stellar Audience, Concerns

A host of senior Bush administration officials have confirmed their attendance at Wednesday's Washington opening of "Yoduk Story," a musical set in North Korea's notorious prison camp. But Christopher Hill, the U.S.'s current point man on nuclear talks with Pyongyang, isn't among them, according to event planners.

South Korean officials have voiced their concerns in recent months that the nearly three-hour play, which graphically depicts rape and torture inside North Korea's gulag, could only further exacerbate tensions with Pyongyang's leadership. North Korea announced today that it was preparing to conduct its first nuclear test in response to what it says is Washington's "threat of a nuclear war and sanctions."

Among those who'll be in attendance, according to event planners, are Jay Lefkowitz, President Bush's special envoy on North Korean human rights; Sandy Vershbow, U.S. ambassador to South Korea; Richard Lawless, deputy undersecretary of defense for Asia-Pacific affairs; and Barry Lowenkron, assistant secretary of State for democracy, human rights and labor. –Jay Solomon

Recent Article: New Script on North Korea? (09/30/06)

Read more: Global, Foreign Policy

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 11:58 am

Fishing for Support

President Bush was sounding environmentally friendly themes today as he ordered U.S. diplomats to push for a global ban on deep sea trawling and signed the Partners for Fish and Wildlife Act.

The practice of deep-sea trawling, a bottom-scraping fishing technique, is destroying coral reefs, sponges and other habitat for many species of fish and other sea life. In a statement, the White House said it supports preparations for a United Nations ban on fishing, which may come before the General Assembly next month.

The move was hailed by scientists and conservation groups. "This could be the single most important action in protecting marine habitat in history," said Josh Reichert, environmental director for the Pew Charitable Trust, which has been one of the leading groups calling for a ban on the high seas, an unregulated area that covers about 67% of the world's oceans. Spain, Russian and Japan are the leaders in deep sea trawling, which uses heavy steel-reinforced nets to drag the ocean bottom. One of the main targets of the fishing boats is orange roughy, a commercial fish that sometimes schools on undersea mountain tops that are raked by the nets.

The White House announcement came as Bush, in California for a series of political fund-raisers, signed the fish and wildlife bill, which helps landowners rehab and manage habitats on their property. It was sponsored by House Resources

DOJ_NMG_0074583

Chairman Richard Pombo, who often opposes environmental measures. Pombo hosted Bush at a fund-raising breakfast expected to collect $400,000. – John J. Fialka

Read more: Global, White House, Business

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 10:59 am

Republican Leaders Fight Back in Foley Case

After a blunt call from the conservative Washington Times to step down as House speaker, Rep. Dennis Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner are going on conservative radio shows to get out their message that they weren't aware of the sexually explicit instant messages involving former Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley and male congressional pages.

Foley

Hastert, meantime, rejected this morning's Washington Times editorial, that "House Speaker Dennis Hastert must do the only right thing, and resign his speakership at once." The Times went on to say that "Either he was grossly negligent for not taking the red flags fully into account and ordering a swift investigation, for not even remembering the order of events leading up to last week's revelations — or he deliberately looked the other way in hopes that a brewing scandal would simply blow away. …Mr. Hastert has forfeited the confidence of the public and his party, and he cannot preside over the necessary coming investigation, an investigation that must examine his own inept performance."

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean responded that Hastert "has and will lead the Republican conference to another majority in the 110th Congress," according to the AP. On Sean Hannity's radio show yesterday, Boehner suggested the investigation should focus on who knew about the explicit instant messages. "That is the real issue here," he said. On WLW in Cincinnati this morning, Boehner pointed his finger at Hastert: "It's in his corner, it's his responsibility," he said.

The FBI has begun its investigation, interviewing former pages. Foley resigned on Friday and checked into an alcoholic rehab program over the weekend.

Update: President Bush, in California on a political fund-raising swing, praised Hastert as a "father, teacher, coach," and said he is confident Hastert "will provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement in this investigation." Bush spoke in the courtyard of the George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton.

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006, Congress

Permalink | Comments (15) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 8:25 am

Scandal May Alienate GOP Blocs

The Foley page scandal means Republicans have new reason to worry about two key constituencies: Christian conservatives and suburban soccer moms.

Conservatives are already turned off by high federal spending, illegal immigration and inaction on a number of social issues. Suburbanites, meanwhile, complain of a party agenda that is too beholden to the conservatives on issues such as federal funding for stem-cell research. Now the Foley fallout has united both Republican voter groups in anger.

"It's one of the worst congressional scandals ever. A top House Republican who denounced sex predators as 'animals' stands accused of acting like one," Cliff Kincaid, editor of the conservative Accuracy in Media Report, wrote in an editorial circulated by the pro-Republican Web site GOPUSA.com.

"I think there's more pain to come" for Republicans, says party pollster Tony Fabrizio. With clients among House, Senate and gubernatorial candidates in places such as suburban Philadelphia and swing-state Minnesota, he adds, "I'm very much watching how these things play out."

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win a House majority and six seats in the Senate. Read the full article. – Jackie Calmes

Interactive Graphic: Look at local issues facing voters in nine congressional districts nationwide - from southern Connecticut to suburban Seattle to Mark Foley's Florida district.

Sigourney Weaver Seeks Ban To Destructive Fishing Practice (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074584

(AP) - UNITED NATIONS-Sigourney Weaver urged U.N. members on Tuesday to impose a moratorium on a destructive fishing practice called high-seas bottom trawling, warning that the world's oceans are at risk.

Weaver, appearing with several environmental activists and U.N. ambassadors, said that new technology has brought remote and fragile ecosystems within the reach of bottom-trawlers, which rake giant nets equipped with wheels, chains and metal doors across the sea floor to scoop up fish.

"The high seas belong to no single country and they most certainly do not belong to the owners of these large industrial fishing corporations," Weaver said. "They belong to all of us and it is time for us to take them back."

Starting Wednesday, the 192-member U.N. General Assembly will meet to discuss whether to impose a moratorium on bottom-trawling. Environmental groups say the practice is killing little-known coral ecosystems and the species that dwell in them, and must be suspended so the remote areas can be studied.

In 2004, the General Assembly passed a nonbinding resolution urging nations to consider temporary bans on bottom trawling. Japan, Iceland, Spain and other nations whose fishing fleets do much of the world's bottom trawling opposed a larger moratorium.

Weaver, an animal-rights and endangered species activist, said people should not assume that the U.N. is doing something to protect deep-sea ecosystems or that the world's oceans will be safe.

She appealed to ambassadors to "stop this uncontrolled clear-cutting of ancient corals."

"Do the right thing for the seas and for future generations both human and aquatic who will thrive on the bounty of the oceans if given half a chance," Weaver said.

Weaver's screen credits include the "Alien" movies, "Gorillas in the Mist" and "The Ice Storm."

A Better Diesel (NYT)

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

When Europeans think of diesel, they think of the very cars — small and smart — that half of them are driving now. When Americans think of diesel, they think of semis and buses and pickups and, perhaps, one of the lumbering Oldsmobiles that did so much in the 1980's to poison the promise of diesel technology here. Europeans and Americans differ in almost nothing more than they differ in diesel, including different emissions standards and different fuel quality. But in the next few years, as the rules on air quality tighten, Americans need a diesel engine that can meet the stricter standards.

Diesel engines offer more torque and greater fuel efficiency than gasoline engines, and they emit less carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas. The drawback is that they also emit more particulate matter and nitrogen oxide, which contributes to smog. Honda recently unveiled a new engine that solves that problem, using a special catalytic converter that turns harmful nitrogen oxide into simple nitrogen. Honda plans to introduce this engine in the United States in 2009, which just might give us time to improve the poor quality fuel that keeps diesels here from being as clean and as popular as they could be.

It's always tempting to hope for a futuristic solution — like the new fuel-cell car Honda also demonstrated the other day — for the very immediate problems of auto emissions and fuel efficiency. But the answer is going to lie in a mix of vehicles — hybrid cars, more efficient gasoline engines, and highly improved diesels. The answer is also going to come from recognizing that strict limits on emissions and mileage penalize only those companies that are too sluggish to compete.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Agents Arrest 15 In Raids On Major Marijuana Club (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, October 4, 2006

Federal agents went after a major Bay Area marijuana club Tuesday, raiding eight locations in San Francisco and Oakland, arresting 15 people including the group's leader and seizing nearly 13,000 plants.

The target of the raids, which prompted swift criticism from some medical marijuana advocates, was New Remedies Cooperative and its 36-year-old leader, Sparky Rose. The San Francisco resident is well-known in medical-marijuana circles and has been under investigation for several months.

DOJ_NMG_0074585

The group, formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers, ran a dispensary in the Mission District, a pair of cultivation warehouses on Polk and Tennessee streets, and a temporary-employment agency for pot growers called Potent Employment Solutions, said Javier Peña, who heads the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Francisco office.

Rose, whose convertible Porsche Carrera was one of four cars seized by federal agents, was arrested at his home on suspicion of conspiring to distribute marijuana and laundering proceeds, Pena said. In addition to the plants, federal agents seized $125,000 in cash Tuesday.

"Make no mistake, the defendants were in the business of dealing dope," Peña said in an interview. "They were using the pot clubs as facades to make millions of dollars. We're trying to show the public these aren't for the sick or ill. (The goal) is to pocket drug proceeds."

The raids prompted a group of protesters to gather outside the New Remedies club on Mission Street near 14th Street, where federal agents used sledge hammers to break up ATM machines inside the business. Authorities said marijuana was being grown inside the dispensary, one of an estimated 30 to 40 medical-marijuana clubs in San Francisco.

Representatives of the New Remedies Cooperative and Rose were unavailable for comment. But other advocates of the medicinal use of marijuana said the raids were uncalled for.

"This is an outrageous waste of resources," said Shona Gochenaur of Axis of Love San Francisco, a medical marijuana advocacy group.

San Francisco Supervisor Chris Daly said he was concerned about a raft of recent federal raids on pot clubs in Northern California.

"Generally speaking," Daly said, "swooping in is not helpful in terms of the safe distribution of medical cannabis to those who need it."

Under Proposition 215, passed by state voters in 1996, it is legal in California to use medicinal marijuana with the recommendation of a doctor. Federal anti-drug laws, however, contain no such exemption for cannabis. Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman Casey McHenry said Tuesday that "everyone that sells marijuana or cultivates marijuana is at risk."

New Remedies continued to operate even though the government moved in November to seize $1.5 million in assets, records show. The company, which has operated more than a half-dozen storefronts around the state as a nonprofit enterprise, bought marijuana from growers and distributed it from Oakland by courier vans, the government alleged in that civil action.

Prosecutors said the club's patients were given the names of doctors willing to prescribe medical marijuana and would then receive a prescription without being given a physical examination. One doctor saw 49 patients in one day, at $150 each, prosecutors said.

Besides Rose, those arrested Tuesday were James Daley, 56, and Sean Anderson, 22, of San Francisco; Johnny Seto, 32, Mark Miller, 53, and Tracy Smith, 32, of Alameda; Kevin Ellis, 28, and Jason Matthewson, 29, of Pinole; Alfaro Munoz-Bebullida, 33, and Steven Navarro, 35, of Richmond; Mistalee Chiame Wang, 25, and Jaime Perreira, 26, of San Leandro; Ben Blair, 31, of San Pablo; Irene Matsuoka, 27, of Crockett; and Amber Froiness, 26, of Berkeley.

Feds Launch Crackdown Against Area Pot Dispensaries (BCNS)

Bay City News Service, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Federal authorities raided eight different Bay Area locations Tuesday associated with growing, prescribing and dispensing medical marijuana, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Drug enforcement agents and federal police seized 12,743 plants, more than $125,000 in cash, cars, computers and manicured marijuana from at least eight locations, five in San Francisco and three in Oakland, all associated with New Remedies Cooperative and Potent Employment Solutions.

Sparky Rose, the executive director of the organizations, was one of 15 people arrested. All are expected to be arraigned Wednesday in federal court.

The raids were a collaborated effort by at least three different federal agencies. The sheriff's offices of both Mendocino and Santa Clara counties also helped in the investigation, which culminated in the raid of dispensaries, grow sites, at least one personal residence, administrative offices and a storage area.

At 1760 Mission St., federal police and drug enforcement agents boxed up marijuana and hashish inside a medical-marijuana dispensary that also served as a grow site.

The raid started at noon and went on for an hour as federal agents used a sledgehammer to pound open two automated teller machines inside the front office.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan was at the scene but left around 12:30 p.m. DEA Special Agent in Charge Javier Pena said at the time that the raid was part of a "large-scale trafficking" operation and part of an ongoing investigation.

Outside, at least 20 protesters marched with colorful signs and chanted, "DEA, go away" and "patients rights."

Shona Gochenaur, executive director of Axis of Love San Francisco, said several of the people arrested were patients.

"This is despicable and atrocious," Gochenaur said. "I saw them take out an elderly man who was shaking."

Three San Francisco police officers and a sergeant were at the scene of the Mission Street raid to provide a "safety zone" for the federal agents.

Several blocks away in the Potrero Hill neighborhood, another operation was also underway at 790 Tennessee St. Federal agents were inside the warehouse until at least 2 p.m.

Also in Oakland at least two people were taken away in handcuffs from an administrative office located at 1710 Franklin, According to Dolphin, who also said all three locations were affiliated with New Remedies, which was formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers.

DEA spokeswoman Casey McEnry said she did not know of any patients under arrest. She also said the search warrants are sealed and she could not release any more information on specific locations targeted.

Javier Pena, who directed the raid, said the people arrested Tuesday are nothing but drug dealers, in the business to make money.

"Federal drug laws prohibit the cultivation and sale of marijuana." Pena said in a statement. "Anyone who breaks these laws to run a lucrative drug trade, buy fancy cars, boost their bank accounts, and exploit vulnerable citizens is not compassionate, they're criminal."

Computers, Boxes Labeled `MJ' Seized In S.F. Pot Clinic Raid (BCNS)

Bay City News Service, October 3, 2006

Federal police and drug enforcement agents loaded into a van computers, printers and boxes labeled ``MJ & Hash" around 1 p.m. today after raiding a medical cannabis dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District.

According to a federal agent who did not give his name, but who drove away with U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, the raid was part of a ``large-scale trafficking" operation and also part of an ongoing investigation.

Kevin Reed, the owner of the now-defunct Green Cross medical marijuana dispensary and who was at the raid, said that several patients were lined up and taken away in handcuffs.

``At least half of the dispensaries in San Francisco are closing down because of (this) raid," he said.

At least 20 protesters and members of the community stood outside and chanted ``DEA, go away!" and ``Patients rights!" outside the Mission Street facility.

San Francisco police officers stood outside the door to the dispensary to create a ``safety zone" for the federal agents.

Copyright © 2006 by Bay City News, Inc. -- republication, re-transmission or reuse without the express written consent of Bay City News, Inc. is prohibited.

15 Arrested In Bay Area Pot Club Raids (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - Federal drug agents raided eight Bay Area locations connected to a medical marijuana club Tuesday and arrested 15 people, including the club's operator, authorities said.

The raids took place at buildings in San Francisco and Oakland belonging to New Remedies Cooperative LLC, formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers, and its temporary employment agency for pot growers, Potent Employment Solutions.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents confiscated 12,743 marijuana plants, computers, four vehicles and a total of $125,000 in cash and three bank accounts belonging to operator Sparky Rose, 36, and the two businesses, authorities said.

Medical marijuana advocates who witnessed some of the raids said agents targeted New Remedies' growing facility, administrative offices and the pot club itself located in San Francisco's Mission District.

"Obviously, the DEA is on a little bit of a rampage this week," said advocate William Dolphin, citing other pot club crackdowns in Granada Hills, San Fernando Valley and Modesto.

Rose and the 14 others arrested were scheduled to appear in court Wednesday.

Medical marijuana has been legal in California since voters approved Proposition 215 in 1996, but the drug remains illegal under federal law.

"Federal drug laws prohibit the cultivation and sale of marijuana. Anyone who breaks these laws to run a lucrative drug trade, buy fancy cars, boost their bank accounts, and exploit vulnerable citizens is not compassionate, they're criminal," DEA Special Agent in Charge Javier F. Pena said in a statement Tuesday.

There are currently an estimated 30 to 40 clubs in San Francisco, according to city officials.

Feds Raid Med Pot Club In S.F. Mission, Elsewhere (KPIX-TV)

KPIX-TV/BCN, October 4, 2006

(CBS 5 / BCN) SAN FRANCISCO Federal Drug Enforcement Agents said they raided a medical cannabis dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District Tuesday afternoon along with grow sites, homes, offices and storage areas in San Francisco and Oakland -- seizing thousands of marijuana plants, several cars, computers and large sums of cash.

Fifteen arrests also stemmed from the eight raids, five in San Francisco and three in Oakland, that took place around the noon hour -- the most notable of which occured at Mission Caregivers at 1756-1760 Mission Street in San Francisco.

Shona Gochenaur, executive director of Axis of Love San Francisco, said several patients were among those arrested and taken away in handcuffs.

"This is despicable and atrocious," Gochenaur said. "I saw them take out an elderly man who was shaking."

Kevin Reed, the owner of the now-defunct Green Cross medical marijuana dispensary and who was also at the Mission Caregivers site, claimed he too witnessed patients being arrested.

However, DEA spokeswoman Casey McEnry said she did not know of any patients placed under arrest.

Agents said among those arrested was Sparky Rose, 36, of San Francisco. Authorities said Rose owned and operated the Mission Caregivers dispensary, which also served as a grow site.

The dispensary raid lasted for about an hour as federal agents used a sledgehammer to pound open two automated teller machines inside the front office. The building was then padlocked by agents after they boxed up marijuana and hashish found inside.

Rose operated his medial cannabis business under the names New Remedies Cooperative LLC, Compassionate Caregivers and Potent Employment Solutions, according to federal authorities.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan maintained Rose ran a "large-scale trafficking" operation and said he was the target of a long-term investigation by the DEA.

At least 20 protestors and members of the community marched with colorful signs and chanted "DEA, go away!" and "Patients rights!" on the street outside Mission Caregivers as San Francisco police officers stood at the entrance to create a "safety zone" for the federal agents.

According Gochenaur, city supervisors Ross Mirkarimi and Chris Daly were among those who voiced support for the protestors.

Several blocks away in the Potrero Hill neighborhood, federal agents spent a couple hours inside a warehouse at 790 Tennessee Street that was said to belong to Rose.

"At least half of the dispensaries in San Francisco are closing down because of (this) raid," Reed said.

In Oakland, at least two people were observed being taken away in handcuffs from an administrative office at 1710 Franklin that agents said was connected to Rose's operations.

Despite California and San Francisco laws which allow for medical marijuana, the DEA defended the raids.

DOJ_NMG_0074588

"Federal drug laws prohibit the cultivation and sale of marijuana. Anyone who breaks these laws to run a lucrative drug trade, buy fancy cars, boost their bank accounts, and exploit vulnerable citizens is not compassionate, they're criminal," said DEA Special Agent in Charge Javier F. Peña. "Make no mistake – these defendants were in the business of dealing drugs, and DEA is in the business of arresting drug dealers."

In all, authorities said they confiscated 12,743 marijuana plants, 4 vehicles including a Porsche Carrera convertible and a total of $125,000 in cash.

In addition to Rose, the others arrested on Tuesday included:

· Alfaro Munoz-Bebullida, 33, of Richmond
· Steven Navarro, 35, of Richmond
· Johnny Seto, 32, of Alameda
· Mark Miller, 53, of Alameda
· Tracy Smith, 32, of Alameda
· Mistalee Chiame Wang, 25, of San Leandro
· Amber Froiness, 26, of Berkeley
· Jaime Perreira, 26, of San Leandro

All those arrested faced Wednesday appearances in federal court on charges related to the illegal distribution of marijuana, authorities said.

Feds Raid Medical Cannabis Dispensary In SF (KCBS)

KCBS, October 3, 2006

San Francisco, CA (KCBS) -- Federal police and drug enforcement agents raided a medical cannabis dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District Tuesday.

The raid took place at the New Remedies Cooperative. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration loaded into a van computers, printers and boxes around one p.m.

Showna Gochenaur, executive director of the medical marijuana advocacy group Axis of Love San Francisco was at the scene. She told KCBS' Henry Mulak, "almost every car that pulled up, there were more DEA agents."

"They've been here for over three hours," she said. "We saw them take out what looked to be an elderly patient in handcuffs."

Kevin Reed, the owner of the now-defunct Green Cross medical marijuana dispensary, was at the raid. He said several patients were lined up, cuffed, and taken away.

"At least half of the dispensaries in San Francisco are closing down because of (this) raid," he said.

According to a federal agent who did not give his name, but who drove away with U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, the raid was part of a "large-scale trafficking" operation and also part of an ongoing investigation.

At least twenty protestors and members of the community stood outside and chanted "DEA, go away!" and "Patients rights!" on the street outside Mission Caregivers, at 1756 Mission St.

San Francisco police officers stood outside the door to the dispensary to create a "safety zone" for the federal agents.

Reason Behind Record Pot Seizures A Mystery (KPIX)

KPIX-TV, October 3, 2006

(CBS 5) More marijuana has been seized in raids around the state so far this year than all of last year combined. And it's not over yet.

"We're expecting to be looking for growers and eradicating them all the way through November and possibly into December," said Serg Palanov of the Santa Clara County Sheriff's Office.

Most of the pot grown for sale in the US comes from the southeast and west, with California, alone, accounting for about a third of it. And within the state, national forest and county park lands see the greatest number of large scale outdoor farms.

DOJ_NMG_0074589

But new indoor farms are on the rise. Drug agents say a San Francisco-based Asian crime syndicate is responsible for dozens of growing operations discovered in Sacramento area homes this summer. The DEA says Asian gangs are moving into the wholesale marijuana business in a big way.

A pound of domestic marijuana costs as little as $500 in Sacramento and as much as $6,000 dollars in San Jose, with the average price around $2,500 dollars. Mexican-grown pot prices average about a $1,000 a pound, but range from a low of $100 in Bakersfield to $1,400 in San Francisco.

Drug agents believe the big increase in seizures has reduced the supply on the street, but there is evidence a little pot is going a much longer way. Marijuana potency levels have nearly tripled over the past twenty years as cultivation techniques improved, rising from less than 3 percent of the active agent THC in 1985, to about 8 percent today.

Intense cultivation can bring the THC level to more than 20 percent, but big commercial growers find the effort to achieve that potency to be not cost effective.

Drug agents can only speculate why pot seizures have doubled in some counties this year. Better helicopter surviellence is one possibility. More tips is another.

"Our team has educated the public along with hunters and hikers on what to look for if they do see anything," Palanov said.

Chargers' Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Felony Drug Charges (KGTV)

KGTV, October 4, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- A Chargers player accused of shipping Codeine-based cough syrup by FedEx to his home state of Texas pleaded not guilty Tuesday to five felony drug charges.

Terrence Kiel, a 25-year-old safety for the San Diego team, faces a maximum of seven years and four months in state prison if convicted of all the charges, said Deputy District Attorney James Fontaine.

Kiel, who is free on $160,000 bail, is charged with three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance and two counts of transporting a controlled substance.

The defendant -- dressed in a brown dress shirt and blue jeans – answered "yes" when Judge David Szumowski asked him if he waived his speedy trial rights so his preliminary hearing could be scheduled for Dec. 5.

A readiness conference was set for Nov. 14.

Defense attorney Bob Grimes said Kiel -- who did not suit up for the Chargers' loss at Baltimore last weekend -- is practicing with the team as it prepares for a game at Qualcomm Stadium on Sunday against the Pittsburgh Steelers.

A second-round draft pick out of Texas A&M in 2003, Kiel's official status with the team was not known.

He was arrested last Tuesday, after federal agents showed up at team practice and searched his car and locker.

On June 2, management at FedEx conducted an audit of a parcel that contained 15 vials of Prometh with Codeine, considered a controlled substance, according to a search warrant affidavit.

FedEx employees know Kiel because he makes shipments regularly using his FedEx account, according to the affidavit.

Although they gave DEA Special Agent Dean Henderson a general description of the shipper of the parcel, they couldn't positively identify him because it had been a month since the package had been sent.

On Sept. 21, the manager of a FedEx office called Henderson when Kiel shipped a parcel similar to the one shipped on June 2, this one containing three pints of Codeine, according to the affidavit.

The return address on the parcels showed an address on Santo Road, not Kiel's real address, and the return name on the shipping label was not the athlete's, the affidavit states.

Kiel paid cash to ship the parcel, even though he has an account with FedEx, according to the document.

Henderson said it is common for drug smugglers to use a different name than their own to avoid detection by law enforcement.

Bottles of Codeine-based cough syrup sell for up to $325 on the street in Texas, where people are known to mix the drug with soft drinks and refer to it as "lean," according to the DEA.

Both the June and September parcels were being shipped to Texas, where Kiel was previously arrested for aggravated assault on a public servant, theft and evading arrest, according to the affidavit.

Employees at FedEx copied the license plate of the vehicle Kiel was driving, and a DMV record check showed it was registered to the football player at a residence on Juneberry Court in San Diego, according to the affidavit.

Kiel admitted knowing that it was a controlled substance he was sending by FedEx, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

According to another search warrant affidavit, Henderson said he spoke with DEA drug diversion investigators who told him the bottles of Codeine in question contained numbers which indicated they came from a medical care facility and all indications were they were stolen or otherwise misappropriated.

The investigators told Henderson the Codeine in the bottles can only be legally distributed by prescription and a licensed provider would rarely prescribe a pint of the liquid but rather, it would be dispensed to patients in smaller prescription bottles, the affidavit states.

Fontaine said outside court that the amount of cough syrup with Codeine that Kiel allegedly shipped was not "personal-use quantities."

Kiel's case was the second headline-grabbing, off-the-field incident involving a Chargers player last month.

Linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times outside his Poway home Sept. 3 during a confrontation with an off-duty Coronado police officer. He will miss the entire season.

Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges (SDUT)

By By Brent Schrotenboer, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 3, 2006

Chargers safety Terrence Kiel pleaded not guilty in San Diego Superior court Tuesday to five felony charges involving the shipment and possession for sale of codeine-based cough syrup.

At Kiel's arraignment Tuesday, his trial readiness date was set for Nov. 14 and his preliminary hearing was set for Dec. 5.

Kiel, who is free on a $160,000 bond, was arrested last week after being accused of shipping the cough syrup, a controlled substance, to his native Texas.

The bottles of codeine in question “contain numbers which indicated they came from a medical care facility and all indications are they were stolen or otherwise misappropriated,” according to an affidavit signed by Dean Henderson, a special agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Kiel Back With Team; Drug Hearing Today (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 3, 2006

Chargers safety Terrence Kiel will plead not guilty today to five felony charges filed yesterday involving the shipment and possession of codeine-based cough syrup, his attorney said yesterday.

The San Diego County District Attorney yesterday filed two charges of transporting a controlled substance and three charges of possession for sale of a controlled substance against Kiel, who was arrested last week and is free on $160,000 bond.

Kiel's attorney, Bob Grimes, declined to comment on the merits or facts of the case except to say the bail was set at $160,000 only because a judge didn't yet have the opportunity to review which controlled substance was involved.

If a judge had been able to review that the case involved cough syrup and not cocaine, for example, “I think the bail would have been a lot lower,” Grimes said.

If convicted, Kiel, 25, could face five years in state prison. At his arraignment today in Superior Court, he will make his plea and court dates will be set. After starting the Chargers' first two games, Kiel did not play in Sunday's 16-13 loss at Baltimore.

Kiel returned to work with the team yesterday and is expected to resume practicing when the Chargers begin preparations tomorrow for Sunday's game against Pittsburgh. Kiel was paid for last week and will face no penalties from the team, according to General Manager A.J. Smith.

It is expected the league will refer Kiel to evaluation and possible counseling as part of its drug program.

DOJ_NMG_0074591

Drug Enforcement Administration agents intercepted two FedEx packages containing 18 pint bottles full of the drug, plus more bottles in Kiel's Serra Mesa condo. The two packages each drew a charge of transporting a controlled substance and possession for sale. The bottles in his condo also drew a possession-for-sale charge.

Agents said a bottle of the cough syrup sells for up to $325 on the street in Texas, where the bottles were being shipped, and where it is popular to mix with soda to make a drink called "purple drank" or "lean."

Kiel, who grew up in Lufkin, Texas, and played at Texas A&M, has faced financial difficulties in the past year, including a Sept. 7 notice of default seeking payment of $16,610 from a $591,634 mortgage.

Kiel is making $460,000 this season, his fourth in San Diego.

DEA spokesman Dan Simmons and prosecutor Damon Mosler said the investigation involved only Kiel.

"I have not heard at all that it goes beyond Terrence Kiel," Simmons said.

One of the packages was addressed to a "Rick Jones" in Tyler, Texas, but it is not known whether that is the intended recipient's real name.

Chargers Safety Terrence Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) - Chargers safety Terrence Kiel pleaded not guilty on Tuesday to charges he shipped bottles of codeine-based cough syrup to Texas.

Kiel, 25, a starter with the Chargers, faces a maximum of seven years and four months in state prison if convicted of all five felony drug counts against him, according to Deputy District Attorney James Fontaine.

Kiel was arrested Sept. 26 in the locker room after authorities turned up at Chargers headquarters. Drug Enforcement Administration officials said Kiel admitted to shipping at least two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas via FedEx.

The agency has found widespread abuse in Texas of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs and referred to as "lean."

Fontaine said the district attorney's office is still investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup.

Kiel's lawyer, Robert Grimes, said his client was cooperating with the investigation.

According to an affidavit for a search warrant, FedEx managers searched a package Kiel mailed with his FedEx account in June and found 15 bottles of Prometh prescription cough syrup in the box. A boarding pass found inside the box led DEA agents to an address Kiel used to register a car. Three bottles of Prometh were seized last week at that address.

Kiel paid cash to send a second package to Texas in September, prompting a FedEx manager to contact the DEA, according to the affidavit.

Kiel, free on $160,000 US bail, didn't accompany the team to its game in Baltimore last Sunday. His status for this Sunday's game against Pittsburgh hasn't been determined.

Kiel is making $500,000 this season, his fourth with the Chargers.

Bonds' Trainer Wants To Withdraw Plea (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds' personal trainer wants to withdraw his guilty plea because prosecutors based their steroid distribution case on an illegal recording, his lawyer said Tuesday in a court hearing.

Greg Anderson, who is jailed for refusing to testify before a grand jury probing whether Bonds committed perjury, already served a three-month prison sentence after pleading guilty to the steroid charge.

But attorney Mark Geragos said Tuesday that an illegal tape recording of Anderson was the basis for the federal case against him in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal. A federal prosecutor acknowledged having a tape of Anderson discussing Bonds and undetectable performance-enhancing drugs at least a month before the trainer's guilty plea last year, but said Geragos' claims were "ludicrous and speculative."

"That's speculation by Mr. Geragos. He's wrong," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeff Nedrow.

The claim was the latest effort by Geragos to get a federal judge to free Anderson, who is being held for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating whether Bonds lied when he told a grand jury in 2003 that he never knowingly used steroids.

DOJ_NMG_0074592

Anderson served three months in prison and three months of home confinement after pleading guilty to distributing steroids and laundering money in the BALCO case. He served 15 days in prison in July for refusing to testify to a grand jury about Bonds, and was jailed again Aug. 28 for refusing to testify before a new grand jury.

Authorities have refused to release the tape to Anderson. Nedrow maintained Tuesday that the recording was legal and said he first learned of it in 2004 from the San Francisco Chronicle.

Nedrow said prosecutors didn't get access to the tape until a month before Anderson's plea deal. But Geragos suspects investigators had it all along and used the tape as an illegal roadmap to build a case against Anderson.

It has not been publicly revealed who made the recording. The government said the recording was made of a face-to-face conversation, while Anderson suspects it was made of a telephone call.

On the tape, according to the Chronicle, Anderson said: "The whole thing is, everything I've been doing, it's all undetectable. The stuff I have, we created it. You can't buy it anywhere else, you can't get it anywhere else."

Four other men also have pleaded guilty in the BALCO scandal for participating in the distribution or manufacturing of undetectable steroids to elite athletes.

Geragos said authorities only recently revealed the tape so they could build a perjury case against Bonds.

"The strategy is a perjury trap, obviously," Geragos said.

Geragos did not say when he would seek to withdraw Anderson's plea.

U.S. District Judge William Alsup, who jailed Anderson a month ago for refusing to cooperate, said the tape is "as worthless a piece of evidence as I've ever seen."

An unshaven Anderson, who was in court wearing brown jail garb, contends he should be released and should not have to testify in front of the Bonds grand jury for the same reasons he should be allowed to withdraw his plea in the BALCO case.

Anderson could remain at the Federal Correctional Institution in Dublin, near San Francisco, for more than a year if he continues his refusal to testify.

Latinos Debate Forming Regional Force (AP)

By Julie Watson, The Associated Press

AP, October 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Latin American defense ministers debated forming a regional peacekeeping force Tuesday, while the top U.S. defense official urged nations at a hemispheric conference to work together to combat drug trafficking and terrorism.

Guatemalan Defense Minister Gen. Francisco Bermudez said the ministers discussed forming a regional force for international peacekeeping missions and disaster relief.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez has proposed members of the Mercosur trade bloc _ Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay _ link their militaries to guarantee the region's security.

Chavez has been lobbying for allies to counterbalance what he says is U.S. domination in the region.

Bermudez said the force would be to help the United Nations in peacekeeping and in "no moment have we talked about creating another force for other means."

"We believe that we can support, as a region, the strengthening of world peace, democracy and respect for human rights, as our fundamental mission," Bermudez said. Guatemala already has 218 soldiers in Congo, Haiti, Burundi and other countries on humanitarian missions.

The debate came during a gathering of defense ministers from more than 30 Latin American and Caribbean nations at the seventh Western Hemisphere's Defense Ministers Conference, which ends Wednesday.

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld stressed the importance of regional cooperation at a news conference.

"Almost every problem we face is a problem that cannot be solved by a single nation. Whether it's counternarcotics or gangs or hostage taking or counterterrorism, all of those problems require very close cooperation among nations, many nations," said Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0074593

Coordinating efforts, Rumsfeld said, is vital to the drug war in Latin America, where smugglers migrate to other nations once there is a crackdown.

In the past few years, drug violence has spiraled throughout the region as gangs battle for routes left open following the arrests of top cartel leaders. Smugglers have turned more vicious in Mexico, where in Acapulco a half dozen police and rival smugglers have been beheaded. One head washed up near the tourist resort's popular beaches.

In Managua, Central American ministers said they asked Rumsfeld for more U.S. aid in their fight against Colombian and Mexican drug traffickers using their impoverished nations as a funnel for U.S.-bound shipments of cocaine and marijuana. A day before the ministers arrived for the conference Sunday, Nicaraguan officials seized 6,600 pounds of cocaine after a shootout on the Pacific coast, the country's largest drug seizure to date.

Bermudez said the region is trying to consolidate its efforts under a plan known as the Meso-American Strategy to combat organized crime.

IMMIGRATION:

Justices Hear Case On Immigrant Drug Offenders (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

The Bush administration urged the Supreme Court to declare that legal immigrants can be deported for drug offenses that are felonies in some states but only misdemeanors under federal law, as the court heard its first oral arguments of the new term yesterday.

At issue are provisions of the 1996 immigration law that require any noncitizen guilty of an "aggravated felony" to be sent back to his country of origin, with no chance to ask for leniency. The law defines "aggravated felony" to include any drug-trafficking offense that is a "felony punishable under" federal drug laws.

Federal appeals courts, however, have differed as to that language's precise meaning. Some have upheld deportations based on state felonies, such as simple drug possession, that would not be felonies under federal law.

The seemingly technical dispute could have real-world consequences for thousands of green-card holders. In 2005, the United States deported about 77,000 immigrants with criminal records, of whom about 9.5 percent had arrests for drug possession, according to the Justice Department.

A Justice Department lawyer, Edwin S. Kneedler, said the court should read the statute to require deportation for felony state drug-possession convictions.

"Because the petitioner's underlying conduct here was punishable under [federal law], and was a felony under state law, they were properly found to have committed aggravated felonies," he told the justices, according to a transcript of the argument released yesterday by the court.

It was the first time the court has released same-day transcripts of oral argument on its Web site, http://www.supremecourtus.gov, under a policy announced last month.

But several justices asked Kneedler whether that was a strained reading of the statute.

"[I]t must give you pause that your analysis is of a term, 'drug-trafficking crime' or 'illicit trafficking,' and your theory leads to the conclusion that simple possession equates with drug trafficking," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said.

Kneedler replied that "a lot of state statutes dealing with drugs do not, are not patterned directly after the federal statute, and there is no reason why Congress would have insisted that they do so in order for this statute to operate sensibly."

The case is an appeal by Jose Antonio Lopez, a Mexico native who entered the United States illegally 20 years ago to pick tomatoes. He became a legal resident in 1990 and later opened two small businesses in South Dakota.

In 1997, state prosecutors there indicted him on charges of cocaine distribution and of aiding and abetting cocaine possession. He pleaded guilty to the possession charge and served 15 months of a five-year sentence. Since his release from prison, federal authorities have been trying to deport him under the aggravated-felony law.

DOJ_NMG_0074594

Lopez, who has a wife and two U.S.-citizen children, voluntarily left for Mexico earlier this year. But his case is not moot, because if he wins, he would be permitted to seek a cancellation of his deportation order and return legally to the United States.

Lopez's attorney, Robert A. Long Jr., told the court that the administration's position would undermine the uniformity of national immigration rules, because "what it is arguing is that states can banish noncitizens and can do so by enacting drug laws deciding to make a simple possession offense a felony."

Justices Ponder Conditions For Automatic Deportation (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — The intersection of federal criminal law and immigration law is a perilous place for the millions of legal residents of the United States who are not citizens: one slip, one criminal conviction, can mean deportation.

The justices of the Supreme Court struggled, during the first argument of their new term on Tuesday, to understand exactly how the two statutory frameworks intersect.

The question, posed by two separate cases that were consolidated for a single argument, was whether immigration officials can treat an immigrant's state-court conviction for possession of a small quantity of illegal drugs as an "aggravated felony" as long as the crime is considered a felony under the state law, even if federal law treats the same conduct as only a misdemeanor.

Conviction of an "aggravated felony" has dire consequences for a noncitizen, including automatic deportation without the usual rights of appeal and a permanent bar against returning to the United States.

Congress added the category of aggravated felony to federal immigration law in 1988, and it includes a number of specific offenses. Among them is a "drug trafficking crime" that in turn is defined as "any felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," the basic federal drug law. Does a particular drug crime that is a felony under the law of a state become a "felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," even if federal law would treat it only as a misdemeanor?

Although the government's position has shifted over time, its current view is that the answer is yes. The law of the "jurisdiction of conviction," Deputy Solicitor General Edwin S. Kneedler told the court, is what determines whether the crime is an aggravated felony.

Lawyers for two lawful permanent residents caught up in this statutory maze argued the opposite. "State felonies are not themselves punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," Robert A. Long Jr., representing José Antonio López, told the court. "It is not a federal crime to violate state law," he added.

Mr. López, a native of Mexico who became a permanent legal resident in 1990, pleaded guilty in a South Dakota court in 1997 to "aiding and abetting possession of cocaine," a felony under South Dakota law for which he served 15 months in prison. Under federal law, a first offense of possessing cocaine is a misdemeanor.

At the time, the Board of Immigration Appeals took the position that a drug crime that was not a federal felony could not be considered an "aggravated felony." While the non-aggravated-drug conviction made Mr. López deportable, it left officials with the discretion to treat him leniently, including granting him a "cancellation of removal."

But while his case was pending before an immigration judge, the Board of Immigration Appeals changed its position and ruled that a state-law drug felony was an aggravated felony. Mr. López lost his final appeal last year before the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis. He was deported to Mexico in January. His Supreme Court appeal is López v. Gonzales, No. 05-547.

The other case before the court, Toledo-Flores v. United States, No. 05-7664, was brought by another Mexican, Reymundo Toledo-Flores. He was convicted in Texas of possession of 0.16 grams of cocaine, less than six one-thousandths of an ounce, a felony under Texas law. He lost an appeal before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, and was deported in April.

As is often the case with questions of statutory interpretation, the argument on Tuesday was dense, dry and technical. But the human dilemmas created by the government's current interpretation have drawn considerable attention to the case.

DOJ_NMG_0074595

Dozens of civil rights and criminal defense groups signed briefs on the immigrants' behalf, as did the American Bar Association and three men who served as general counsels of the Immigration and Naturalization Service under Presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush.

The former officials' brief said that "because the 'aggravated felony' categorization has such sweeping consequences and essentially eliminates the capacity of the immigration enforcement system to differentiate among individual circumstances," it should apply only when Congress has been completely clear.

Several justices found the language less than clear. Referring to the phrase "any felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," Justice Stephen G. Breyer said to Mr. Kneedler, the government's lawyer, "I could look at those words a thousand times and not have a clue" whether the law covers state felonies that are only federal misdemeanors.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg observed that "it seems to me unseemly" that "because of the happenstance of the states in which they were convicted," one immigrant could be "barred from ever coming back" while another who committed the identical offense would not be.

Mr. Long, the lawyer for Mr. López, agreed with the observation. He said the government's interpretation would permit individual states to "banish" immigrants by labeling minor offenses as felonies.

Part of the argument was spent debating whether, for technical reasons, Mr. Toledo-Flores's appeal was moot, as the government argued. His lawyer, Timothy Crooks, said the case was not moot because under the conditions of his "supervised release" in Mexico, Mr. Toledo-Flores must observe certain rules, including abstention from alcohol.

Justice Antonin Scalia replied that this was not a burden with sufficient real consequences to keep the case alive.

"Nobody thinks your client is really, you know, abstaining from tequila down in Mexico," Justice Scalia said.

Justices Open Term, Hear Case About Drugs, Deportation (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court heard its first arguments of the 2006-07 term on Tuesday in a spirited session that focused on whether foreigners who are in this country legally should be deported automatically if they are convicted of drug possession.

All of the justices except the typically silent Clarence Thomas jumped into the discussion, which revealed some of the ideological divisions on the nine-member court.

The case tests provisions of anti-drug and immigration laws and could have significant consequences for legal permanent residents, or "green card" holders, who are found guilty of relatively low-level crimes. If the justices rule that drug possession could amount to an "aggravated felony," it would cause many convicted immigrants to be routinely deported, and prevent them from appealing to an immigration judge.

Tuesday's dispute involves legal immigrants, but it arises against a backdrop of concern over policies related to border security and illegal immigration.

The question for the justices is whether a drug-possession offense that is a felony under state law but would be a misdemeanor under federal law rises to the level of illicit trafficking, making it an "aggravated felony" and requiring mandatory banishment for a legal immigrant who is not a U.S. citizen.

Jose Antonio Lopez, a Mexican national, was convicted in South Dakota of aiding and abetting possession of cocaine. Reymundo Toledo-Flores, also from Mexico, was convicted in Texas of possessing cocaine. Federal appeals courts ruled that their offenses could be considered aggravated felonies for deportation purposes, based on the respective states' laws. Other appeals courts, however, have ruled the opposite, saying that an offense qualifies as an "aggravated felony" only if it would be punishable as a felony under the federal Controlled Substances Act. Drug possession is a misdemeanor under the act.

Attorneys for Lopez and Toledo-Flores argued that Congress did not want possession of a drug to be regarded as an aggravated felony for deportation purposes. They stressed the importance of uniform standards tied to federal law, rather than to state codes that would cause some legal immigrants who had committed the same offenses to be automatically deported in some states, but not in others.

DOJ_NMG_0074596

Deputy U.S. Solicitor General Edwin Kneedler argued that Congress intended “any felony” to trigger the automatic deportation provision, whether under state or federal law. He said Congress sought to cover large categories of state criminal conduct.

The court's more liberal justices appeared most skeptical of that argument.

“It seems to me unseemly in the immigration context,” Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said, “to say that two people who have committed the identical act” can be treated differently “because of the happenstance of the states in which they were convicted.”

Justice David Souter questioned whether Congress would have written laws that classified drug possession as a misdemeanor, but then allowed it to be termed an “aggravated felony” for deportations. “The problem here is that state and federal laws are at odds on determining the gravity of the offense,” he said.

The court's newest conservative justices, Chief Justice John Roberts and Samuel Alito, joined Justice Antonin Scalia in appearing most sympathetic to the government's position.

Roberts suggested by his questions that the automatic deportation provision could be triggered by state or federal felonies. Alito, beginning his first full term on the bench, said Congress could have wanted the term “illicit trafficking” broadly interpreted “so that it can include mere possession offenses.”

Scalia's Tequila Remark Launches New Term (CNN)

By Bill Mears, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Justice Antonin Scalia opened the Supreme Court's new term Tuesday by questioning whether a man deported to Mexico after a drug conviction would be "abstaining from tequila" for fear of violating his U.S. parole terms.

The remark came as justices heard an immigration case involving a Texas man, Reymundo Toledo-Flores, who was deported in April after being convicted of illegally entering the United States.

At the time, Toledo-Flores was under supervised release, a form of parole, for a 2002 cocaine possession conviction. He served seven months in a Texas prison on that charge and was deported after serving his time.

Attorney Timothy Crooks argued to the justices that his client's supervised-release terms left him under U.S. jurisdiction even while on Mexican soil, technically leaving him vulnerable to deportation back to the United States if he violated his parole.

Scalia responded with incredulity.

"No one thinks your client is abstaining from tequila for fear of being deported," he said. Supervision "is impossible once he leaves the country," he added. "This is an ingenious exercise of the conceivable."

Neither Crooks nor the other justices reacted visibly to Scalia's remarks, and there was no immediate reaction from immigrant rights activists, many of whom were in the courtroom.Other justices skeptical

Several colleagues, including Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice David Souter, were equally skeptical of Crook's arguments. Souter noted that Toledo-Flores "would have to violate the law by reentering the U.S." to face any penalty.

Scalia's remarks and actions have provoked controversy in the past.

In March, he made an Italian hand gesture when confronted by a reporter outside a Boston church. Some interpreted him as using his middle finger, which he did not, but both gestures are considered vulgar in some quarters.

The 70-year-old jurist refused to recuse himself from a case involving Vice President Dick Cheney, despite going duck hunting with the vice president in 2003 when the court was considering an appeal involving Cheney's energy task force.

And he told a 1996 audience that many Christians in the United States attract the "scorn of the sophisticated world" for believing in religious miracles.

Scalia had a man who was heckling him removed during a 2004 speech in Washington. That same year, a U.S. marshal guarding the justice confiscated a reporter's tape recorder and erased comments made at a Mississippi school. The Justice Department found the marshal had violated the law, and Scalia apologized, but denied ordering seizure of the device.

Tuesday's arguments came in appeals by Toledo-Flores and another man, Jose Lopez, who is facing deportation after a 1997 conviction for aiding and abetting the possession of cocaine in South Dakota. State, federal conflict

DOJ_NMG_0074597

Their cases highlight a conflict between state and federal laws over the seriousness of drug crimes involving immigrants. (Case summary)

Lopez entered the United States illegally in 1985 and later gained permanent residency. He and his wife, a legal resident, have two children, both U.S. citizens. He was ordered deported in 1998, but that order was stayed pending the high court's ruling.

Under federal law, the charges against both men are misdemeanors. But the federal Board of Immigration Appeals concluded they committed "aggravated felonies" and were eligible for deportation.

Arguments by the government's lawyer met with skepticism from justices as well.

Deputy Solicitor General Edwin Kneedler countered that the court should look to various state laws, where the majority of criminal cases are prosecuted, not some "supposed" uniform standard of federal statutes. Souter called the Bush administration's position "very strange."

"The problem is that state law and federal law are at odds over the gravity of the offense," he said.

The high court's new term officially began Monday, but no arguments were held because of the Yom Kippur holiday.

Scalia's 'Tequila' Remark Raises Eyebrows During Immigrants' Rights Argument (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 4, 2006

During oral arguments Tuesday in an immigrants' rights case, Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia made a reference to one of the parties, a Mexican man who has been deported back to his country, as someone unlikely to keep from drinking tequila on the chance he could return to the United States.

The comment raised eyebrows in the audience and offended some who were told about the remark afterward on the grounds that it perpetuates stereotypes about Mexicans. Lawyers directly involved in the case could not be reached or declined to comment publicly.

The comment came during arguments in Lopez v. Gonzales and Toledo-Flores v. United States, challenges to the government's interpretation of the federal law that allows deportation of immigrants who commit aggravated felonies.

The question before the Court is whether the law covers those who are convicted of crimes that are felonies under state law but only misdemeanors under federal law. The case could affect thousands of immigrants with relatively minor drug offenses on their records.

One issue is whether one of the cases is moot -- Reymundo Toledo-Flores has already been deported back to Mexico because of his conviction in Texas for possession of 0.16 grams (about 0.005 ounces) of cocaine.

His lawyer, Assistant Federal Public Defender Timothy Crooks, told the Court that the case is not moot because even though his client is in Mexico, he is still subject to the U.S. District Court's jurisdiction and could face adverse consequences if he commits further offenses in Mexico or tries to return to the United States to visit his children, who are U.S. citizens.

Scalia dismissed that argument as "an exercise in the conceivable" and added, "Nobody thinks your client is really, you know, abstaining from tequila down in Mexico because he is on supervised release in the United States."

Carlos Ortiz, former president of the Hispanic National Bar Association, was not in the audience but reacted strongly when told of the comment. "Justice Scalia is supposed to be very smart, but anyone who is supposed to be so smart would not and should not say something that insensitive. It is a really terrible comment, and he should be called on it."

Ortiz, who has long lobbied for the appointment of a Hispanic justice and more Hispanic law clerks to the high court, added, "This is the kind of incident that makes it so clear that the Court needs more diversity."

Scalia declined to comment on his remark.

One lawyer who was in the audience, Benita Jain of the Immigrant Defense Project of the New York State Defenders Association, said the reference was unfortunate because most of the immigrants who could be affected by the case are "lawful residents who have been here since they were young." She said those who face deportation if immigrants lose in the cases before the Court have been U.S. residents for an average of 14 years.

Jain, who was part of a team that filed an amicus brief on behalf of the immigrants in the case, declined to comment further on Scalia's remark except to say guardedly that he is "known for being colorful. It's Scalia."

DOJ_NMG_0074598

Border Security, Job Market Leave Farms Short Of Workers (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

CLOVIS, Calif. -- Bins of Granny Smith apples towered over two conveyor belts at P-R Farms' packing plant. But only one belt moved. P-R Farms, like farms up and down California and across the nation, does not have enough workers to process its fruit.

"We're short by 50 to 75 people," said Pat Ricchiuti, 59, the third-generation owner of P-R Farms. "For the last three weeks, we're running at 50 percent capacity. We saw this coming a couple years ago, but last year and this year has really been terrible."

Farmers of all types of specialty crops, from almonds to roses, have seen the immigrant labor supply they depend on dry up over the past year. Increased border security and competition from other industries are driving migrant laborers out of the fields, farmers say.

Earlier this year, many farmers were optimistic about finding a solution in the Agricultural Job Opportunity, Benefits and Security Act, or AgJobs. The bill, proposed by Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), would allow undocumented agricultural workers already in the United States to become legal permanent residents and would streamline the current guest-worker program. In March and September, hundreds of growers traveled to the Capitol to lobby for the bill.

But deep divisions within the Republican Party have stalled immigration reform. Although legislation to build a 700-mile fence along the border passed the House and Senate, the AgJobs proposal has languished.

As the border tightens, Mexican workers who once spent part of each year in American fields without a work permit fear that if they go back to Mexico, they will be trapped behind the border, farmers say. Instead, they stay in the United States, taking year-round jobs that pay more and are less backbreaking than farm work, such as cleaning hotels or working in construction in cities on the Gulf Coast devastated by last year's hurricanes.

"Frequently you hear, especially from California, complaints about construction companies actually recruiting workers from the sides of the fields," said Craig Regelbrugge, co-chair of the Agriculture Coalition for Immigration Reform. Other industries that depend on immigrant labor, such as landscaping and construction, "are also concerned about the overall availability of labor given demographic trends," he said, adding: "But agriculture is the warning sign, if you will, of structural changes in the economy."

The problem is now reaching crisis proportions, food growers say. As much as 30 percent of the year's pear crop was lost in Northern California, growers estimate. More than one-third of Florida's Valencia orange crop went unharvested, Regelbrugge said. In New York, apples are rotting on the trees, because workers who once picked the fruit have fled frequent raids by Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents, said Maureen Marshall, an apple grower in Elba.

Michael Keegan, a spokesman for the federal agency, said he could not confirm any specific targets for raids. But he said it now takes a more proactive approach to work-site enforcement, seeking to build criminal cases against employers instead of issuing fines. The agency focuses work-site raids on "critical infrastructure," he said, such as airports and chemical plants, including food processing facilities.

Critics say increased wages would keep workers in the fields. Growers contend that their wages, often minimum wage plus a piece rate, are as high as they can pay and still remain profitable. Ricchiuti echoed many growers when he said local people "don't want to do the work at any price."

Farmers also contend that an existing guest-worker program is not usable. Although some industries, such as Maryland crab pickers, rely on the H-2B program to provide foreign labor, farmers argue that the equivalent program for agriculture, known as H-2A, is too complex and has onerous requirements, such as providing housing for workers. Nationwide, only 2 percent of agricultural workers use H-2A visas, Regelbrugge said.

"We explored [H-2A], and it was so cumbersome, it just would not meet our needs," said Ricchiuti of P-R Farms, who grows apples, nectarines, nuts and grapes in California's fertile San Joaquin Valley. "It's so specific; you agree to hire so many people at this time. What if the season is two weeks late? I have to have work for them. Or pay them to do nothing."

Some farmers said they have invested in machines to take the place of workers, though some tasks, such as picking soft fruit, cannot be mechanized.

DOJ_NMG_0074599

Others are worrying about credit. In August, Tom Brown, president and chief executive of Fresno Madera Farm Credit bank in California, testified at an immigration forum hosted by Rep. George Radanovich (R-Calif.) that he was worried about the impact of the labor shortage on farmers' ability to repay loans.

Some food growers, who as a group tend to vote Republican, now find themselves fighting hardest against leaders in their own party.

"So many of the farmers here are conservative, but they're finding themselves kind of at odds, not so much with Republicans in this area but with Republicans on the East Coast who have no idea what's going on in the San Joaquin Valley and California," said Daniel Jackson, a California fruit grower. "Something could happen in Washington, D.C., tomorrow, and all the farmers in the San Joaquin Valley would be out of work."

Ricchiuti has a framed photo of President Bush and first lady Laura Bush on his office wall and a pile of "Re-Elect Arnold" signs supporting Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R-Calif.) at his processing plant. But he grew agitated when he talked about the GOP's handling of immigration.

"What's wrong with the Republican leadership?" he demanded. "They control the House and the Senate. I would have thought it would be a slam-dunk.

"Certain Republicans are very closed-minded," he continued. "They're prejudiced, and they're concerned about people taking their jobs. Well, you know what? You won't do those jobs. You might stick your head up the grapevine once or twice, but you won't do it a third time."

Hopes for the AgJobs bill are now on hold until after the midterm elections, said Barry Bedwell, president of the California Grape and Tree Fruit League. Bedwell has made four trips already this year to Washington to lobby for immigration reform.

"Even from our best friends and allies in the San Joaquin Valley on the Republican side, they were saying, yes, they understand. But they were trying to explain the political reality of an election year," he said. "Boy, I will be happy to get by the election, where we can start talking reason."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Disaffected Republicans May Sit Out Vote Following Foley Scandal (AFP-Y)

By Charlotte Raab

AFP, October 3, 2006

A roiling sex scandal that led to the resignation of a prominent Republican lawmaker has left the party fearing conservative voters may sit out next month's crucial midterm elections, as President George W. Bush said he was "disgusted" by the affair.

Bush said he supported House Speaker Dennis Hastert's call for a law enforcement probe into the e-mails and text messages sent by US Representative Mark Foley to young, male congressional pages.

"I was dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior," Bush said during a visit at an elementary school in Stockton, California.

The shocking revelations that the veteran Republican lawmaker sexually harassed underage congressional aides before resigning in disgrace last week could leave many conservatives feeling like they might not want to go to the polls, and could be the tipping point that returns control of Congress to opposition.

Conservative voters, who often are moved to turn out in force at the polls to vote on "values issues" such as abortion and banning gay marriage, reportedly are disgusted by the news.

Joe Negron, chosen by Florida's Republican leaders to replace Foley on the ballot, conceded that it might be an uphill fight to hold onto voters in his district, although he is holding out hope that he can convince voters to stick with his party.

"Everyone in this district is shocked and angered by what happened," Negron said.

"The system needs to work: let the chips fall where they may. If people knew about this in Congress and didn't take appropriate steps, they need to be held accountable," he told Fox television.

"I'm asking voters to give me a chance."

DOJ_NMG_0074600

The conservative Washington Times newspaper on Tuesday said Dennis Hastert, the speaker of the House of Representatives should follow Foley's lead and relinquish his post for not being more proactive in preventing and punishing the lawmaker's misbehavior.

"Resign, Mr Speaker," blared The Times, saying Hastert "dissembled, to put it charitably," before acknowledging that he had known for months that Foley had sent inappropriate e-mails to underage male aides.

"Either he was grossly negligent ... or he deliberately looked the other way," the daily charged.

Foley, a Republican who represents parts of tony Palm Beach county in Florida, abruptly resigned his seat Friday amid questions surrounding his sexually explicit e-mails to a former male page.

His resignation further jeopardizes an already endangered Republican majority in Congress, with Democrats favored to win the lion's share of House seats in November's midterm election according to many polls.

Foley had been favored to win reelection against Democratic challenger Tim Mahoney in the November 7 legislative contest.

He was known in Congress as a tireless champion of children's rights, especially against abuse and sexual predators. He co-chaired the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children and recently introduced legislation to crack down on Internet child pornography sites.

Mahoney, who now is expected to coast to victory, also has expressed moral outrage since the allegations were made known.

"I think that his admission disqualifies him from public office," he told US television Tuesday.

Democratic leaders in Washington were also quick to jump on the scandal as a symbol of moral and ethical shortcomings in the Republican leadership.

"Speaker Hastert again failed to answer the question that every mother and father in America is asking: how could Republican Leaders choose partisan politics over protecting children?

Meanwhile, several top Republicans were running for cover.

House majority leader John Boehner suggested that his hands were clean, since oversight of the page program fell to Hastert.

"My position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility," he told an Ohio television station.

But conservative US senator John Cornyn said it would be unjust if Republicans paid a price for Foley's misbehavior.

"No one has ever suggested with any of the scandals in the past that they somehow should be made a political football and blame an entire political party for the acts of an individual person," he said Tuesday.

"I think what's an overreach is to somehow try to blame Republicans in general or to blame those who did not know about the content of these e-mails for somehow knowingly allowing this to happen."

Foley Scandal Is The Nail In The GOP Coffin (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, October 4, 2006

In a curious way, the former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) scandal will be to the Republican congressional leadership what the Monica Lewinsky imbroglio was to the Clinton presidency.

After all the boring scandals — Whitewater, Hillary's investments, Paula Jones, Travelgate, the FBI files, the Rose Law Firm's billing records — the Lewinsky scandal seared into everyone's consciousness. Those who failed to read the many volumes of Whitewater documents published by The Wall Street Journal or who despaired of following the paper trail that led to the Travel Office firings could easily grasp the simple facts of Clinton's dalliance with Monica. Nothing complicated. Nothing subtle. Easy to understand. And so the Clintonian penchant for scandal became universally known and has been an enduring part of his legacy.

Now, after the lobbyist travel scandal and the Abramoff favors for legislators and the growth of earmarking and the financial scandals that have faced Reps. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), Bob Ney

DOJ_NMG_0074601

(R-Ohio) and a host of others, there is finally a simple sex scandal for everyone to focus upon. Nothing complicated about this one either.

It is not that the voters believe that all congressmen are child molesters, nor is it the details of what Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) knew, and when he knew it, that makes this scandal so important. Its centrality stems from the sheer arrogance and hypocrisy it demonstrates both on the part of Foley himself and his colleagues who hushed up the affair until it burst onto the public stage.

One more pious member of the Moral Majority, one more legislator who makes a career out of fighting for "values" and crusading to protect children turns out to be a hypocrite and an abuser himself!

One more congressman, a sponsor of legislation to help children, a member of the caucus on abused and exploited children, has abused and exploited them himself. The gap between what Foley professes and what Foley did is so huge that you can sink the entire Republican majority in both houses into the gap.

And once again, the arrogant leaders of the Congress circled the wagons and looked the other way to avoid investigating or even recognizing the child abuser in their midst.

The details don't matter much. Who really cares if Hastert only knew that Foley had asked a kid for his photograph or if he knew more about the e-mails that were flying around. And who cares if the Democrats had their own part in the scandal by taking no action and protecting a colleague until right before the election?

None of that really matters.

What is important is that all of the venality and hypocrisy, so evident when congressmen hire their wives or freeload on trips paid for by lobbyists or cram the budget with unjustified earmarks or encourage their sons and daughters to become highly paid lobbyists cashing in on their special access — all of those misdeeds, have suddenly acquired a poster boy: Rep. Foley!

Rep.Tom Delay's (R-Texas) misdeeds are far too boring, in the same way that Whitewater was boring. The paper trail is hard to follow and the accusations murky.

But there is nothing murky about what Foley did and the voters will find the story interesting and easy to follow. Despite this, however, it is not Foley who is sinking his party. Its own misdeeds have already sunk it.

Bill and Monica. Foley and the pages. What we are watching now is the vindication of Karl Marx' comment that history repeats itself — the first time as tragedy, the second time as farce.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race."

GOP Faces 'Inconvenient Truth' (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

Chicago Tribune, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republicans consolidated power in the George W. Bush era by building a foundation based largely on the pillars of moral clarity and accountability.

Now comes what Al Gore might call an "inconvenient truth." The scandal over alleged sexually predatory behavior that triggered the resignation of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) undermines those core GOP strengths, and with the approaching midterm elections, at the worst possible time, even prompting some calls from prominent conservatives Tuesday for the resignation of House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for his handling of the matter.

Republicans in power find themselves in a vise, squeezed of course by newly energized Democrats, but perhaps more important by their most fervent supporters on the right, the very voters who cast their ballot based on social issues.

It was those voters—stoked brilliantly by Karl Rove's surgical support for amendments to ban gay marriage in swing states, among other strategies—who provided Bush with the bare majority he needed for a second term, and that Republicans needed to maintain control of the House and Senate. Whether the GOP can count on those voters to show up in November is now in some doubt.

Economic conservatives had sounded their own complaints about the Republican regime earlier, angered by record congressional spending. Some foreign policy conservatives oppose the war in Iraq as an unwise—and un-conservative—attempt to remake the world. So in several significant ways, the coalition that had once seemed so solid in fact had been cracking for the last several years.

DOJ_NMG_0074602

And Washington now seems to again be engaging in its tribal ritual of assigning blame. On the plank for the moment is Hastert, who is being accused of inattention at best for his reaction to the Foley mess, and trying to cover up a scandal at worst. The Washington Times, whose editorial page was an intellectual midwife to the Republican revolution of 1994, called Tuesday for Hastert to resign. Also facing scrutiny are House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), who was aware of the Foley emails months ago, and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), one of the House members in charge of the page program.

The intensity of the focus on Foley has served to blunt one of the few positive periods that the Republicans have enjoyed in this election season. The president's aggressive post-Labor Day push on fighting terrorism, coupled with the sharp drop in gasoline prices, had seemed to halt a long slow slide. The Foley controversy now dramatically and negatively reshapes the race for Republicans, leaving them with diminishing hopes of maintaining control of the House chamber that they so famously wrested from Democrats in the midterm elections of 1994.

Hastert moved quickly over the weekend to call for a Justice Department investigation, which had the benefit of high-mindedness but also raised the prospect that the probe would not be finished by Election Day and would leave troubling questions hanging.

Bush offered his support for the Speaker during an appearance in California on Tuesday, reminding Americans of Hastert's prior life as a teacher and coach as measures of Hastert's concern for the well-being of children. The speaker clearly needed to hear the strong backing of the president in the face of mounting calls for his ouster.

Even that backing might not be enough. "There will be dramatic change," said one Republican consultant with ties to some of the House leadership. "It will either be imposed by a new set of leaders in the party or it will be imposed by the voters.

"The political environment today is such that Republicans feel defeated, all of America feels defeated and under siege at this point," he added. "You don't feel in control of your life. I think Republicans have felt the burden especially heavily because this is their president and their Congress. There hasn't been a lot of good news."

Indeed, there is an increasingly gallows view among Republicans about what November will bring. As several noted, things were not going well even before the news of Foley's salacious electronic messages. Congress essentially closed up shop for the term without major accomplishments on issues that voters said they cared deeply about, such as immigration.

The energy that brought the Republicans to power in 1994 seems to have given way to near exhaustion. And now, one of the central issues that solidified their power—a perception of holding the moral high ground—has been turned inside out.

"There is just a general disgust across the board," said one Republican lobbyist who is also heavily involved in campaign fundraising. "We hold huge amounts of fundraisers for members of Congress, and they all come by and tell us how they will maintain control of the House. But not one person in the last four or five or six months has said we are going to win because we have better ideas than the Democrats. I just think they have lost their way."

Hastert Faces Intense Pressure As Foley Mess Roils Republicans (WSJ)

By David Rogers And John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

With Republicans' woes deepening, House Speaker Dennis Hastert is holding fast against calls for him to resign over the congressional-page scandal. But there appears to be a real chance that the Illinois Republican could step down after next month's election even if his party retains power.

A new poll shows voter support for the party slipping, and Mr. Hastert and his divided leadership face immense pressure to respond more emphatically to the stream of revelations about former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit cyber-communications with teenage former pages.

"We have to do something different, more dramatic," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.). "This is a political mess and what we've done so far is not working. Somebody has to take responsibility for this. It is on our watch."

At a news conference yesterday evening in West Palm Beach, Fla., Mr. Foley's attorney announced that the former lawmaker is gay and said Mr. Foley, a Catholic who attended Catholic schools, had been molested between the ages of 13 and 15 by a clergyman. But the lawyer, David Roth, said his client had never engaged in physical sexual relations with a minor despite the nature of his online contacts.

DOJ_NMG_0074603

The pattern followed by Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican who resigned abruptly on Friday, was to pursue pages after they had ended their tenure at the Capitol. ABC News, for example, posted new communications yesterday in which Mr. Foley appears to have interrupted a vote on the House floor in 2003 to engage in Internet sex with a teenager who was still in high school but no longer a page.

The Foley news is just the latest in a hailstorm of unfavorable publicity that has hit the Republicans and President Bush in recent weeks, costing the party the initiative at a critical point in the midterm-election campaign. Party leaders had hoped to run the final weeks of the campaign with the spotlight on what they consider their strength: battling terrorists. Instead, they are playing defense on everything from the sex scandal to dispiriting reports about Iraq.

The damage was evident in a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, showing that, by 41% to 18%, Americans say that news they "have seen and heard over the past few weeks" has made them less favorable toward continued Republican control of Congress. By 34%-23% they called themselves more favorably inclined toward Democratic control. The survey, conducted last weekend, also shows a decline in Mr. Bush's job-approval rating to 39% from 42% earlier this month.

With the elections just over a month away, on Nov. 7, there is mounting pressure on Republican House leaders to try to limit fallout from the Foley scandal. In an interview late yesterday, Mr. Hastert said he would be willing to resign if he thought it would help the party but isn't convinced this is the case. "If I thought it would help the party, I would consider it, but I think just the opposite," he said.

For Mr. Hastert and other House leaders, it is a Hobson's choice. Do they risk allowing the scandal to fester without a top-level official taking responsibility, or do they appease critics with a high-profile resignation that could invite "chaos," as Mr. Hastert put it. Any abrupt departure could also disrupt the rest of the leadership in the final weeks of the campaign. And one of the Republicans' weaknesses is that they have no clear transition figure.

Mr. Hastert and other leaders don't have as much control over their party as when former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R., Texas) helped keep the troops in line. Conservative social activists are openly upset by Mr. Foley's actions -- and the leadership's response. "The fact that they just walked away from this, it sounds like they were trying to protect one of their own members rather than these young boys," activist Richard A. Viguerie said on Fox News yesterday, in calling for Mr. Hastert to step down.

Meanwhile, a new crop of conservatives could seize the moment to push the party to do more to cut government spending, for example. Among this group, Rep. John Shadegg (R., Ariz.) last night defended Mr. Hastert, saying he should not be "railroaded out of office." Another, Rep. Mike Pence (R., Ind.) has been quieter.

If the party were to lose control of the House, it is expected that Mr. Hastert would step out of the leadership. He said yesterday that if Republicans retain power, it is still his intention to run for speaker in the next Congress but "you have to count the votes." Close associates of Mr. Hastert don't rule out that, weary of the fray, he could opt to step down after Nov. 7 even if his party keeps its House majority.

The damage from the scandal complicates the picture because the office of the speaker is elected by the full House. If Republicans lose seats, any small block of conservatives unhappy with the party's leadership would gain more say in deciding who is speaker.

Mr. Bush came to the speaker's defense yesterday: "I know Denny Hastert... I know that he wants all the facts to come out," the president said. And stung by a "Resign, Mr. Speaker" editorial in the conservative Washington Times, which described his performance as "inept," Mr. Hastert spent the day on radio talks shows trying to tamp down the anger against him.

Mr. Hastert's aides trumpeted a letter last night from Pat Robertson's Christian Coalition supporting their boss. And appearing with conservative radio-show host Rush Limbaugh, Mr. Hastert sought to shift blame to Democrats, saying the opposition is orchestrating the leaks of explicit instant messages between Mr. Foley and former pages.

"We have a story to tell, and the Democrats have -- in my view have -- put this thing forward to try to block us from telling the story. They're trying to put us on defense," Mr. Hastert said.

But the ABC News reporter who broke the original story yesterday said some of the pages themselves stepped forward with some of the most damaging emails. (See related article9).

The page program offers teenagers academic and work experience in Congress. The pages, who stay one or two semesters and live in a dorm, run errands and help deliver documents, among other things. Republicans have discussed ending the program entirely or appointing a high-profile attorney to review the situation.

"We have to act quickly," said House Rules Committee Chairman Davie Dreier (R., Calif.), a Hastert confidant. And the speaker said he wants to create a blue-ribbon panel to assess the situation and what more could be done to better protect those in the program both during their participation and after they leave Washington.

"When they leave Washington we don't have much control over it," Mr. Hastert said. "We're trying to put something together that would help."

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has said it is investigating the Foley case, but it isn't clear what kind of legal threat he might face, if any. An FBI official familiar with the Foley investigation said three separate cyber-crime units looked at emails in July and found no evidence of broken laws. "They were vanilla," the official said. Agents are looking to see if new emails that have surfaced explicitly suggested meetings with the juveniles crossing state lines for sex. Other potential laws include exchanging of pornographic material with minors. "Right now, we still don't know what, if any, federal statutes have been broken," the official said.

Still, the graphic nature of the instant messages adds to their impact on voters. "This isn't a lobbyist moving money around for favors. This is pretty easy to understand what's going on here," said one Republican leadership aide. And Mr. Hastert says he has felt blind-sided by the recent revelations, saying that the sexual content goes far beyond the "red flag" Foley e-mail his office became aware of last fall, which requested a page's photo but included no overt sexual advances.

Nonetheless, the speaker suffered from the fact that he went home to his farm in Illinois on Friday night as the scandal was breaking. It wasn't until Saturday night that the leadership produced a united statement on the crisis, and associates worry the press-shy speaker will be typecast as a Washington version of Cardinal Bernard Law, who was faulted for not doing more to address child abuse by priests in the Boston Archdiocese.

As speaker, Mr. Hastert is most responsible for the page program, and when parents of a Louisiana teenager were upset by an August 2005 Foley e-mail to their son, a former page, the complaint was taken to Mr. Hastert's staff last fall. But Mr. Hastert says he wasn't fully informed by his aides until recently, and even now he often mistakenly speaks of the issue being handled by the House Page Board, when in fact most of the six member panel were excluded from knowing of the complaint.

Instead, Rep. John Shimkus (R., Ill.), the board's chairman and a Hastert ally, chose to deal with the issue without informing Democrats and simply going to Mr. Foley directly and warning him to stop. Mr. Foley, whose political committees have contributed more than $700,000 to fellow Republicans in the past five elections, had some modest clout in the House. But the expedited, discreet handling of the affair most illustrates fears that if the complaint became public, it could hurt Mr. Foley and the party by reawakening public speculation about his being gay. Mr. Foley and party leaders were concerned such a revelation could cost him the support of voters.

"It was commonly known that Mark was gay," said Rep. LaHood. And Rep, Barney Frank, an openly gay Democrat from Massachusetts, said the whole handling of the initial complaint appeared driven by Mr. Foley's political situation. "Knowing as they did that Mark was gay -- and was conflicted about how to handle it -- made this more sensitive politically," Mr. Frank said.

Beyond the Foley scandal, the latest Journal/NBC poll suggests even more problems for Republicans' campaign positions, showing the signs of momentum that the party had enjoyed in early September -- from the president's political offensive calling voters' attention to the broader war on terrorism -- have halted.

The poll was conducted over the weekend amid a double-barreled dose of bad news for Mr. Bush's party, from disclosures about Mr. Foley to questions about progress in Iraq. The survey didn't ask specifically about the sex scandal or recent assessments of the war.

A 46% plurality of Americans now say the war in Iraq is hurting the nation's ability to win the fight against terrorism. That is up from 32% earlier this month when Americans were nearly evenly split on whether the war is helping, hurting or not making a difference in fighting terrorism.

"No incumbent party wants to run an election on these sorts of issues," says Bill McInturff, a Republican pollster who helps conduct the Journal/NBC survey. Mr. McInturff predicted a renewed Republican effort to focus on terrorism. But Democratic counterpart Peter Hart calls it "a moment of crystallization" in the battle to determine whether the Republicans keep the House and Senate for the last two years of Mr. Bush's term. The survey of 805 registered voters, conducted Sept. 30-Oct. 2, has a margin for error of 3.5 percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0074605

The survey shows Democrats -- who need a net gain of 15 House seats and six Senate seats to recapture control of Capitol Hill -- holding a nine-percentage-point edge, 48%-39%, on the question of which party voters want to control Congress after the election. That is unchanged from early this month.

The Foley matter comes as voters have already been souring on incumbents in general, and the Republican-led Congress in particular. In the poll, voters, by 45%-38%, said it is time to give a new person a chance rather than re-elect their incumbent member of Congress; in early September, voters split on that question.

By 57%-37%, voters say America's safety from terrorism doesn't depend on success in Iraq, which has been a central assertion of Mr. Bush and Republican congressional candidates. And by 61%-29%, voters say Iraq is now in a state of civil war -- a conclusion the White House has tried to forestall in the belief it would further erode support for Mr. Bush's policy there. Even Republicans, by 47%-39%, share that assessment.

The poll also contains signs that the congressional Republican strategy of "localizing" elections to take the spotlight off a politically weakened Mr. Bush isn't working. Fully two-thirds of voters now say their decision for Congress will be a signal for the Bush administration-with 39% signaling opposition and 28% signaling support. In April, only about half of Americans called their vote a signal for the administration.

The poll's best news for Republicans is what Mr. McInturff calls a "lessening of economic tension and pressure" as gasoline prices have fallen and the stock market has flourished. Voters now split, at 22% apiece, on whether the economy will get better or worse over the next year. In June a 40% plurality of voters predicted the economy would get worse.

Foley Case Shakes GOP (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The unfolding Capitol Hill sex scandal has upended the political world only five weeks before the midterm elections, escalating GOP worries that the party will lose control of one or both chambers of Congress.

Most immediately, Republicans have been plunged into a wrenching debate about whether heads need to roll in order to persuade voters that they are taking the case of former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) — who sent explicit messages to male congressional pages — seriously.

Republicans fear that the case could demoralize conservative supporters and undercut the party's claim to be a defender of morality.

As events continued to unfold Tuesday, Foley's lawyer said in a news conference that the lawmaker, who resigned Friday, had been molested by a clergyman when he was a boy. The lawyer also said that Foley was gay but denied that Foley ever had "inappropriate sexual contact with any minor."

President Bush — campaigning for Republicans in California — said he was "disgusted" and "dismayed" by the Foley case, which already seemed to be having an effect on voters.

A Wall Street Journal survey released Tuesday found that two issues — the House sex scandal and the war in Iraq — had made Americans less favorable toward continued GOP control of Congress. It also showed a decline in Bush's job approval rating to 39% from 42% earlier this month.

Some conservatives are calling for J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to resign as speaker of the House, charging that he failed late last year to adequately investigate a complaint about Foley that at the time might have brought his behavior to light.

But other Republicans rallied behind Hastert on Tuesday, and warned that a leadership upheaval would make matters worse.

Hastert, who was elevated to his post during the turmoil caused by the sex scandal involving President Clinton, on Tuesday shrugged off calls to quit. "I'm not going to do that," he said during an appearance on conservative commentator Rush Limbaugh's radio show.

DOJ_NMG_0074606

Bush did not answer reporters' questions about whether Hastert should resign. But he said, "I'm confident he will provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement" looking into whether Foley committed any crimes.

The question of how the GOP should respond to the revelations is particularly vexing for religious conservative leaders who are straddling their roles as crucial electoral allies of the party and representatives of a constituency undoubtedly outraged by the revelations.

"You have to keep in mind that the leaders of the Christian conservative groups … have folks back home who are going to be asking some tough questions," said Jim Guth, a political scientist at Furman University in South Carolina who specializes in religion and politics. "And if they don't take action, they are going to suffer some consequences in their own constituency."

For Democrats, the scandal has provided an opening to revive a campaign theme that seemed to have fallen flat earlier this year: their claim that the GOP has brought a culture of corruption to Washington.

Still, political strategists warn that Democrats have to be careful not to overplay their hand — especially since their party has had its own scandals, such as a bribery investigation of Rep. William J. Jefferson of Louisiana.

"I'm not convinced that Democrats are going to be able to paint [the corruption-in-Washington theme] as a Republican problem," GOP pollster Whit Ayres said.

The Foley case and questions about how House GOP leaders handled it compounded problems that were already bedeviling Republicans as they struggled to keep control of the House and Senate. Democrats need to pick up a net 15 seats to gain control of the House, and six seats to win a Senate majority.

"This is very hurtful for Republicans; there is no other way to put it," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.).

Noting that the GOP's fortunes had seemed on the upswing as Bush spent much of September focusing on the threat of global terrorism, LaHood added, "This decimates all the things we've been doing."

Across the country in recent days, especially in competitive House races, Democratic candidates have lambasted GOP incumbents for their ties to Foley — and Republicans have tried to distance themselves from the scandal.

In Pennsylvania, Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach canceled a Monday fundraiser with Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, one of the GOP leaders who has been criticized for his response to early warnings of Foley's misconduct. Gerlach also returned donations from Foley.

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) did the same. But her Democratic challenger, state Atty. Gen. Patricia Madrid, sought to keep the spotlight on the story, calling on Wilson to join those pushing for Hastert's resignation.

A heated debate over Hastert's status continued among conservative activists, who were divided over whether it would help or hurt the GOP for him to step down.

Richard A. Viguerie, a pioneer in direct-mail fundraising for conservative causes, was among those calling for Hastert to resign. He charged that the speaker and others were not aggressive enough last year in pursuing a complaint about the e-mails Foley sent to a former page, which the leaders recently characterized as "overly friendly."

The e-mails were not sexually suggestive, but Viguerie said the leadership's decision to simply warn Foley to cease communication with the page was "only the most recent example of Republican House leaders doing whatever it takes to hold onto power."

The Washington Times, a leading conservative newspaper, gained wide attention in Washington on Tuesday with an editorial urging Hastert to quit as speaker.

Paul M. Weyrich, a conservative strategist who helped to found the Moral Majority, also was sharply critical of Hastert and said he believed the speaker and other GOP leaders should give up their posts because of their handling of the Foley case.

Weyrich said that although he believed Hastert's explanation that he was unaware of the sexually explicit messages Foley sent to pages that have surfaced in the last week, he still wondered why the speaker had not dug deeper when he dealt with the initial complaint late last year.

"That's the real question, and that's what has the movement people very angry," he said.

But there was no consensus among conservative leaders that Hastert or other House GOP leaders should step down.

Limbaugh, during his show Tuesday, charged that much of the furor over Hastert was fueled by Democrats who wanted "to suppress conservative turnout" in November.

DOJ_NMG_0074607

Other prominent conservative voices, including Focus on the Family and the Wall Street Journal editorial page, rejected the idea that any GOP leader should resign.

The Arlington Group, a coalition of leading social conservative groups, backed away Tuesday from issuing a tough statement urging changes in the leadership.

Weyrich said that after a conference call among him and other members of the group's executive committee Monday, he produced a draft statement that called for the resignation "of anyone involved" in handling the Foley case, including Hastert and Boehner.

But after the draft was reviewed by the seven-member executive committee, the final statement did not directly criticize the response of any House leader or call for any to quit.

The statement asserted that House Republicans may have failed to sufficiently investigate Foley because they feared "a backlash from the radical gay rights movement."

*

janet.hook@latimes.com
ronald.brownstein@latimes.com

*

Begin text of infobox

Chronology

Sometime in 2003 — Former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) has a sexual conversation with a former House page via a computer instant-messaging program.

May 8, 2003 — The New Times of Broward-Palm Beach writes that Foley, favored to win the GOP nomination to succeed retiring Sen. Bob Graham in Florida, is gay.

May 22, 2003 — Foley tells several reporters in a conference call that speculation that he is gay is "revolting" and "unforgivable," and he begs for privacy.

Sept. 5, 2003 — Foley drops out of the race, citing his father's cancer.

Aug. 30, 2005 — A different page contacts the office of Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) with texts of e-mail exchanges with Foley. In one, Foley asks the former page for a photo of himself.

Shortly thereafter, Alexander's chief of staff contacts the office of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and asks for guidance to prevent contact between Foley and the ex-page. Hastert's staff contacts the then-House clerk, Jeff Trandahl, whose office runs the page program. Alexander's chief of staff declines to show Trandahl the e-mail, saying the boy's parents wish to keep the matter private. Trandahl is told the message is "overly friendly" but not sexual.

Trandahl and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chair of the board that oversees the page program, tell Foley to have no further contact with the former page. Foley denies any impropriety.

November 2005 — Reporters from the St. Petersburg Times and the Miami Herald obtain copies of the e-mail exchange that led Shimkus and Trandahl to caution Foley, but do not write stories because the former page and his family refuse to go public.

Spring 2006 — After hearing about the 2005 e-mails, prominent Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) expresses concern to Hastert. Hastert says later that he does not recall the conversation, but does not deny it took place.

Sept. 24, 2006 — The blog http://www.stopsexpredators.blogspot.com posts four of Foley's 2005 e-mails.

Sept. 28, 2006 — ABC News posts a story about the 2005 e-mail messages on its website.

Sept. 29, 2006 — ABC News obtains the sexually explicit instant-message exchange from 2003 and asks Foley to comment. Within hours, he resigns.

Oct. 2, 2006 — In a statement, Foley says he has been admitted into a program for alcoholism and other problems. ABC News releases a new message exchange in which Foley appears to be setting up a rendezvous with a former page.

Oct. 3, 2006 — Some conservatives and the editorial page of the Washington Times call for Hastert to step down; other conservatives, President Bush and Republican members of Congress rally behind him.

DOJ_NMG_0074608

In a statement issued by his lawyer, Foley says that he is gay and that he was molested by a clergyman as a teen, and denies having engaged in inappropriate activities with a minor.

— Maura Reynolds

Los Angeles Times

Bush In Favor Of Foley Investigation (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 3, 2006

President Bush said Tuesday he was "dismayed and shocked" at disgraced lawmaker Mark Foley's behavior and supports House Speaker Dennis Hastert's call for a full investigation.

"This investigation should be thorough and any violation of the law should be prosecuted," Bush said while campaigning for Republican lawmakers in California.

Some, including a Washington newspaper, have called for Hastert to resign, but Bush expressed confidence in the speaker's ability to resolve the matter, calling him a "father, teacher, coach."

"I know Denny Hastert. I meet with him a lot. He is a father, teacher, coach who cares about the children of this country," Bush said. "I know that he wants all the facts to come out."

Bush took no questions. And as he stepped toward his motorcade, the president ignored a shouted question directly asking whether Hastert should resign.

The president spoke after Hastert brushed aside any suggestion of resignation Tuesday as House Republican leaders struggled to contain the fallout from an election-year scandal involving sexually explicit messages from the disgraced former Florida Republican lawmaker to underage male pages.

"I know that he wants all the facts to come out and he wants to ensure that these children up there on Capitol Hill are protected," the president said. "I'm confident he will provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement in this investigation."

"I was dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior," Bush told reporters.

"I was disgusted by the revelations and disappointed that he would violate the trust of the citizens who placed him in office," Bush said. "Families have every right to expect that when they send their children to be a congressional page in Washington that those children will be safe."

The president spoke in a courtyard of the George W. Bush Elementary School. Inside, the president visited young children practicing their reading in the school library named after his wife, Laura. The school has 858 students in grades kindergarten through seventh grade.

Bush's comments on the Foley scandal came as he also addressed a string of deadly attacks in schools in the past week. He said Americans have a responsibility to protect their children.

"Our school children should never fear their safety when they enter into a classroom," the president said.

"Laura and I were saddened and deeply concerned, like a lot of citizens around the country, about the school shootings that took place in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Wisconsin. We grieve with the parents and we share the concerns of those who worry about safety in schools," Bush said.

On Monday night, the White House announced a conference of education and law enforcement experts on how the federal government might help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath. No date has been set and it was unclear whether Bush would attend.

Hastert Fights To Save His Job In Page Scandal (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — Backed by measured words of support from President Bush, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert opened an intense drive on Tuesday to hold on to his post, but behind the scenes senior Republicans weighed whether he could survive the scandal surrounding former Representative Mark Foley.

DOJ_NMG_0074609

Among the options being considered by senior Republicans is for Mr. Hastert to announce that he will stay on as speaker through this year but not seek re-election to the post assuming Republicans retain control of the House, said people on and off Capitol Hill who were involved in the discussions. They said the advantage of such a step would be to postpone a disruptive leadership fight until after Election Day.

Mr. Hastert, who stayed on as speaker after 2004 at the urging of Mr. Bush, has been involved in some of the discussions about how to proceed, but it was not clear how seriously he was considering not seeking the speakership next year, said the Republicans, who asked not to be named because they were discussing internal deliberations. Mr. Hastert returned home to Illinois on Tuesday.

In a round of interviews with right-leaning radio shows after the conservative editorial page of The Washington Times called Tuesday for his resignation, Mr. Hastert vowed he would not quit. He accused political opponents of stoking the furor over Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, in an effort to influence the coming elections and strip Republicans of Congressional control.

"If they get to me, it looks like they could affect our election as well," Mr. Hastert said in an interview on Rush Limbaugh's radio show.

But across Washington, Republicans debated whether the party could begin putting the matter behind it without some gesture to acknowledge the political uproar and demands for accountability, including changes to the House leadership.

At a news conference in West Palm Beach, Fla., Mr. Foley's lawyer, David Roth, acknowledged publicly for the first time that Mr. Foley is gay. Mr. Roth also said that the congressman, who resigned Friday after being confronted with sexually explicit messages he had sent to teenage Congressional pages, had been molested from ages 13 to 15 by a clergyman. Mr. Roth said Mr. Foley had not had any sexual contact with minors. [Page A26.]

Mr. Bush, in his first public comments on the matter, spoke outside a school in California, supporting Mr. Hastert's call for a full investigation and saying he was confident that Mr. Hastert would "provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement in this investigation."

"He is a father, teacher, coach, who cares about the children of this country," Mr. Bush said of Mr. Hastert, a former high school teacher and wrestling coach from Illinois. "I know that he wants all the facts to come out, and he wants to ensure that these children up there on Capitol Hill are protected."

Though Mr. Bush stopped short of saying explicitly that he wanted Mr. Hastert to keep his job, White House officials said the president wanted to return the loyalty Mr. Hastert had shown the administration. But they said the White House was resigned to more political damage as the Foley case played out no matter what Mr. Bush and the House leadership might do or say.

Republican lawmakers said privately that Mr. Hastert's fate would ride on developments in the coming days. There appeared to be no organized effort now to push for the speaker's ouster, and in public many backed Mr. Hastert, saying the full facts of the case were not yet known.

"I think it is a rush to judgment to say that he should step down," said Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York.

But even as Mr. Hastert pushed back against criticism that he had failed to act assertively enough to deal with Mr. Foley after an initial report of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley and a page, there were signs of continued tension within the House leadership team.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, said in a radio interview on Tuesday that he discussed Mr. Foley's communication with a page with Mr. Hastert last spring, joining Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York in insisting they had raised the matter directly with Mr. Hastert. Mr. Hastert has said he had no recollection of the Foley matter before it exploded last week.

Mr. Boehner, who said earlier that he was not sure he had discussed Mr. Foley with the speaker, said resolving the matter was Mr. Hastert's responsibility.

"I believe I told the speaker and he told me it has been taken care of," Mr. Boehner told a Cincinnati radio station. "In my position, it is in his corner, it is his responsibility."

Later Tuesday, Mr. Boehner sent a letter in support of Mr. Hastert to The Washington Times, and aides to Mr. Boehner said the majority leader was not trying to undercut the speaker. But his comments fed an impression that House leaders were trying to make certain they were not blamed for the consequences of the Foley case.

DOJ_NMG_0074610

Federal investigators who have interviewed several former pages have unearthed instances of conduct by Mr. Foley that will almost certainly lead to a full criminal investigation, including grand jury testimony, to determine whether the former lawmaker violated federal sex crime laws, government officials briefed on the matter said Tuesday. They spoke on the condition that they not be named because they were discussing details of an investigation.

Prosecutors have yet to issue subpoenas or search warrants but have discussed ways to safeguard evidence in the case, the officials said, possibly issuing what are known as preservation letters, directing government agencies or private entities, like Internet providers, not to destroy any electronic data that might be relevant.

On Tuesday, ABC News disclosed a text-message conversation from April 2003 in which Mr. Foley and a page exchanged sexually explicit messages as the lawmaker waited to vote; in another exchange, Mr. Foley seemed to invite a teenage page to drink alcohol with him at his home in Washington.

Mr. Hastert's allies sought to rally rank-and-file lawmakers behind the speaker, and a letter of support was being circulated by Representative John Shadegg, Republican of Arizona, who was trying to round up signatures. The speaker's office was also trying to tamp down outrage from the right and released a letter of support from the Christian Coalition.

But other Christian conservative groups, a pivotal variable in Republican turnout for the midterm elections, condemned the lack of earlier action by Republican leaders.

"It is clear someone knew," said a statement from the Arlington Group, a coalition of major Christian conservative organizations including Focus on the Family, Concerned Women for America and the American Family Association. "We are very concerned that the whole truth concerning this episode be reported, including when House leadership or other members from either party knew of this situation."

Phil Burress, president of the Cincinnati group Citizens for Community Values, said that among Christian conservative voters, the Foley scandal "just sows more contempt for Congress as it becomes nothing more than a playground for sexual perverts."

Republicans said they were increasingly concerned that the matter would dominate the final weeks of the midterm elections. One lawmaker in a difficult race in Pennsylvania, Representative Jim Gerlach, canceled a fund-raiser with Mr. Boehner.

"The reaction's been fairly slow on this," said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman from Minnesota who served as chairman of the president's Plains States Campaign Committee in 2004. "I have not detected a clear Republican strategy for dealing with this, which is not adequate."

In regard to calls for Mr. Hastert's resignation, Mr. Weber said, "The president is not going to toss overboard a guy who has been a good, faithful ally of his."

The first television advertisement to refer directly to the page scandal was broadcast Tuesday in Minnesota, where a Democratic Congressional candidate, Patty Wetterling, is running for an open seat against a Republican state senator, Michele Bachmann. "Congressional leaders have admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman who used the Internet to molest children," the commercial declared.

Bush Backs Hastert's Handling Of Sex Scandal (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

President George W. Bush sought to end Republican disarray on Tuesday over the handling of the sex scandal involving congressman Mark Foley, defending House Speaker Dennis Hastert against calls for his resignation.

At a campaign event in California, Mr Bush said he was "disgusted by the revelations" about Mr Foley, a Florida Republican who resigned from his seat on Friday after the publication of explicit electronic correspondence with under-age male pages who worked on Capitol Hill.

Mr Hastert has come under fire for failing to investigate fully less lurid e-mails from Mr Foley that had come to his attention earlier this year. On Friday he had initially said he did not "explicitly recall the conversation" and made conflicting statements on when he had known of the concern. On Monday he said he had been "duped" by Mr Foley.

DOJ_NMG_0074611

An editorial on Tuesday in the Washington Times, a conservative newspaper, called for Mr Hastert to resign, arguing he was either "grossly negligent for not taking the red flags fully into account and ordering a swift investigation, for not even remembering the order of events leading up to last week's revelations, or he deliberately looked the other way".

Mr Hastert said he would not resign, while senior Republicans appeared to try to distance themselves from him. On Friday Tom Reynolds, the head of the House Republican congressional committee, said he had told Mr Hastert about the earlier e-mails this spring. John Boehner, the House majority leader, said in an interview quoted by AP: "I believed I talked to the speaker and he told me it had been taken care of." A few hours later, however, he sent a letter to the Wash-ington Times criticising its editorial.

In his first expression of support, Mr Bush called Mr Hastert, "a father, teacher, coach, who cares about the children of this country".

Social conservatives have been horrified at the damage to the credibility of a party that prides itself on family values. The Arlington Group of leading pro-family groups called for the resignation of any member who had acted "improperly in this matter" and called for the leadership to investigate aggressively any further rumours of misconduct.

James Thurber, the director of the centre for congressional and presidential studies at American University, said the Republican leadership's failures were part of a wider pattern of not addressing a series of ethics scandals. "They just don't get it. They try to shut things down and forget about them. Look at the leadership of the ethics committee. They have not had a single hearing on any of these lobbying issues, such as with Tom Delay [former House majority leader] or Bob Ney [a former congressman]."

Bush Backs Hastert To Keep Job (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

President Bush and other Republicans defended House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert yesterday against Democrats and conservatives who have called for his resignation over the handling of sexually explicit Internet messages former Rep. Mark Foley wrote a teenage boy who had worked as a congressional page.

"I know Denny Hastert, I meet with him a lot," Mr. Bush said yesterday. "He is a father, teacher, coach, who cares about the children of this country."

Mr. Bush said he was "disgusted" by Mr. Foley's behavior and said he supports Mr. Hastert's call for a full investigation. "I'm confident he will provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement in this investigation," he said.

Earlier this week, several conservatives called for Mr. Hastert's resignation because, they said, Mr. Hastert and other leaders did not act aggressively enough when they first learned last year of a separate set of "overly friendly" e-mails that Mr. Foley had sent to another teenage former page.

"[N]o one in the leadership, including Speaker Hastert, had any knowledge of the warped and sexually explicit instant messages that were revealed by ABC News last Friday," Majority Leader John A. Boehner wrote yesterday in a letter to The Washington Times, whose editorial board called on Mr. Hastert to step down.

"Had Speaker Hastert or anyone else in our leadership known about Mr. Foley's despicable conduct, I'm confident the speaker would have moved to expel Mr. Foley immediately and turn him over to the appropriate authorities," the Ohio Republican said.

Bush spokeswoman Dana Perino said the president has not personally spoken to Mr. Hastert in "the last few days," although the White House and the speaker's office are in "regular contact."

Asked what the president thought about the calls for Mr. Hastert's resignation, she replied that Mr. Bush wants to know all the facts.

"The speaker called for the investigation, the president supports that, and one is under way. And so let's let that play out," Mrs. Perino said.

As House Republicans worked to show unified support for Mr. Hastert, new "instant messages" between Mr. Foley and a former page surfaced.

DOJ_NMG_0074612

"Former Congressman Mark Foley (R-FL) interrupted a vote on the floor of the House in 2003 to engage in Internet sex with a high school student who had served as a congressional page," ABC reported on its Web site yesterday. The network did not include the exact exchange, for reasons of taste, but said it occurred during the April 2003 House vote to provide $78.5 billion in emergency spending for military operations in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Those messages were among 52 new ones obtained by the network between a teenage boy and Mr. Foley, who used the handle "Maf54" -- Mr. Foley's initials followed by the year of his birth.

In another instant message, Mr. Foley invites the boy to his house near the Capitol for alcohol. "We may need to drink at my house so we don't get busted," he writes in one.

In Florida, meanwhile, Mr. Foley's attorney, David Roth, held a press conference last night to announce that Mr. Foley had been molested by clergy in his early teens. The lawyer did not specify what religion the clergyman was, but Mr. Foley is Roman Catholic. The lawyer also made the first public acknowledgment that Mr. Foley is a homosexual.

Mr. Foley is "recovering" in a clinic for alcoholism, though friends and staffers have told reporters that they were unaware that the six-term congressman had a drinking problem.

The former congressman is a "closet drinker," Mr. Roth said. "This is part of his recovery."

In Washington, Democrats and some conservatives continued their assault on Republican leaders for the scandal and many lower-ranking House Republicans did all they could to distance themselves from leadership and the whole sordid mess.

"Mark Foley is a pedophile who should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law," Rep. Jim Gerlach, Pennsylvania Republican, said emphatically yesterday. "Additionally, there needs to be a full and complete FBI investigation into this matter immediately. If it is found that any member of leadership, Republican or Democrat, or any member of Congress knew of the inappropriate conduct and did nothing to stop it, they should immediately resign from Congress."

Mr. Gerlach, who faces a tough re-election campaign, also postponed a scheduled fundraiser with Mr. Boehner "because he felt it was inappropriate to move ahead with it as planned." The Republican also donated $1,000 in campaign contributions from Mr. Foley to a local crime victims group.

Hastert Says He's Not Going To Quit (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And David Jackson

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Dennis Hastert rebuffed calls Tuesday for him to resign over his handling of the Mark Foley scandal. His fellow Republicans tried to contain damage to the party a month before elections.

At issue is whether Hastert and other House Republican leaders were aggressive enough in their investigation of alleged sexually explicit instant messages and e-mails between Florida congressman Foley and House pages.

One newspaper and some conservatives called for Hastert to step down. He told radio host Rush Limbaugh he has no intentions of quitting. “I'm not going to do that,” said Hastert, who has been speaker since 1998. “We took care of Mr. Foley.”

Hastert got a nod of support from President Bush hours after The Washington Times, a newspaper influential among conservatives, called on Hastert to “resign his speakership at once.”

Bush told reporters traveling with him in Stockton, Calif., “I know Denny Hastert, I meet with him a lot. He is a father, teacher, coach, who cares about the children of this country.” Bush, making his first comments about the scandal, said he was “disgusted by the revelations” of Foley's “unacceptable behavior.”

The Internet communications were first reported last week by ABC News. The network reported Tuesday on instant messages that allegedly show Foley having Internet sex with a page during a House roll call vote. None of the communications has been independently verified by USA TODAY. Foley resigned Friday.

Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz., sent a letter to his colleagues saying calls for Hastert's resignation are “unwarranted and fundamentally unfair.” Shadegg said Hastert “deserves to be treated fairly, not railroaded out of office.”

Hastert has said he does not remember being told about a complaint from the parents of a 16-year-old Louisiana boy, a former page, who alerted Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., about Foley's e-mails to their son. Two top Republicans, Majority

DOJ_NMG_0074613

Leader John Boehner of Ohio and campaign chairman Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, have said they discussed the issue with Hastert months ago.

The e-mails to the Louisiana boy were not sexually explicit. The liberal-leaning group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said it turned over those e-mails to the FBI in July. It also said the bureau did not pursue an investigation.

Conservative leaders had mixed reactions to the actions by Hastert and the GOP leadership. Hastert got support from the Christian Coalition and Republican strategist Grover Norquist, who dismissed calls for the speaker's resignation as “a handful of conservatives desperate to get attention and press.” Tony Perkins, head of the Family Research Council, and Wendy Wright, president of Concerned Women for America, said such calls were “premature.”

Richard Viguerie, a conservative strategist, called for the resignation of the entire House leadership team.

Perkins warned the scandal would cut election turnout Nov. 7 of conservative “values voters” who tend to support Republicans. Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C., who supports Hastert, agreed. “It doesn't help our chance to retain the House,” McHenry said. “That's for sure.”

Gingrich Says Hastert Shouldn't Resign Over Handling Of Page Scandal (AP)

By Jeffrey McMurray

AP, October 3, 2006

LEXINGTON, Ky. - Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said Tuesday that his successor, Dennis Hastert, appropriately handled the aftermath of a scandal involving a Florida congressman and salacious, explicit instant messages to underage male pages.

Gingrich on Tuesday dismissed a call for Hastert's resignation by The Washington Times, a conservative newspaper whose editorial page editor is Gingrich's former press secretary, Tony Blankley.

"I do not agree with that, and I think it's very premature and very inappropriate," said Gingrich, who was in Lexington to give a speech to the University of Kentucky's Sanders-Brown Center on Aging Foundation.

Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., abruptly resigned Friday after news reports surfaced that he sent inappropriate instant messages to teenage boys who once worked as House pages.

On Tuesday, House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said Hastert told him last spring that a Louisiana page's complaint about Foley had "been taken care of."

Gingrich, a Republican who represented a district in Georgia, said it appeared Hastert did all he could by sending another congressman to confront Foley about the charges. Beyond that, Gingrich said, the information he had at the time wasn't "actionable."

"You look him in the eye," Gingrich said. "You say, 'This is dangerous. It's inappropriate. You can't do it.' And, in this case, we now know that U.S. Rep. Foley lied. Now, when you catch him in the lie, you then take stronger action. But until you catch him, you can't presumptively do that."

Gingrich suggested there is a double standard that Republican scandals reflect badly on all Republicans while Democratic scandals, such as Bill Clinton's relationship with Monica Lewinsky, don't affect other Democrats. He also questioned the timing of the release of the information, just a few weeks before the midterm elections.

Even if there was suspicion about Foley, Gingrich said, there is little that could have been done legally.

"You just had the Democrats vote against wiretapping for the purpose of getting terrorists, but it's OK to wiretap for the purpose of getting Republicans?" he said. "I don't understand the double standard."

As a freshman member of Congress in 1983, Gingrich took a hard line approach against two congressmen who were accused of having sexual relationships with congressional pages. Gingrich tried to get the congressmen forced out of office, but the House voted to censure them instead.

He said treatment of the Foley situation is a testament to how far the country has come in child protection cases.

"The mood was that it was almost a joke," Gingrich said. "I'm glad the House, in fact, is taking this much more seriously. I think it's a healthy sign for the country that we realize that these kinds of behaviors are dangerous and that we are prepared to protect young people."

DOJ_NMG_0074614

Hastert Rival Sees Surge In Support (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's Democratic rival to represent the 14th District of Illinois says he got into the lopsided race because he opposes the war in Iraq, but now sees people supporting his candidacy because of what they see as Mr. Hastert's slow response to the "Foleygate" scandal.

"I hope people elect me for the qualifications I have for [charting] a new direction in Iraq, not because the speaker covered up for a dirty old man in Congress," John Laesch, 32, said yesterday, referring to accusations that former Florida Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, sent sexual computer messages to teenage boys serving as congressional pages.

No one is predicting Mr. Laesch, a political newcomer, will defeat Mr. Hastert in the overwhelmingly Republican district west of Chicago, where the top House Republican got 69 percent of the vote in 2004.

Ed Patru, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee laughed yesterday when asked if the Foley scandal might adversely affect Mr. Hastert in the Nov. 7 election.

"This is a two-day story," Mr. Patru said. "It will have no effect at all."

Illinois Republican leader Dennis Wiggins agreed.

"The speaker is very well-respected in this district, and he is trusted, as he is in Congress," said Mr. Wiggins, chairman of both the Kane County Republican Central Committee and the 14th District Republican Central Committee. "The calls I'm getting say he should hang in there and stay steadfast. There are two investigations going on [in the Foley scandal], and it behooves everyone to sit back and wait for the results."

Mr. Laesch describes Mr. Hastert as "the most powerful guy up for re-election in 2006." But the Democratic challenger says his campaign has been "energized" by inconsistences between what Mr. Hastert and others have said about when he first learned of inappropriate e-mail messages Mr. Foley sent to male pages.

Fallout from the Foley scandal "has had a huge impact on my campaign," Mr. Laesch said in a telephone interview yesterday. "Since Friday, we've raised $25,000 without lifting a finger." That's on top of $100,000 he had already raised.

"I realize Dennis Hastert can raise millions of dollars at the drop of a hat," Mr. Laesch said.

In addition, he said, between 30 and 40 people showed up at his campaign office Monday afternoon, asking for yard signs or to volunteer their help. "These people came to express their concern about having a silent speaker, who did absolutely nothing" to protect teenage males from a sexual predator, said Mr. Laesch.

"Even though I am a 32-year-old underdog, I have put a dent in" Mr. Hastert's campaign, the challenger said. He said his assets "include strong organizational skills" and he predicted conservatives will like the fact that his parents were missionaries in West Africa.

A Hastert spokesman said Mr. Laesch is "making reckless accusations" against the 10-term incumbent.

Mr. Hastert "was born and raised here, raised a family here, taught high school here and coached teams here," said Brad Hahn, a spokesman in Mr. Hastert's district office in Batavia, Ill.

"Denny Hastert is a lifetime part of this community, and he represents the values of this district," said Mr. Hahn.

Hastert Rejects Calls To Give Up Leadership (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) yesterday rebuffed calls to resign his leadership role, which have come from conservatives and liberals alike, but public ruptures in the ranks of the House Republican leadership continued to surface in the wake of a page scandal.

Hastert and fellow House Republicans stressed that they will contain the fallout from revelations that senior GOP leaders had known for months about the inappropriate communications between former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and at least two teenage male pages. But several conservative organizations, including the editorial board of the Washington Times, have now called on Hastert to step down, charging that he was derelict in not investigating the "over-friendly" e-mails that his staff had been aware of since late 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0074615

A public show of support for the speaker by many House members masks fears that Hastert's hands-off management style since 1999, when he ascended almost accidentally to one of the highest offices in the land, may finally end his career. Just five weeks before midterm elections, most House members said Hastert will almost certainly not step down before voters go to the polls. But a GOP political disaster in the wake of the Foley revelations could usher him out of the post and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) into the speakership.

"I think Speaker Hastert's done a pretty good job under trying circumstances regarding our members. He has stepped up," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a close ally of Hastert's. But he added that the ultimate responsibility rests with Hastert. "The truth is, if you want to be a page, you have to be appointed by the speaker. This is the speaker's program."

Hastert's critics say the Foley episode is the latest in a long line of Republican leadership failures. Hastert largely stood on the sidelines last year as legal peril mounted for his top lieutenant, then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). Then he intervened to try to save DeLay, first by trying to change House rules to allow an indicted member to maintain his leadership post, then by helping to purge the House ethics committee of members and staffers who had challenged DeLay's bare-knuckled tactics. Neither effort worked.

It took months for Hastert to respond to the influence-peddling scandal triggered by convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and, even then, his personal pledge to tighten the rules governing congressional lobbying did not produce significant legislation. House GOP leaders seemed to have been blindsided when Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) pleaded guilty to accepting millions of dollars in bribes. And after pleading guilty to corruption charges, Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) remains in the House.

Hastert continues to say that his staff's failure to thoroughly investigate the initial e-mails from Foley to a 16-year-old Louisiana boy was understandable, given the vague, friendly nature of the exchange. But others see a pattern. "I think what has been revealed about the way in which the Republican leadership, and Hastert in particular, has handled this matter is fully consistent with his prior behavior as speaker," said Thomas E. Mann, a scholar on Congress at the Brookings Institution and author of a critical new book on the decline of Congress's role in governance." This is a man who has never taken seriously his institutional roll as a constitutional officer of the United States and the head of the whole House, not just the head of the Republican Party."

In a round of interviews with conservative talk show hosts, Hastert said he intends to lead a Republican majority in the next Congress. Fellow House Republicans fell in line. "For a normal political leader, it would be difficult to withstand this, but Hastert is seen as a grandfatherly figure in the House. He's seen as having our best interests at heart," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.).

"We've been through far worse," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the vice chairman of the House Republican Conference. "This is not a problem. This is not anything that's going to tear up the leadership."

Still, such tears are growing increasingly evident. Last week, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said in an interview with The Washington Post that he told Hastert about Foley's inappropriate behavior last spring and was told that the issue was being dealt with. Boehner then sought to deny that he had said it. Yesterday, he returned to his original contention, emphasizing Hastert's responsibility for the page program.

"I believe I talked to the speaker, and he told me it had been taken care of," Boehner told a Cincinnati radio host. "And my position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility. The clerk of the House who runs the page program, the page board -- all report to the speaker. And I believe it had been dealt with."

At issue, say some former Republican leadership aides, may be Hastert's leadership style. Affable and approachable, Hastert emerged seemingly from nowhere to become speaker in 1999. Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) had been drummed out of Congress after a disastrous election season, and his heir apparent, Rep. Bob Livingston (R-La.), resigned amid allegations of an extramarital affair. DeLay, who was then majority whip, engineered Hastert's rise from chief deputy whip to speaker.

From the start, Hastert, 64, took on the role of father confessor, a shoulder to cry on as DeLay knocked heads and kept the House moving. But two former House leadership aides, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of hurting their relationship with the speaker, said DeLay's undoing may have been Hastert's -- and, in retrospect, may have allowed Foley's alleged behavior to go unchecked.

DOJ_NMG_0074616

Under indictment and out of the leadership, DeLay was fighting for his political career when Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) brought Foley's suspicious e-mails to the leadership in November 2005. That same month, Cunningham pleaded guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes.

With DeLay gone and Rep. Roy Blunt (Mo.) serving as both majority whip and majority leader, the House leadership simply lacked the bodies to forcefully take on the Foley issue, the former aides said. The page program was the speaker's domain, but the speaker, already disposed toward delegating responsibility, was getting tired of all the scandals.

"The speaker has been preoccupied and distracted for more than a year," one former leadership aide said.

"Frankly," said the second, "he was tired."

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean disputed that assertion. Hastert was unaware, until last week, of the sexually explicit instant messages that set off the firestorm, Bonjean said, and when they surfaced, the speaker immediately condemned the behavior, called for a criminal investigation and set up a hot line for pages and former pages. As for the previous scandals, Bonjean said: "People want to go into hindsight, to armchair-quarterback, but the fact of the matter is, the speaker has successfully navigated members through a very, very difficult Congress."

A Few Conservative Voices Still Speak For The Speaker (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert woke up yesterday morning to find his Republican conservatives in mid-mutiny.

"Resign, Mr. Speaker," advised the Washington Times at the top of its editorial page. In the Mark Foley scandal, the conservative paper posited, Hastert either (a) "was grossly negligent" or (b) "deliberately looked the other way."

Hastert's loyal deputy, Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), told a hometown radio station that the blame was all Hastert's. "I believe I talked to the speaker and he told me it had been taken care of," Boehner said. "And my position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility."

Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), the man leading House Republicans' campaign efforts, was also blaming "supervisor" Hastert for failing to act earlier to protect boys in the congressional page program from Foley's overtures. "I heard something; I took it to my supervisor," Reynolds said.

Before long, the august National Review had found Hastert and his team guilty of "serious sins of omission," while the magazine's Larry Kudlow joined the mutiny and called Hastert "an ineffective leader."

In the last few days, Hastert, a genial former wrestling coach from Illinois, is proving the axiom devised by former senator/philosopher Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.): "One day you're the toast of the town, the next day you're toast."

Four months ago, Hastert was feted as the longest-serving Republican speaker, earning tributes from all segments of the party. "He's done a great job, and he's been a great partner to me and a great mentor to me," Boehner said then.

And now, he's a great fall guy, too. "The clerk of the House, who runs the page program, the Page Board -- all report to the speaker," Boehner declared yesterday.

It was time for Hastert to take action to put down the mutiny. So he called Rush Limbaugh. And Sean Hannity. And Hugh Hewitt. And Lars Larson. And Roger Hedgecock. Even Neal Boortz, who said Hastert should find a "better excuse" for his inaction on Foley. "We're going to do them all," said Hastert aide Ron Bonjean.

Limbaugh, taking Hastert's call early in the afternoon, got right down to business. "The Washington Times' admittedly conservative editorial page has asked for you to step down," he pointed out.

"Well, yeah, I'm not going to do that," Hastert said casually, as if the Washington Times had suggested he order grapefruit for breakfast.

Limbaugh set about making the case for Hastert. Democrats and the media, he said, are making the speaker look more "interested in holding the House rather than protecting children."

"Yeah" was the entirety of Hastert's reply.

DOJ_NMG_0074617

"I like what you said yesterday," Limbaugh continued, when Hastert "asked for an investigation into who knew what when."

"I don't think you could ask anybody better than the FBI," Hastert concurred. Limbaugh encouraged Hastert to change the subject to the economy and national security. Hastert dutifully responded with a few remarks about the economy and national security.

Eventually, Limbaugh closed with the warning that Democrats and the media would press the issue "even though you've dealt with it, even though he's gone, even though the mistake has been corrected."

Hastert again agreed. "They're trying to put us on defense," he said.

If that was the goal, it seems to have worked. Even nudists were gloating about the Foley scandal, telling the St. Petersburg Times that the lawmaker had been "very hypocritical" in attacking their skinny-dipping. Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah), according to the Deseret News, was driven to declare some of Foley's mannerisms "irritating," adding: "You don't need 'gaydar' to understand he has certain dispositions."

Even as Hastert was on the air with Limbaugh, ABC News was publishing more instant messages Foley had sent to former pages. Clearly, Hastert needed more help. Bush, traveling in California, told the cameras that Hastert "is a father, teacher, coach who cares about the children of this country."

When even that proved insufficient, Hastert turned at 5 p.m. to Hannity's radio show, "the last beacon of truth in a troubled time."

Hannity had spent two hours accusing the Democrats of "dirty tricks" and "hypocrisy" and taking issue with the Washington Times' call for Hastert's head.

"I was shocked at the Washington Times today," he told Hastert, then got down to the questioning. "As you said, this is all brand new to you as of Friday?"

"Right," Hastert agreed.

Hannity asked if Hastert's foes had the Foley messages but "sat on them for political reasons."

"I just think it's awful strange," the speaker agreed.

Hannity, invoking Democratic sex scandals involving then-Massachusetts Rep. Gerry Studds (1983), Massachusetts Rep. Barney Frank (1990) and President Bill Clinton (1998), asked: "Do you think there's a double standard?"

"Yes, it appears there's a double standard," the speaker agreed.

Hannity was not finished. "In all seriousness, how would you be responsible for what another congressman does on an instant message? How could you possibly know this kind of thing was going on?"

"We don't know," the speaker agreed.

Milbank is writing a book. Washington Sketch will appear on a reduced schedule until early next year.

Dems Sit Back And Watch The Republican Meltdown (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, October 4, 2006

House Democrats largely held their fire Tuesday as the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) escalated into a seriously damaging liability for beleaguered House Republicans just weeks away from a pivotal election.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) did not join calls from some conservatives for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to step down for failing to take more action to protect pages last year when he reportedly was informed that Foley sent inappropriate e-mails to a former page.

A spokeswoman said Pelosi instead was focused on ensuring that the ethics committee moves forward with its investigation.

“We’re keeping pressure on the Republican leadership to find out what happened, what they knew and when they knew it,” the spokeswoman said.

The House voted Friday to direct the ethics committee “to immediately appoint” an investigative subcommittee to handle the matter and to present a “preliminary report” within 10 days, according to a resolution offered by Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0074618

That 10-day time period is up on Monday. At press time, two sources said the ethics committee will convene tomorrow morning.

From a political perspective, the timeline allows Democrats to keep the scandal on the front page even if political pressure on Republican leadership wanes, said Democratic sources. If the investigation moves slowly, Democrats can charge that the Republicans are fearful of revealing details of a potential cover-up. If the probe moves quickly, the results will offer a new opportunity to showcase the Republican leadership's alleged missteps.

The expected FBI investigation will likely take much longer, stretching beyond the Nov. 7 elections.

House Democratic lawmakers and candidates largely followed Pelosi's lead yesterday, perhaps wary of overplaying their hand by calling for Hastert's head too early. Instead, they issued statements demanding that their opponents return Foley's campaign donations or linking Foley to a Republican "culture of corruption."

Patsy Madrid, however, who is challenging Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), did demand Hastert's resignation.

"It is time for a change," she said in a statement. "Speaker Hastert needs to resign and the Republicans need to take responsibility for this scandal and for their attempted cover-up."

But the vast majority of House Democrats said nothing at all.

"I suspect that the Democrats don't really feel a need to say anything — the story speaks for itself," said a House Democratic aide. "The whole thing is absolutely outrageous. I have never seen my boss so angry and disgusted."

Encountered in a Capitol hallway yesterday, Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) said he was not ready to ask Hastert to step aside.

"I think anyone who knew about this and did nothing should step down, [but] we'll have to see all the facts," Schiff said. "The fact that [Foley] remained as chair of the Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, I think is terrible."

A Democratic strategist argued that staying out of a Republican scandal was the best political move Democrats could make right now.

"Don't get in the way when the other side is doing a fine job hanging themselves," the strategist said.

On the Democrats' campaign website, a listing of Foley news clips was topped with an unequivocal heading: "We. Are. Winning."

In an e-mail yesterday to potential donors, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee called the Foley scandal "a betrayal of trust" and said Democrats are in the best position in over a decade to win a Democratic majority in Congress.

Still, signs emerged yesterday that Republicans were beginning to go on the offensive, implying that Democrats were behind the leak of the original set of messages between Foley and a page.

"We also need to know why these messages surfaced only last week, on the final day of legislative business before the November elections," wrote House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) in a letter to the editor of the Washington Times, which called yesterday for Hastert to resign.

The House Republicans' usual attack dog, Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) was back in the saddle yesterday.

"Who would turn over the instant messages to ABC News rather than the police?" McHenry said in a statement. "In my mind, this person, group or political organization is as sick as Foley himself."

A watchdog group run by former Democratic aides, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), had a copy of Foley's original messages as early as July. The group forwarded the messages to the FBI, but did not pass them on to any other entities, said spokeswoman Naomi Seligman Steiner.

The messages appeared earlier in September on the website stopsexpredators.blogspot.com and ABC News picked them up on Thursday.

"We weren't the source. ABC did not the get the emails from us," Steiner said.

Unlucky GOP Candidate Depends On Votes For Foley (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, October 4, 2006

State Rep. Joe Negron (R-Fla.) started the first day of his congressional campaign to succeed Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) as an alternative juror in a two-week-old murder trial.

DOJ_NMG_0074619

The trial ended yesterday when the jury convicted the defendant and the sentencing phase of the trial began. But that appears to be the least of Negron's concerns after winning the party's nod last weekend.

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) told conservative radio host Sean Hannity on Monday that Republicans losing the seat in November was already a foregone conclusion.

"To vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley," Boehner said, referring to ballot procedures that require Foley's name to remain on the ballot. "How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

Negron disputed Boehner's characterization that Tim Mahoney, the Democratic candidate, would win the seat.

"I certainly respect [Boehner's] opinion, but I strongly disagree and so does Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) who carried this district by 60 percent," Negron said in a call from the courthouse. "Just because Mark Foley has engaged in reprehensible conduct does not mean there will be a coronation for the Democratic candidate."

Unlike Boehner, as of Monday, the National Republican Congressional Committee was at least paying lip service to the idea that Negron had a real chance to keep the seat in GOP hands, sending out a memo arguing that the race would be competitive.

Negron said he would run his campaign on keeping taxes lower and federal spending down and supporting President Bush in his efforts to fight terrorism. But he quickly attacked his opponent, calling him a "John Kerry Democrat."

Foley won 58 percent of the vote in 1994 and never received less than 60 percent after his first term. President Bush won 54 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election. But political handicappers, including Chris Cillizza at WashingtonPost.com, have said the seat is more likely to switch hands in November.

Negron said he would have less of a challenge building a campaign infrastructure because he has served for three terms in the Florida legislature. He plans to transfer $600,000 of his own money — which he set aside for his failed bid to become Florida's attorney general — to jump-start his congressional campaign. He has two staffers working for him and yesterday was expecting a potential campaign manager with D.C.-ties to fly-in for an interview. He said he didn't even know the job seeker's name.

Negron also noted that members of Florida's congressional delegation have offered him support, including Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) and Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.). He said he has not talked to Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee or anyone else at the party committee directly, but added that there have been "staff-level contacts."

"I can't imagine that the national party would walk away from a strong Republican district," Negron said.

Jeb Bush told reporters yesterday that, "I've never felt you should underestimate voters," but added that Negron faces an "an extraordinary challenge."

Meanwhile, Democrats are excited by the possibility of being able to put a seat in the win column that they weren't expecting. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) put Mahoney on their "Red to Blue" list, which could give him a fundraising advantage in reaction to the scandal. The Florida Democratic Party also began running a vote-by-mail program in the district prior to Foley's resignation.

Mahoney's press secretary said his boss, a wealthy businessman and former Republican, did not want to discuss the Foley matter and stressed that any questions directed to him right now would have to focus on issues.

But during the interview, when pressed on hot topics in Florida such as healthcare, Mahoney said he did not want to get into specifics such as whether he would support an employer mandate to provide health insurance. Breaking his own press secretary's rules, he readily answered questions about Foley and managed to take a few digs at Foley and House GOP leaders.

"[Speaker] Dennis Hastert [R-Ill.] needs to take on this problem from the perspective as a parent and not as a politician," he said. "He needs to go out there and find out who did what."

Mahoney was scheduled appeared on MSNBC's "Hardball" with Chris Matthews Monday night and was scheduled to appear on "Larry King Live" last night. Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), who helped recruit Mahoney into the race, was considering flying to Florida to offer advice and assistance, said two Democratic aides.

Mahoney has $343,000 in cash-on-hand and he is airing a television ad that shows him alongside former Sen. Bob Graham (D-Fla.).

Former Gov. Mark Warner (D-Va.) will raise money for Mahoney and state Sen. Ron Klein (D-Fla.), who is running against Rep. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) at a breakfast tomorrow, said Ellen Qualls, a spokesman for Warner's PAC.

Page Scandal Complicates Race For 'Mr. Clout' (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

AMHERST, N.Y., Oct. 3 -- Possessed of a pleasant smile and a sweet demeanor, 60-year-old Eleanore Klepser represents something of a nightmare for local Republicans.

She is a registered Republican and she has always -- always -- voted for her local congressman, Thomas M. Reynolds, a Republican. But she is following this scandal about the congressional pages, and she suspects Reynolds just might have covered up the actions of a fellow Republican congressman who sent suggestive e-mails to a teenager who had worked in the House.

"Why didn't he do more? That's what I wonder," Klepser said as she walked down a street in her well-heeled suburb northeast of Buffalo. "Was he paying close enough attention? Was he covering something up?

"These aren't great questions to ask a month before an election."

Reynolds supporters would not argue with that. What appeared to be a political stroll for the Republican known locally as "Mr. Clout" has become a campaign sprint. And Reynolds's biggest headache is the role he played in the unfolding controversy around the teenage congressional pages. This spring, Reynolds, who is among the Republican leadership in the House, learned that Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had sent an inappropriate e-mail to a 16-year-old former page that troubled the teenager's parents.

When word of the that and other e-mails broke last week -- along with news of far more explicit online instant messages -- Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) at first denied knowing anything about the scandal. But Reynolds told the media that he had told Hastert of the initial e-mail this spring; Hastert has said he does not recall this conversation, but he also has not denied that it might have taken place.

Now many, including Reynolds's Democratic challenger, are asking why Reynolds did not follow up on the complaint. They are also raising questions about the role of Reynolds's chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, who used to serve as chief of staff to Foley. In the days leading up to Foley's resignation, Reynolds allowed Fordham to advise the Florida congressman. A recent local poll reports that the race in New York's 26th Congressional District -- which reaches from suburban Buffalo across farm country and into Rochester -- is too close to call.

Reynolds's Democratic challenger, Jack Davis, is a millionaire and former Republican who says he fell out with the GOP when Vice President Cheney's staffers tried to prevent him from talking with the media in 2003 during a fundraiser in Buffalo. Now he is tossing bales of his own money into the campaign furnaces in hopes of overtaking Reynolds. Davis, 72, has the outspoken cockiness that comes with not working for anyone else. Most days he talks about free trade, which he loathes, and illegal immigrants, all of whom he would deport, and the nation's steady loss of high-paying working-class jobs to "Communist China."

But on Tuesday, he made an exception.

"I want to beat Reynolds on my issues, but of course it's nice to have him screw up," Davis said as he paced the office in his factory in Akron, N.Y. "When Reynolds heard about the problems with the pages, he should have shown due diligence and investigated. This is all about power and all about money, and it stinks."

Reynolds remains no easy mark. He occupies a district tailored for Republicans, and he has directed tens of millions of dollars into the region, recently gaining a reprieve for an air base slated for closing. When he held a news conference Monday evening at Daemen College, reporters passed the Thomas Reynolds Center for Special Education, funded with $1.9 million from the politician.

He directs the National Republican Congressional Committee with a practiced hand and is mentioned as a possible future speaker of the House.

A lot of voters appreciate Reynolds's acumen, especially in this economically battered corner of New York. "We're losing a lot of jobs and industry, and we need someone who knows how to fight," said Sam Mairorana, a retired salesman in Williamsville. "A lot of folks I know are thinking about voting against Reynolds. I'm not sure we can afford it."

DOJ_NMG_0074621

Reynolds returned to Buffalo on Monday and walked into a news conference affecting a jaunty air. He slapped a supporter's back, smiled at the 25 children whom his campaign aides had arranged around him, then turned to face the media and charges that he had helped cover up misconduct.

"I did what most employees do," he said. "I heard something, and I took it to my supervisor, the speaker of the House."

He could not remember when this conversation had taken place, however, nor what the speaker's reaction had been. As the questions kept coming, sweat beaded on his forehead, and he cut off questions. "I don't know what more I could have done," he said. Asked whether Hastert had done enough, Reynolds shrugged. "Look, I don't know. . . . You'll have to ask him."

Reynolds Deflects Questions About Top Aide's Role In Foley Storm (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

AMHERST, N.Y. Congressman Thomas Reynolds today denied knowing what his top aide might have done on behalf of a disgraced lawmaker in the days before he resigned following revelations of sexually explicit messages sent to underage male pages.Reynolds' chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, a past chief of staff for former G-O-P Representative Mark Foley of Florida, advised his former boss as the scandal unfolded.After learning the sexually explicit nature of some of the exchanges, Reynolds has said he called for Foley's resignation, an effort in which his chief of staff was involved.That's in stark contrast with Reynolds' claims today that he knew nothing about his top aide's actions before Foley's resignation.Fordham did not respond to an e-mail request seeking comment and could not be reached by telephone.Reynolds, a four-term congressman, is involved in a heated re-election race against Democrat Jack Davis.

Congressman Reynolds Facing Tough Questions On Foley (WIVB-TV)

WIVB-TV, October 3, 2006

(October 3, 2006) - - House Speaker Dennis Hastert is resisting calls for his resignation in the wake of questionable e-mails sent to a Capitol Hill page by the now-resigned Congressman Mark Foley. And Clarence Congressman Tom Reynolds faced more questions from News 4 Investigative Reporter Luke Moretti and others Tuesday in Amherst.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, Republican of Clarence, said, "I took that information to the Speaker."

Tom Reynolds says he first heard about overly-friendly e-mails sent by Mark Foley from a colleague, and then notified House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

Moretti: When and how did you tell the Speaker? Was it on the phone? Was it in person?

Reynolds: Well, first of all, it's a privileged conversation between two members, but I regularly meet with the Speaker, particularly as chair of the campaign committee, and I probably had a list of things.

Hastert doesn't deny talking to Reynolds, but says he doesn't remember it.

Hastert, Republican of Illinois, said, "I don't recall Reynolds talking to me about that. If he did, he brought it in with a whole stack of things."

It turns out the House reviewed the Foley e-mail controversy in November 2005, months before Reynolds learned of it.

Then, a second set of e-mails and instant messages surfaced on Friday, described as sexually-explicit.

Reynolds says he found about those from media reports.

Reynolds said, "I immediately began to work for his resignation."

According to a Florida newspaper, Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, who now heads Reynolds' Washington office, had been advising Foley in recent days.

Reynolds said, "We moved and worked to get Foley's resignation, and that was certainly obtained within hours. And Mr. Fordham was helpful in getting that resignation."

But when asked if his chief of staff should have been advising Foley in the first place, Reynolds responded this way:

Reynolds: I don't know what he counseled him on; you'll have to ask him.

Moretti: Will you make him available to us?

Reynolds: That's up to him.

We made that request with Reynolds' office Tuesday, and we were denied the interview.

You can see the entire Reynolds news conference by clicking the link in the left-hand column under "News 4 On Demand".

DOJ_NMG_0074622

Wednesday, Tom Reynolds looks to get a campaign boost from the White House. First Lady Laura Bush will attend a luncheon for reynolds in Amherst.

Ex-Pages Brought Explicit Messages To Light (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former congressional pages themselves supplied some of the most damning emails in the scandal that forced the resignation of Rep. Mark Foley, stepping forward only after tamer messages were posted by ABC News on its Web site Thursday.

Several media organizations, along with law-enforcement and congressional officials, had seen the Florida Republican's tamer messages to male teenage pages months ago, but the messages didn't set off alarm bells, even at ABC, which didn't consider them worthy of its broadcast TV news, a reconstruction of events shows.

Brian Ross, chief investigative correspondent at ABC News, said a nonpartisan source provided the "tamer" emails that the network posted on its Web site "The Blotter." Within hours of that posting, "numerous" former House pages emailed ABC with additional allegations about Mr. Foley, Mr. Ross said.

Two former pages -- one who had been sponsored by a Republican member of Congress and one by a Democrat -- offered ABC texts of sexually explicit instant messages purportedly sent by Mr. Foley. Mr. Ross said the network then tracked down the original recipients of those messages, using a page yearbook, and got firsthand confirmation of their authenticity. Mr. Ross said he thinks one of the original recipients was a Democrat and the other a Republican.

Mr. Ross declined to identify any of the sources by name. He described the first tipster as a "Capitol Hill source" -- though not an aide or congressional official -- who was "aware of the pages' complaints" and "concerned about kids and pedophiles." This person, Mr. Ross said, is "involved in public-policy issues" but isn't affiliated with either political party.

Mr. Ross's account sheds new light on a question that has vexed Washington insiders for days: Why did the story, which had circulated months before to several news outlets, break just five weeks before the election? The timing of the news, which emerged too late for the Republican Party to put a different candidate's name on the ballot in Mr. Foley's congressional district -- has led some Republicans to question whether the sources had partisan political motives.

Appearing with conservative radio show host Rush Limbaugh, House Speaker Dennis Hastert said the opposition was orchestrating the leaks of explicit instant messages between Mr. Foley and former pages dating from 2003. "We have a story to tell, and the Democrats have -- in my view have -- put this thing forward to try to block us from telling the story. They're trying to put us on defense," Mr. Hastert said.

Mr. Ross said that, in his opinion, ABC's path to the story was too convoluted to be part of a broader partisan conspiracy. "The chain of events that just doesn't hold up...in terms of being from a political party," Mr. Ross said. "I know how that works. This was not it."

The pages who provided information to ABC insisted on anonymity, in some cases because they were worried about the impact on their current or future political careers, Mr. Ross said. One of the former pages "is now involved in politics," he added. If his name surfaced "it would be extremely detrimental to him and to his candidate, who is a Republican."

ABC first heard about the tamer emails in August, but Mr. Ross said the network was focused on stories about the anniversaries of Hurricane Katrina and Sept. 11, 2001, and didn't immediately turn to it. He said he wasn't familiar with the Stop Sex Predators blog, which was launched in July. On Sept. 24, 2006, four days before ABC's posting, that blog posted emails from Mr. Foley to a former page that asked how the young man was weathering the hurricane and what he wanted for his birthday.

By that point, several other entities had been tipped to the emails, including the watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which shared the information with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. Ross said CREW wasn't his initial source for the emails and that he wasn't aware that the group had them. Naomi Seligman Steiner, deputy director of CREW, said her group passed the emails on to the FBI and no one else after receiving them in July. She declined to identify the source of the emails, which the group posted on its Web site after ABC broke the story. The unidentified owner of the Stop Sex Predators blog didn't respond to a request for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0074623

Like the other news outlets who had the emails -- and, for that matter, the Republican leaders and aides who were aware of them -- ABC didn't see them as a major story, Mr. Ross said. "It wasn't smoking-gun material," he said.

But posting them on the Internet allowed the network to tap what Mr. Ross described a "general outrage" among former pages about Mr. Foley. "We only got it because we ran the first kind of denial...For him to say he was overfriendly...that somehow aggravated them," Mr. Ross said. Yesterday, ABC, citing instant messages provided by former House pages, reported that in 2003 Mr. Foley interrupted a vote on the House floor to engage in Internet sex with a former page.

Woulda. Coulda. Shoulda? (NYT)

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

The more the House Republican leaders try to defend themselves on the Congressional page scandal, the worse it looks. They still do not seem to appreciate how serious this is, especially for a party that poses as the arbiter of morality. And they appear to be trying harder to deflect blame from themselves than to get to the bottom of what actually happened. The F.B.I. has begun investigating, but that will be a prolonged process, and the voters have to render a verdict in five weeks. There is evidence emerging that they should consider.

Dennis Hastert, the House speaker, is responsible for the page program, and for seeing that the recent improprieties are properly investigated. His performance has been disturbing. As late as Monday, he was still minimizing the scandal. He said he understood that the improper contacts between pages and Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who resigned last week, occurred after the pages left the program. “This was after the fact,” Mr. Hastert said, “and you know — would have, could have, should have.”

First, it’s not at all clear that events transpired after the pages left the program. And, in any case, why is that relevant? Surely preying on ordinary young Americans is just as vile as preying on pages.

Mr. Hastert hardly sounds like an effective leader who intends to investigate the allegations thoroughly, particularly now that the focus is shifting from Mr. Foley’s conduct to whether House leaders covered it up. His remarks struck the same dismissive tone as the White House spokesman Tony Snow’s references to “naughty e-mails.”

It is disturbingly difficult to straighten out the basics of who said and did what when. John Boehner, the majority leader, was saying late last week that he did not recall informing Mr. Hastert that there was a problem with Mr. Foley. Now he is insisting he did and trying to dump the mess in the speaker’s lap. Thomas Reynolds, the New York Republican who heads the National Republican Congressional Committee, insists he told Mr. Hastert this spring of his concerns about Mr. Foley. But Mr. Hastert says he does not recall being told.

There are more unanswered questions. When John Shimkus, the Illinois Republican who is chairman of the House Page Board, learned of the Foley problem, he informed the House clerk, but not the Democrat on the committee, or anyone in the Democratic leadership. It is unclear why he withheld the information. The pages’ well-being should have been his primary concern, not partisan politics.

Mr. Reynolds, who was one of the few members of Congress to know about the Foley problem early on, insists he did all he had to when he “took it to my supervisor,” Mr. Hastert. But Mr. Reynolds is a key member of the House leadership, and his constituents need to know whether he knew enough to have done more than he did. We’d also like to know why, in the months when Mr. Reynolds was one of the few people to know of Mr. Foley’s misconduct, Mr. Foley contributed $100,000 to Mr. Reynolds’s Congressional campaign committee.

Every one of these political leaders is up for re-election next month. Voters should go into the booth with full information about how they all handled this challenge to their leadership.

Accountability In The House (WP)

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

THE HOUSE must name a trustworthy outside investigator to examine the conduct of its leaders and officials in the matter of former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.). The sooner Republican leaders recognize that this is the only responsible -- not to mention politically acceptable -- approach to the scandal, the better off they, and the country, will be. So far, though, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his finger-pointing colleagues have been resolutely resisting this obvious move.

DOJ_NMG_0074624

First they called for the notoriously somnolent and dysfunctional House ethics committee to look into the matter. Then they sought to enlist the Justice Department. "This investigation should be thorough, and any violation of the law should be prosecuted," President Bush chimed in yesterday. Fine, but a criminal investigation can deal only with violations of criminal law. The indifferent response of House leaders to Mr. Foley's behavior may be criminal in a moral sense but not, most likely, in a legal one.

Other proposals smell more of a desperate desire to take action than of a considered response. Abolishing the page program doesn't seem advisable, and in any event it would not obviate the need for a reliable investigation. Nor would Mr. Hastert's resignation, particularly if the primary motivation is to have someone take the fall.

Instead, the speaker should instruct the ethics panel to appoint, with bipartisan agreement, an outside investigator to handle the matter -- a former federal judge or a figure with similar independent credibility. This person would need the power to compel testimony and subpoena records. In the interim, the speaker and other members of the leadership -- if they wish to retain any moral claim to remaining House leaders -- must provide a more detailed explanation of their conduct. Mr. Hastert's conflicting statements about whether he was informed about Mr. Foley's "overly friendly" e-mails, and his stated failure to remember any warning about the lawmaker's conduct, are neither convincing nor reassuring. If a colleague told you about such a problem with someone in your office, would you forget it? "I know that he wants all the facts to come out," the president said of Mr. Hastert. Not based on the evidence so far.

The irony here is that, were it not for their reflexive instinct for one-party governance, the Republicans could have spared themselves this scandal, or at least ensured that it was a bipartisan one. But their initial response to reports of a potential problem was to keep it inside the family -- not to inform, for example, the Democratic member responsible for overseeing the page program, Rep. Dale E. Kildee (Mich.). And it's telling that Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) took the problem to the head of the GOP's campaign arm, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), whose role is to get Republicans reelected. Was that the priority all along?

When The House Could Clean Itself (WP)

By Joseph A. Califano Jr.

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

The most troubling aspect of the Mark Foley scandal is not his conduct, disgusting as it was, but what the response of the leadership reveals about the rancid state of partisanship and the consequent decline of the House of Representatives. Speaker Dennis Hastert presides over a legislative body so infested with mistrust that it doesn't even have a functioning ethics committee. Since the House is incapable of washing its own dirty laundry and policing itself, the speaker has to turn over that responsibility to the attorney general and the executive branch of government.

Compare the current situation with the way Speaker Tip O'Neill and the House handled the last scandal involving sexual misconduct with pages, in the summer of 1982.

On "The CBS Evening News With Dan Rather" that June, two former pages, their teenage faces silhouetted to hide their identity, claimed they were victims of sexual abuse by members of Congress. One described homosexual advances by members; the other shocked the nation when he said he had engaged in homosexual relations with three members and procured prostitutes for others. The CBS broadcast sparked a wildfire of reports and rumors about sexual abuse of pages and drug use by members and pages.

Within a week the House had authorized its ethics committee to conduct a full investigation of allegations of "sexual misconduct, illicit drug distribution and use, and offers of preferential treatment in exchange for sexual favors or drugs by Members, officers or employees of the House." House Speaker O'Neill and Minority Leader Robert Michel asked me to be special counsel to the ethics committee, co-chaired by Ohio Democrat Lou Stokes and South Carolina Republican Floyd Spence. I was allowed to select my own staff and given a commitment that I could follow the evidence wherever it led, because, as O'Neill and Michel said, "The integrity of the House is at stake."

Assistant Deputy Attorney General Rudolph Giuliani was the point man for the Justice Department and its grand jury investigation of the charges. We agreed to exchange all relevant information and that there would be no leaks. Allegations of sexual misconduct and drug use were raw meat for a voracious, scandal-hungry Washington press corps, and Giuliani and I came across rumors and fragments of information about many members of Congress. We shared them all with each other, and there were no leaks from him or me.

DOJ_NMG_0074625

The big surprise came when the two pages whom CBS had put on its evening news show recanted. They testified under oath that they had lied and that CBS reporter John Ferrugia had put words in their mouths. But uncovering the lies of the pages and the reckless reporting of CBS didn't end our investigation. We had received a host of allegations of sexual misconduct and drug use and sale by other pages and House members. We interviewed, under oath, some 2,000 past and present pages, adults who had supervised and taught them, congressional staffers, and House members. We issued scores of subpoenas.

We found no evidence of widespread sexual misconduct. We did find that Rep. Daniel Crane (R-Ill.) had had a sexual relationship with a 17-year-old female page and that Rep. Gerry Studds (D-Mass.) had sexual relations with a 17-year-old male page and had made advances to other teenage male pages.

When I reported our findings to O'Neill and Michel, the dishonor that these members had brought on the House infuriated the two leaders. "Get it out," they said, "and let the committee recommend disciplinary action," which its four Democratic and four Republican members did, unanimously, in July 1983. Crane and Studds were censured by the House. Crane resigned his seat. Studds chose to stay on and was retained in office by his constituents for 13 more years.

But the ethics committee had done its job well, we believed. Our investigation found other misdeeds: House members -- two Democrats and a Republican -- had used drugs. And between 1978 and 1982 a number of House and Senate employees were involved in illicit use and distribution of drugs. All were named (Barry Goldwater Jr., who retired from the House; Fred Richmond, who admitted buying and using drugs and later pleaded guilty to tax evasion; and John Burton, who entered rehab and became a recovering addict with a productive career in the California state legislature). The employees were fired and prosecuted. The House adopted all the changes we recommended to provide far more attentive supervision of pages.

The course the House took in that scandal, and its reaction to the current one, show the difference between a leadership that saw a threat to the integrity of the House of Representatives and one that sees a threat to its continuing control of the institution. It's useful today to remember that there was a time when partisanship took second place to trust and the House leadership had the strength to wash its own dirty laundry.

The writer is president of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University. He was President Lyndon Johnson's assistant for domestic affairs and secretary of health, education and welfare in the Carter administration.

Dumping Denny Won't Do It (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

It is a mark of the sheer panic sweeping the ranks of Republican congressmen that one of their most levelheaded members, Ray LaHood of Illinois, has suggested that Congress abolish its page program altogether in the wake of the Mark Foley scandal.

What conclusion are we supposed to draw from LaHood's proposal? That members of Congress cannot be trusted in the company of adolescents? If so, why punish the adolescents? Whatever happened in the Foley case surely wasn't the fault of the pages to whom Foley came on electronically, much less every teenager who has worked, or would like to work, as a page.

If LaHood believes that pages pose an irresistible temptation to his peers, there are surely solutions straight out of the Republican playbook that wouldn't punish the victims. How about building a 700-foot fence around all Republican members of Congress?

One thing is certain: Just dumping Denny Hastert as speaker, as many conservatives are demanding, won't clean up the Republican act. House Majority Leader John Boehner -- No. 2 in the House GOP hierarchy to Hastert's No. 1 -- now says that the failure to do anything about Foley since his e-mails first became known to the Republican leadership is Hastert's responsibility.

But we also know that Boehner and colleagues Tom Reynolds of New York, who heads the National Republican Congressional Committee; John Shimkus of Illinois, who heads the panel that oversees the page program; and Rodney

DOJ_NMG_0074626

Alexander of Louisiana, who received the first complaints about Foley, had the same information Hastert had, and presumably they noticed that Mark Foley still walked among them as a member of Congress.

We know that Shimkus neglected to bring up the Foley issue with Michigan's Dale Kildee, the one Democrat on the committee that oversees the page program. We know that all of them put their concern for avoiding a scandal that might damage their party's prospects over whatever fears they may (and should) have entertained about Foley's interactions with the Capitol's cadre of teenagers.

And should House Republicans toss Hastert overboard, then both their leaders in this session will have left the leadership in disgrace. Tom DeLay, after all, is soon to stand trial in Texas for abuses he is alleged to have committed in his drive to secure the House Republican majority by forcing through a mid-decade redistricting in his home state. And dissimilar as Hastert's inaction in the Foley case and DeLay's action in the Texas reapportionment may be, their motives were indisputably identical: elevating the retention of the Republican congressional majority over any concerns about the other consequences -- some legal, some moral -- of their acts.

There were, of course, other ways to ensure that majority short of such desperate expedients. Congressional Republicans might have bethought themselves to exercise some oversight on our war in Iraq, at least forcing the administration to articulate exactly what our strategy is.

They might have crafted a Medicare prescription program less to the drug companies' liking that didn't leave seniors having to fork over thousands of dollars for medications once the program's coverage ran out, as it has for many, at mid-year. They might have raised the minimum wage, something that, by the evidence of every recent poll, a vast majority of Republican rank-and-filers support. They might have raised revenue to cover the cost of the war and all the other programs they support. They might, in short, have made an effort to address the nation's needs.

Instead, the larger purpose of the Republican Congress has been to enrich the rich and to cling to power by all means necessary -- with the financial assistance of the grateful rich. Purging Hastert, like dumping DeLay, does not signal any shift in these priorities. Democratic candidates challenging Republican incumbents are well within their rights to note that their opponent voted to give control of the House to Hastert and DeLay in January of 2005 and to ask why anyone would think he or she would make a better choice next time. What would be different? After all, in not sharing what he knew about Foley with Kildee, Shimkus was merely following the Republicans' practice of cutting the other party out of all legislative deliberations and running the House of, by and emphatically for themselves.

And who are the Republican members of Congress who've opposed this? Who has voted for rules that allow Democrats to offer amendments to key bills from the floor of the House? Who among them would consider not just defenestrating Denny but also changing the way the Republican Congress does business? Nobody springs to mind.

So -- dump the pages? Come now. Let's just dump the Republicans.

Alito: Threat To Judicial Independence At Historic High (LAW)

By Michael Scholl, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 4, 2006

As he was gearing up for this week's start of the new term, the U.S. Supreme Court's newest member took time to stress the importance of judicial independence for a group of Nassau County, N.Y., judges and attorneys.

"I probably don't need to convince the people in this room how important it is for us to preserve our federal and state court systems, which have played such an important part in the government of our country, in the freedoms that we enjoy and in the prosperity that we enjoy," Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. said during a speech Thursday evening at the Mineola, N.Y., headquarters of the Nassau County Bar Association.

"I think this is one of the times in our history when there are some real threats to the federal and state judiciary, and I don't think I'm being too much of an alarmist to say that we could be not too far from the tipping point when an accumulation of things does real damage to these vital institutions," Alito added. "I hope that we can all work to prevent that from happening."

The day before Justice Alito appeared, former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor published a column in The Wall Street Journal decrying attempts by lawmakers and others to intimidate the judiciary.

DOJ_NMG_0074627

"While scorn for certain judges is not an altogether new phenomenon, the breadth and intensity of rage currently being leveled at the judiciary may be unmatched in American history," O'Connor wrote. "The ubiquitous 'activist judges' who 'legislate from the bench' have become central villains on today's domestic political landscape. Elected officials routinely score cheap points by railing against the 'elitist judges' ... . Several jeremiads are published every year warning of the dangers of judicial supremacy and judicial tyranny. Though these attacks generally emit more heat than light, using judges as punching bags presents a grave threat to the independent judiciary."

Among the threats to judicial independence that Alito cited in his half-hour speech is the use of unfounded ethical charges to impugn the integrity of judges and judicial nominees.

"This is extremely damaging," Alito said. "People who go into public service, people who go into a judicial career, cherish their reputations as ethical people."

The judge acknowledged that people who commit genuine ethical violations should be exposed and disciplined. But he added that "to use unfounded ethical charges, which a member of the judiciary is in a poor position to answer, as a weapon to defeat a nominee or to denigrate a sitting judge, is a tactic that ought to be condemned."

Alito said a second threat to judicial independence comes from some members of the news media who undermine public confidence in the judiciary by criticizing judges without just cause.

"The media should be held responsible for the way in which they criticize judges" he said.

Alito said members of the media who air and publish stories critical of decisions often do so without fully grasping the complexity of the rulings.

"To criticize a judicial decision or the conduct of a judge based on sound bites is irresponsible," he said, "and I think there is a danger of that happening and really damaging the institution."

Although he was highly critical of the press, Alito offered no solutions as to how media coverage of the judiciary can be improved. And he emphasized he believes in freedom of the press and that nothing should be done to limit that freedom.

"The First Amendment, I think, is the jewel of our Constitution," he said.

Alito's views were shaped in part by his own experiences with the Supreme Court confirmation process. He noted that, after he was nominated to succeed O'Connor last October, he was subjected to intense media scrutiny.

He said he was initially surprised last fall to find that he would be greeted by a pack of photographers and TV camera crews each time he went to Capitol Hill for pre-confirmation hearing meetings with individual senators last November.

"Eventually it occurred to me that they were waiting for the golden moment when I would fall down the steps," Alito in a comment that brought laughter from his 100-plus-member audience at the annual dinner for the Theodore Roosevelt American Inn of Court, a group of Nassau County judges and attorneys who meet regularly to participate in programs aimed at improving their skills, professionalism and ethics.

Alito said he became the subject of an unfounded ethics charge during his confirmation process when Internet bloggers accused him of lying about his father being born in Italy. Mainstream media outlets quickly began investigating the accusation, which turned out to be untrue.

"The Boston Globe thought this was very important and they hired a professional genealogist to investigate the history of my family, to see where my father was born, and they discovered that in fact he had been born in Italy," Alito said. "This is just an example of some of the things that go on in the media today with nominees, not just for the Supreme Court, but for other positions."

'Neither Force Nor Will, But Merely Judgment' (WSJ)

By William H. Pryor Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

Recently some leaders of the bench and bar -- including, on this page last week, retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor -- have decried what they describe as unprecedented threats to the independence of the judiciary. I respectfully disagree. Although the fringes of American politics offer a few disturbing examples of ignorance of the judicial function, I agree with Justice Clarence

DOJ_NMG_0074628

Thomas, who observed in 1999, "What is truly surprising about today's judiciary is how strong it really is." My disagreement with those who say that the independence of the judiciary is under siege is three-fold:

Contemporary criticisms of the judiciary are relatively mild. To charge that the current disappointment regarding judges is unprecedented is to diminish the sacrifices that earlier giants of the judiciary endured. During the civil rights struggle, the ostracism and abuses suffered by federal judges in the Deep South -- including Frank Johnson, John Minor Wisdom and Skelly Wright -- were far worse than the current criticisms of judicial activism. Other historical moments also provide provocative counterexamples. As Justice Stephen Breyer stated several years ago, "We run no risk of returning to the days when a president (responding to [the Supreme] Court's efforts to protect the Cherokee Indians) might have said, 'John Marshall has made his decision; now let him enforce it!'"

Many contemporary criticisms of judicial decisions by politicians are no more heated than the criticisms written by jurists in dissenting opinions. In Roper v. Simmons, Justice O'Connor protested that "the Court [had] preempt[ed] the democratic debate through which genuine consensus might develop." Justice Breyer warned, in what he called the "highly politicized matter" of Bush v. Gore, that "the appearance of a split decision runs the risk of undermining the public's confidence in the Court itself." Consider also the harsh words of Justice William Brennan in Oregon v. Elstad: "the Court mischaracterizes our precedents, obfuscates the central issues, and altogether ignores the practical realities . . . that have led nearly every lower court to reject its simplistic reasoning."

Some who complain about the current climate of criticism point to the bizarre example of Justice Tom Parker of the Alabama Supreme Court, who recently castigated his colleagues for following the ruling of the Supreme Court in Roper, which prohibited use of the death penalty for 16- and 17-year-old murderers, but there is a good ending to this story from my home state. Not only did the other members of the Alabama court faithfully apply Roper, with which many of them disagreed, but Justice Parker's political gambit failed miserably. He ran for chief justice of Alabama, aligned with his mentor, former Chief Justice Roy Moore, who ran for governor; both were trounced in the Republican primary. Their twisted ideas of opposing activist decisions by defying judicial decrees went nowhere, even in a state with a shameful history of defiance of federal authority. The Alabama justices who did their duty all prevailed in their primary contests. Alabama has come a long way since the days of Governor Wallace standing in the schoolhouse door.

There have been recent and reprehensible incidents of violence and threats against judges, but we should not forget that those kinds of terrible crimes have occurred before. I work, for example, in the former chambers of the late Judge Robert Vance, who was murdered by a mail bomber in 1989. These offenses typically involve disgruntled litigants or dangerous criminals, not harsh critics of the judiciary as a whole. I am grateful that Congress reacted swiftly to these recent threats by providing home security systems for federal judges, which suggests that the public still appreciates the need for an independent judiciary.

The judiciary has rendered some unjust decisions that deserved harsh rebuke. The judiciary is not perfect. The twin evils of slavery and segregation were, to say the least, exacerbated by two decisions of the Supreme Court. Justice John Marshall Harlan's dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson was prophetic: "In my opinion, the judgment this day rendered will, in time, prove to be quite as pernicious as the decision made by this tribunal in the Dred Scott Case." The judgment of history has been equally unkind to the decision in Korematsu v. United States.

Many who complain about criticisms of the judiciary concede that some criticism of judicial decisions is fair. That assessment is too mild. Occasionally criticism of judicial decisions is essential to the progress of our constitutional republic. That was true when Lincoln opposed Dred Scott, and it was true when Thurgood Marshall, as an attorney, urged the court to depart from Plessy.

Many Americans today believe that more recent decisions of the court are also terribly wrong. Some decry the flaws of criminal sentencing systems and the propensity to incarcerate low-risk offenders, while others lambaste sentences that appear to be lenient. On these fronts, citizens are more, not less, likely to respect the rule of law when they know that the law can be criticized and changed by ordinary political processes. Readers of this publication need no reminder about the potential for judicial abuse. Time and again, the business community has turned to Congress and state legislatures to reform tort laws, class actions and securities litigation, to name a few. These efforts are a healthy part of our democratic process and a recognition of the fallibility of the judiciary.

DOJ_NMG_0074629

Judges must do more than respond to criticisms; we must exercise restraint. Judges have a unique responsibility to safeguard our independence. It is not too much for us to look in the mirror and ask whether some criticisms are fair. As Justice Harlan explained in Plessy, "[T]he courts best discharge their duty by executing the will of the lawmaking power, constitutionally expressed, leaving the results of legislation to be dealt with by the people through their representatives." Perhaps, even today, we sometimes fail in that limited duty.

Alexander Hamilton explained in Federalist No. 78 that judges exercise "neither FORCE nor WILL, but merely judgment." Hamilton's point was that we must depend upon the persuasiveness of our written opinions to command the respect of our fellow citizens. In that way, we have the foremost responsibility of safeguarding our independence.

Mr. Pryor is a member of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit. In 2003, while serving as attorney general of Alabama, he prosecuted and removed Roy Moore from his state judicial office based on his misconduct in defying a federal injunction.

In Wake Of Changes, Seniors Urged To Revisit Medicare Drug Plans (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The rollout of Medicare prescription drug plans for 2007 last week was heralded by federal officials as a trifecta of good news: low premiums, more choices and better coverage, particularly in the feared "coverage gap."

Health care analysts and consumer advocates have a different view: The lowest premiums, sought by healthy seniors who join the program to avoid future penalties, will rise exponentially. Additional choices mean that beneficiaries in all but two states will have to choose from more than 50 plans. And most of the "gap coverage" will be for generic drugs only. Currently, 94% of beneficiaries in the program face a gap from the time they have paid about $750 until they've paid $3,600.

For these and other reasons, millions of seniors and people with disabilities are being urged to re-examine the plan they chose for this year and compare plans again.

"The right plan for someone in 2006 might not be the right plan in 2007," says Tricia Neuman of the Kaiser Family Foundation, a health research organization. "The concern is that products are changing, but seniors won't."

Medicare officials unveiled details about the program's second year last week, including the number of plans to be offered, premiums, deductibles and types of coverage. They emphasized that average monthly premiums will stay below $24, far less than the $37 originally projected. At the same time, they said, companies are adding new forms of coverage.

"Competition is working," said Mark McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. "They are adding plans that people want."

Companies began marketing those plans Sunday. Further details, including the drugs covered and the co-payments, will emerge later this month. Enrollment begins Nov. 15 for the year beginning Jan. 1.

"There could be a lot of changes, and every Medicare beneficiary is going to have to go back and recalculate what is best for them," says Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm.

Among the changes that beneficiaries will need to watch out for:

•The lowest monthly premium is rising to $9.50 in New York, up from $1.87 in seven Midwestern states in 2006. (Puerto Rico will have a $1.90 plan.) Some states' lowest price will be close to $20.

•The number of plans will rise by 30%. Beneficiaries in most states will have between 50 and 60 to choose from. New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia will have more than 60. Only Alaska and Hawaii will have fewer than 50.

•Far more plans will cover some drugs in the coverage gap — about 15 such plans per state. Only 2% of plans, however, will offer complete coverage in the gap for all brand-name drugs, and the cost is going up. This year, monthly premiums for such coverage averaged $61. Next year, the average will be $100, with a high of $136.

And unlike this year, when such plans were offered in 46 states, only 37 will have them next year.

Karen Ignagni, president of the American Association of Health Plans, says seniors should "take a very close look at all of their choices."

Officials Scale Back Rx-benefit Outreach (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0074630

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 4, 2006

With the next sign-up period for the Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit just weeks away, beneficiaries will not see an outreach campaign of the same scale as the effort employed by the Bush administration and the private sector during the program's inaugural year.

The onslaught of paid advertising, national news coverage and public events featuring President Bush and senior administration officials is not going to be repeated during this go around, according to federal Medicare representatives.

In addition, the broad coalition that bolstered the government's efforts to promote Part D does not plan to spend nearly as much on advertising and public relations this year.

Rather than introducing a brand-new benefit to Medicare's 43 million beneficiaries, the administration, healthcare groups and senior-citizens' groups such as the AARP will be applying more focused strategies, particularly targeting low-income beneficiaries who haven't signed up.

The poorest beneficiaries are eligible for comprehensive and practically free drug coverage but proved the hardest to sign up for 2006.

Administration officials insist that they have learned the right lessons from the first year. Yet critics caution that glitches might resurface.

The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) says it has enhanced the information that will be available to beneficiaries online and through its toll-free hotline.

The federal government's outreach program "will be very broad and very deep," said Kathleen Harrington, the director of CMS's Office of External Affairs. Springboarding off of last year's major campaign "will certainly give us an opportunity" to use a more targeted approach, she said.

The enrollment period begins Nov. 15 and lasts six weeks, compared to the six months Medicare beneficiaries had to sign up for the first year of the program. Those who want to keep the plans they already have do not have to take any action.

The administration says that it will utilize the infrastructure that it established last year, which combined the government's resources with those of state authorities, senior-citizens' groups, pharmacists, physicians and others who regularly interact with older people.

CMS's budget for Part D outreach is about one-sixth of what it had to spend for the 2006 sign-up period, Harrington said. The agency does not plan to air any ads on national television, though it will buy print ads and will use radio spots to reach Hispanic and African-American audiences.

Like CMS, the Medicare Rx Education Network also plans to scale back its activities, spokespeople said. The group is a diverse coalition backed by the drug industry, physicians, disease-advocacy groups and organizations like the AARP.

"Our effort is clearly not as large as it was previously," said John Jonas, the senior partner at Patton Boggs who heads the firm's healthcare group and represents the network. Because the program has been in existence for a year already, outreach for 2007 "doesn't require the same effort," he said. Moreover, he said, there was "a lot of dollars last year [that are] not available now."

"It's less of 'Medicare Part D 101,'" observed Eugenia Edwards, a senior public policy specialist at Patton Boggs.

Jonas and Edwards emphasized that the network would concentrate its resources on the low-income population. "It's really important to find these people," Edwards said.

The AARP says it is poised to make an aggressive push to reach out to low-income beneficiaries. "We're redoubling our efforts to reach those who need this the most," said Mark Kitchens, AARP's director of media relations.

The group does not currently plan to run national television ads but will buy space in community newspapers in cities with high numbers of low-income Medicare beneficiaries, such as Miami, Houston and Chicago. The AARP also will publicize the enrollment period in its own magazine, which the group boasts has the highest circulation of any publication in the world.

AARP state offices will assist people in their communities, and the group has a telephone hotline, Kitchens added.

One organization that has consistently criticized the structure of the drug benefit and the administration's handling of its implementation believes that beneficiaries are still going to need a lot of help, a spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0074631

Although the administration has a year of experience under its belt, the problems that surfaced last year should make beneficiaries cautious as they approach the program, said Maria Freese, director of government relations and policy at the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare.

Freese said that the biggest cause for concern is that CMS had difficulties last year providing accurate information about the drug plan options.

The "Medicare & You" handbook sent out last year contained errors, the CMS website used to compare drug plans was not always accurate, and the Government Accountability Office faulted CMS for the performance of its call center. The administration said at the time that all of those problems had been addressed.

Seniors need the best possible information to determine whether they are already in the most appropriate plan or to choose a plan for the first time. Last year's glitches "undermine[d] confidence in the system," Freese said. As for this year, she added, "You won't know until you get part way through the year and find out" whether the right choices were made.

Markets And Medicare (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

If you're looking for some good news from Washington, consider this semi-miracle: The Medicare prescription drug benefit is so far costing less than anticipated, while seniors are getting more insurance options at lower prices. Lesson: Maybe private competition works.

This doesn't mean we're changing our minds that the new drug entitlement was a policy mistake at an estimated long-term cost of $8 trillion, give or take a trillion. But now that the program exists, it matters whether it turns into another price-controlled, one-size-fits-all federal entitlement, or whether the seeds of market competition planted in the bill are allowed to grow.

The early returns are encouraging, on both price and choice. Over the weekend insurers began marketing their 2007 Medicare drug plans, and all states except Hawaii and Alaska have more than 50 private options available -- up from an average of about 40 in 2006. Seventeen insurers are selling nationwide plans, up from nine this year. That compares with the one or two that critics of including private plans predicted would be available in many markets.

The average monthly premium that seniors pay is again $24, far lower than the $37 originally estimated by government actuaries. And while Democrats have hammered away at the idea that having seniors choose among competing drug plans is too "confusing," recent polls show satisfaction with the benefit in the 80% range.

All of this would also seem to rebut the current Democratic campaign theme that having drug prices "negotiated" -- i.e., dictated -- by government is an urgent priority. Democrats point to the drug coverage provided by the Veteran's Administration as a model. But the VA usually keeps costs down by refusing to pay for newer, more effective medicines. The VA drug formulary includes only 19% of the medicines approved by the FDA since 2000.

One of our fears about the drug program is that it will devolve into price controls, thus destroying incentives for research and development as European governments have done. It would be a cruel irony if the Medicare drug benefit were to have the effect of delaying the cure for, say, Alzheimer's. Yet this is where Democrats seem to want to go.

Which brings us to the private delivery of Medicare as a whole. For the moment, the bulk of such Medicare services as doctor and hospital visits are covered by a price-fixing bureaucracy no more efficient than any other system of socialized medicine. At some $600 billion, the Medicare budget is larger than the GDP of all but a few nations.

The better option is a so-called premium support model, in which the government would simply help seniors buy private insurance. Our main disappointment with the 2003 bill was the Republican failure to use the drug benefit carrot to reform Medicare along these lines. But at least the law did strengthen the existing private options in Medicare.

The old Medicare Plus Choice program has been renamed Medicare Advantage and is growing impressively. As of July about 17% of Medicare beneficiaries were choosing a comprehensive private insurance program under Medicare Advantage (rather than pay the hodgepodge of premiums for Parts A, B and D) -- up from about 14% late last year. Medicare Advantage also isn't merely an HMO program anymore; a growing number of plans offer see-any-doctor, out-of-network benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0074632

Ideally, a future Medicare program would offer premium support so retirees can take the private insurance they have during their working years into retirement and through old age. A successful Medicare Advantage program will do a lot to help people understand why that's an attractive option.

However, this is also the reason that many Democrats hate Medicare Advantage. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi accuses it, inaccurately, of "catering to the HMOs," and the Clinton Administration tried to strangle its private predecessor in the crib by squeezing government payments. The government already pays for about half the health care delivered in the U.S., and those who favor European-style health care have been counting on the demographics of an aging population and an unreformed Medicare program to move America further toward that goal.

Mark McClellan, the Bush appointee who has done so well in supervising the Medicare drug launch, is about to step down, so the choice of his successor will be crucial to keeping this market momentum. All the more so if Democrats take the House or Senate, where Henry Waxman, Pete Stark and others wait to do whatever it takes to show that the free market can't work in health care.

We'd have thought Republicans would be trumpeting the success of market competition in producing more choices and lower prices in Medicare, but instead most of them are merely advertising the new entitlement. Even they seem not to understand the stakes in making competition in Medicare work.

Education Dept. Urged To Recoup $278 Million In Loan Subsidies (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

The federal Department of Education will have to decide whether to seek to recover hundreds of millions of dollars in student loan subsidy payments to a loan company that the department's inspector general has found were improper.

In a report released late last week, the inspector general recommended that the department recover $278 million paid to Nelnet, a student lender based in Lincoln, Neb. The payments were made under a program that guarantees a 9.5 percent interest rate on some loans regardless of prevailing market rates.

The subsidies were offered in the 1980's to support the federal student loan program at a time when market interest rates were higher. But as interest rates fell to historic lows in recent years, the subsidy program offered a way for lenders to earn higher-than-market returns.

Since some payments continue under the program, which has been criticized by lawmakers and student advocates, the report warned that the government might improperly pay $882 million more to Nelnet unless the department took action. The inspector general gave Nelnet 30 days to respond to the report.

Nelnet challenged the report's findings. Mike Dunlap, chairman and co-chief executive of the company, said, "We will continue to seek a resolution of this matter with the department and will also examine all other available remedies that prove the merits of our position."

Katherine McLane, press secretary for the Education Department, said it was "reviewing the report and will consider Nelnet's response before issuing a decision."

An audit by the inspector general's office found that through a series of financing moves, Nelnet increased the size of its portfolio of loans eligible for the guaranteed interest rate to nearly $3.7 billion in June 2004, from $551 million in March 2003. The report found that the increased amount of loans "was ineligible to be billed under the 9.5 percent floor." Representative George Miller of California, the senior Democrat on the House education committee, said the department should recover the payments.

"We must be vigilant about ensuring that available tax dollars are used to provide affordable college loans to families, not to provide excessive subsidies to banks," he said.

Michael Dannenberg, director of education policy at the New America Foundation, a nonpartisan public policy research institute in Washington, said, "When a student loan company like Nelnet rips off taxpayers on college loans, students and families end up with less" financial aid.

DOJ_NMG_0074633

Congress tried to eliminate the 9.5 percent guarantee in the early 1990's, but some lenders were allowed to keep collecting the higher interest rates.

"This is a typical story of a complicated program hidden from the scrutiny of taxpayers who are getting ripped off," said Luke Swarthout, higher education advocate at U.S. Public Interest Research Group in Washington. "To really solve this problem requires the Department of Education to stop payment on these illicit 9.5 percent loans and to demand repayment for subsidies that were wrongly charged."

Democrats Renew Efforts To Block Lawmakers' Pay Raise (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 4, 2006

Democrats are renewing their vow to impede the annual congressional pay raise until the minimum wage is increased, but their options for a successful block during the lame-duck session likely depend on the outcome of the Nov. 7 midterm election.

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) was the latest senior Democrat to reiterate his party's intention to oppose the cost-of-living increase lawmakers have received automatically for more than a decade until the minimum wage is raised for the first time since 1997.

"It's not a threat, it's a promise. Until minimum-wage workers get an increase in pay, Congress is not going to get an increase in pay," Durbin said at a press conference last Thursday sponsored by the AFL-CIO and ACORN (Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now).

Durbin was joined by Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), whose bill to tie future minimum-wage increases to congressional pay raises has attracted increasing Democratic focus since its spring introduction. Durbin declined to offer details of how Democrats plan to stave off members' 2 percent hike. Traditionally, it is thwarted only with an amendment to an appropriations bill.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), said in an e-mail that Democrats have not abandoned their pledge to fight members' raises despite the lack of progress on a minimum-wage vote before the election.

"Hard work still deserves fair pay, and Democrats still think Congress shouldn't get a raise unless the American people get one first," Manley said. "We will continue to pursue all our options in the lame duck."

The Democratic effort to tie member pay to the minimum wage even after the election signals to core allies in labor and community groups that Democratic leaders believe the issue transcends politics — that "it is in concrete how important this is to" them, in the words of Chuck Loveless, legislative director for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME).

Yet political considerations are likely to determine how far Democrats can take their quest to impede the pay raise, or if the issue gets addressed at all, appropriations experts and supporters of the effort said.

"If you know you're in the minority and you're going to remain in the minority, you've got few options for winning on the minimum wage," said Scott Lilly, a longtime Democratic staff director on the House Appropriations Committee and now a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress. "Tying this pay increase to it is more of a strategy you would be focused on if you thought you couldn't proceed for a straight increase in the minimum wage."

Conversely, Lilly added, a Democratic takeover of one or both houses likely would curtail the lame-duck session as Republicans turn their attention to new leadership elections. "If Republicans lose the House, they will probably be here in November for about a half-hour," he said.

James Dyer, a former GOP House Appropriations staff director turned Clark & Weinstock lobbyist, concurred with that prediction.

"I think the bottom line is, they're going to wait and see how the elections go," Dyer said. "If Democrats took one or more houses, the process [of raising the minimum wage] could be booted to January."

Dyer recalled that senior Democrats and Republicans hailed the 1989 passage of the Ethics in Government Act that made lawmakers' cost-of-living increases automatic. Members gave up their limited ability to earn outside income as part of that agreement, he said, making any permanent changes to the pay raise process – such as the Clinton-Kennedy bill — a potentially dicey proposition on both sides of the aisle.

DOJ_NMG_0074634

"This is a painful issue. It's not as black-and-white as whether you're going to provide folks with an increase in the minimum wage," Dyer said.

The House has considered an amendment from Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) to block the annual member raise, though a vote on Matheson's actual language was procedurally prevented. More Republicans sided with Matheson than did members of his own party, with 92 GOP members and 74 Democrats voting no in June.

The Senate has yet to address any challenges to the members' raise, historically done in the Treasury Department appropriations bill. One Senate Democratic aide said leaders are reluctant to tip their hand because they want to preserve their parliamentary options, not because they want to unleash a surprise strategy.

The aide mentioned the Senate's rarely invoked Rule 14, which allows any member to bring a bill straight onto the Senate's legislative calendar. The Clinton-Kennedy minimum wage bill remains under committee jurisdiction, but another bill calling for a straight minimum-wage increase has been on the Senate calendar since last year.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), who only agrees to accept pay raises after he is newly reelected, is proceeding with his plans to force a vote on the issue. "As I have done in the past, I will look for every opportunity to make senators vote on raising their own pay, and I will support any other efforts that will accomplish the same thing," Feingold said through a spokesman.

Feingold's bid to hold down member salaries saw surprising success last year, when senators agreed to forfeit their raises as a symbolic gesture after Hurricane Katrina, but the pay-raise block was stripped during conference talks.

House Democrats, meanwhile, continue to call on the 48 Republicans who pushed their leadership earlier this year for a vote on the minimum-wage increase to sign a discharge petition to force a vote on Rep. George Miller's (D-Calif.) wage hike bill. The only two GOP members on the petition, Reps. Christopher Shays (Conn.) and Jim Leach (Iowa), attached their names in July.

House GOP leaders still must address the minimum-wage increase attached to its Labor, Health and Human Services appropriations bill. Dyer offered a solution to that roadblock: "What Republicans could do, if they wanted to play hardball, is ask the Appropriations Committee to produce an omnibus that didn't have [the minimum wage] on it."

That move, in turn, could force Senate Democrats to filibuster an omnibus appropriations bill as part of any drive to block this year's member pay raise. AFL-CIO legislative director Bill Samuel recalled the narrow defeat of an early 2004 omnibus filibuster over new rules for overtime pay, another key labor concern.

"The question is if [the minimum wage and pay raise debate] comes down to filibustering an omnibus appropriations bill. It's difficult; we tried it," Samuel said. "But I think there will be a lot of energy behind [this year's fight]."

Senators Ask For Pension Agency Probe (AP-Y)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, October 3, 2006

Two senators are asking Congress to find out whether the federal agency that insures private pension plans for millions of Americans has enough money and the right approach to do its job.

Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, and the panel's top-ranking Democrat, Max Baucus, D-Mont., said Tuesday they want the Government Accountability Office to report back by early next year with preliminary information on the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., which insures traditional, defined benefit pension plans.

Bankrupt steel and airline companies that have transferred pension responsibilities to the PBGC have been a major factor in the growing demands placed on the agency and its swollen debt.

At the end of 2005, the agency recorded a deficit of $22.8 billion.

In their letter to the GAO, the senators said that 80 percent of all claims against the PBGC have come since 2000.

In 2000, the agency paid benefits of $900 million to 243,000 people. Five years later, PBGC was paying $3.7 billion in benefits to 698,000 people, the senators wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0074635

"This rapid increase in participants, benefit payments and investments would be a challenge to any organization," the senators wrote. "We are particularly concerned in how PBGC is handling this challenge and whether legislative changes are needed in PBGC's structure, appropriations or law."

President Bush in August signed a bill to help the nation's troubled pension system by shoring up funding for traditional pensions. Supporters hope the changes will prevent a costly taxpayer bailout of the PBGC.

PBGC's operations are financed by insurance premiums paid by companies that sponsor traditional pension plans. It also earns money from investments and receives funds from pension plans it takes over. The agency is not funded through tax revenues.

The fear, however, has been that a taxpayer-funded bailout could happen at some point if the private pension system wasn't overhauled by Congress.

Separately, PBGC said Tuesday that it has taken responsibility for a pension plan covering more than 1,600 workers and retirees of Levitz Home Furnishing Inc. of Woodbury, N.Y. The agency said that the takeover of the plan will have no material effect on its balance sheet.

___

On the Net:

PBGC: http://www.pbgc.gov/

Labor Board Eases Supervisor Rule (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

In three widely anticipated decisions, the National Labor Relations Board opened the door for some employers to classify more workers as supervisors and exclude them from union representation. The decisions outraged unions, but didn't go as far as business groups had hoped.

In the main decision, by a 3-2 vote, the five-member board said nurses who independently assigned staff based on such things as patient conditions, and were involved in such decision-making more than 15% of their time regularly, should be considered supervisors and exempt from collective-bargaining protections.

At issue in the cases, which stemmed from union organizing attempts, were U.S. labor-law provisions that state workers who use "independent judgment" in a "nonroutine" manner to assign or direct other employees, should be considered supervisors, even if they don't have employees who report directly to them. Supervisors aren't guaranteed collective-bargaining rights under the law. A broader interpretation could exclude more workers.

Labor experts said the decisions were likely to result in more nurses and other workers being classified as supervisors. But its application to other industries is difficult to predict, in part because the responsibilities of workers can vary widely across industries and even workplaces, said John Raudabaugh, a partner at Baker & McKenzie LLP in Chicago, who served as a board member from 1990 to 1993.

In other professions, such as movie production, certain factors not considered in the rulings, such as collaborative decision making, could be central to deciding who is a supervisor, he said. "I think it has great weight in health care, but it remains to be seen how it is applied in other industrial settings," he said.

The decisions, which were expected to favor employers at a board controlled by Bush administration appointees, could at a minimum hinder labor's chances of organizing workers in the fast-growing health-care sector. Business groups generally applauded the decision in the lead case, concerning nurses at Oakwood Healthcare Inc. in Taylor, Mich., saying the board clarified the standard it uses to determine such issues as what it means to use independent judgment when assigning work for other employees.

But in two cases, the board disagreed with employer arguments and found that nurses at a nursing home and lead workers at a manufacturer weren't supervisors because they either didn't have the authority to assign other workers or followed company policies in a routine manner when they directed other workers and didn't have the ability to discipline workers who performed poorly. "I'm pleased with the standard but disappointed in the result" of the other two cases, said Steve Bokat, executive vice president of the litigation center at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

DOJ_NMG_0074636

In one case, the board found that nurses at Golden Crest Healthcare Center in Hibbing, Minn., didn't have the authority to assign other nurses. Similarly, in the third case, lead workers including load supervisors who work in the shipping department loading trucks at Croft Metals Inc., based in McComb, Miss., didn't use judgment deemed independent enough to qualify as supervisory, the board found.

Economists said it was hard to predict how the decisions might affect factors such as labor costs. If employers tried to make certain workers qualify as supervisors by creating new responsibilities for them, they would risk incurring other costs as a result of lost productivity should workers turn down such work, said Lonnie Golden, an associate professor of economics and labor studies at Penn State-Abington.

The AFL-CIO and other labor groups blasted the board, saying the decisions opened the door for millions of workers to lose the right to join a union and imperiled the status of other workers who are already union members. Under labor law, the decisions can't be directly appealed, but the labor federation said it will litigate the same issues in other cases pending before the board and push for a legislative fix to the law.

Rose Ann DeMoro, executive director of the California Nurses Association, called the decisions "horrendous," and said it would cause nurses to turn down work as charge nurses and trigger protests by nurses across the country. "Ultimately what this has done is redefine a 'registered nurse,'" she said.

Board Redefines Rules For Union Exemption (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

In a decision condemned by unions but praised by business, the National Labor Relations Board issued a ruling yesterday that will exempt registered nurses — and many other workers — from union membership if they have certain kinds of supervisory duties.

Some labor experts predicted that the ruling could affect more than eight million workers who might also be deemed supervisors, including teachers who oversee aides. The board's 3-to-2 decision involved nurses overseeing shifts at a Michigan hospital.

But in two related cases, the board ruled that workers with limited supervisory duties were not supervisors.

Labor unions have long feared such a decision, so much so that, in an unusual move, they held demonstrations at the labor board's offices in July to urge it not to issue an expansive ruling that would exempt many workers from union coverage.

In the majority decision, the three Republicans on the board adopted a broad definition of supervisor, saying it included workers who assigned others to a location, shift or significant tasks, like a nurse overseeing a shift who might assign another nurse to a particular patient.

The majority ruled that workers should generally be deemed supervisors, exempt from union membership, if they oversaw another employee and could be held accountable if that subordinate performed poorly. The majority also ruled that workers could be deemed supervisors if they were assigned supervisory duties just 10 percent to 15 percent of their total work time.

In a stinging dissent, the two Democrats on the board, Wilma B. Liebman and Dennis P. Walsh, wrote, "Today's decision threatens to create a new class of workers under federal labor law: workers who have neither the genuine prerogatives of management, nor the statutory rights of ordinary employees."

The dissenters asserted that most of the nation's more than 20 million professional workers could fall into that category because many professionals, like a doctor overseeing nurses or a lawyer overseeing a secretary, could be deemed supervisors under the board's new guidelines.

The case focused on workers who did not perform functions like hiring, promoting or laying off workers, but rather assigning and directing other employees — functions in which the supervisory role was more ambiguous. The board's majority emphasized that to be considered a supervisor, workers had to exercise independent judgment, although it adopted a more expansive view of such judgment than previous labor boards had.

DOJ_NMG_0074637

The majority comprised the chairman, Robert J. Battista; Peter C. Schaumber; and Peter N. Kirsanow.

Steve Bokat, general counsel for the United States Chamber of Commerce, said the decision did not go as far as business had wanted, adding that estimates that millions of workers would be exempted from union coverage were "outrageous numbers."

"I think it's a good test that the majority has laid out," Mr. Bokat said, "a reasonable test, one that employers and their counsel can apply."

John J. Sweeney, the president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., said the ruling "welcomes employers to strip millions of workers of their right to have a union by reclassifying them as supervisors, in name only."

Organized labor said the ruling continued a trend in which President Bush and the labor board had exempted groups of workers from union coverage, including graduate teaching assistants, disabled workers and many Defense Department employees.

The board's ruling interprets a 2001 Supreme Court decision in which Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for a 5-to-4 majority, asserted that the labor board, then dominated by appointees of President Clinton, had adopted too strict a test in deciding when workers were supervisors.

Yesterday's decision could exclude many retail workers, like department heads in supermarkets or discount stores, from joining unions. The majority wrote, "The assignment of an employee to a certain department (e.g., housewares) or to a certain shift (e.g., night) or to certain significant overall tasks (e.g., restocking shelves) would generally qualify" as having the supervisory responsibility of assigning.

The decision also stated, "If a person on the shop floor has 'men under him,' and if that person decides 'what job shall be undertaken next or who shall do it,' that person is a supervisor, provided that the direction is both 'responsible' " and "carried out with independent judgment."

William B. Gould IV, who was board chairman under Mr. Clinton, said the decision's "shift in statutory interpretation is a seismic one." Mr. Gould said that with the board setting forth rules on what employers must do to prove that employees are supervisors, "the potential for manipulation is substantial."

The board's main decision yesterday involved Oakwood Heritage Hospital, an acute care facility in Taylor, Mich., with 257 beds and 181 registered nurses. The decision focused on a dozen nurses who worked in intensive care, medical/surgical and other units, and oversaw several other nurses, nurses' aides and technicians.

The union that sought to represent them, the United Automobile Workers, asserted that they should not be deemed supervisors on the ground that their supervisory duties were minor and routine, and required so little independent judgment. But the hospital argued that they should be considered supervisors on the ground that they assigned nurses and nurses' aides to particular patients and directed them by giving them specific responsibilities, all while using independent judgment.

Another board decision released yesterday involved some 30 "lead persons" working for Croft Metals, a door and window factory in McComb, Miss. The board ruled that the company had not established that these workers exercised independent judgment in directing their crews. The board suggested that their judgment was simply routine.

A third decision involved the Golden Crest Healthcare Center, a nursing home in Hibbing, Minn. The board ruled that the employer had not established that the nurses in charge had met the definition of assigning or directing other workers. It found that the nursing home had failed to show that those nurses were held accountable when their subordinates failed to perform properly.

Pamela Thompson, chief executive of the American Organization of Nurse Executives, an industry organization, said, "Since hospital staffing can vary, not only hospital to hospital but hour by hour, this decision will play out differently hospital by hospital."

Some Workers Change Collars (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

The National Labor Relations Board ruled yesterday that nurses with full-time responsibility for assigning fellow hospital workers to particular tasks are supervisors under federal labor law and thus not eligible to be represented by unions.

DOJ_NMG_0074638

The 3-to-2 decision, long awaited by unions and businesses, sets a new standard for determining who is a supervisor in the modern economy, and could have significant implications for efforts by labor unions to organize nurses in the fast-growing health-care sector. Under federal law, supervisors do not have the right to belong to unions.

Labor leaders decried the ruling, with AFL-CIO President John Sweeney saying it "welcomes employers to strip millions of workers of their right to have a union by reclassifying them as 'supervisors' in name only." The labor-backed Economic Policy Institute said the new definition could affect 8 million workers who give direction to fellow workers in fields ranging from construction to accounting.

Business organizations applauded the decision, arguing that it will not have sweeping effects. "The business community thinks the standard is reasonable, but this is not a sea change," said Steve Bokat of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The dispute, involving Oakwood Healthcare Inc., is one of many cases in a contentious area of labor law that have awaited a ruling since 2001, when the Supreme Court took issue with the NLRB's interpretation under the Clinton administration of what constitutes a supervisor. Since then, control of the NLRB has shifted to Republicans, who hold three of the five positions.

The case concerns Oakwood Heritage Hospital in suburban Detroit, where the United Auto Workers is trying to organize 181 registered nurses. The hospital had argued that 127 of the nurses -- two-thirds of the potential bargaining unit -- should be deemed supervisors and thus ineligible for union representation.

The NLRB disqualified only 12 of the nurses from belonging to the bargaining unit -- all full-time "charge nurses" whom the board deemed to be supervisors because of their responsibility for assigning and directing other workers on their shifts. But AFL-CIO associate general counsel Craig Becker argued that the decision was broader than it appeared, leaving room for nurses who rotate only temporarily through the job of charge nurse to be disqualified as well. And Barbara Medvec, senior vice president of Oakwood Healthcare, said the hospital will likely ask the NLRB to rule that another 115 nurses are supervisors for that reason.

The ruling defines workers as supervisors if they give assignments to other workers, if they are held responsible for the performance of those assignments and if they exercise independent judgment rather than follow an employer's detailed instructions. NLRB members Wilma B. Liebman and Dennis P. Walsh, the only Democrats on the board, argued in dissent that the definition was so broad it "threatens to create a new class of workers under Federal labor law: workers who have neither the genuine prerogatives of management, nor the statutory rights of ordinary employees."

Bokat likened the unions' warnings to "Chicken Little saying 'the sky is going to fall.' " He pointed out that the NLRB, in applying the new definition to two other pending cases, found in both that the workers in question were not supervisors. Those two cases concerned charge nurses at Golden Crest Healthcare Center, a long-term care facility in Minnesota, and team leaders at Croft Metals Inc., a window manufacturer in Mississippi. "The result speaks for itself," Bokat said. "We were kind of disappointed."

Nurses who work only occasionally as charge nurses could be disqualified from joining unions under the decision, according to the AFL-CIO's Becker. He noted that the ruling defines a supervisor as an employee who spends "a regular and substantial portion of his/her work time performing supervisory functions." But the decision defines "regular" as meaning "according to a pattern or schedule" and "substantial" as "at least 10-15 percent of their total work time."

"If the next employer comes forward with evidence that someone is a charge nurse in one of every three shifts or one out of every four weeks, that would meet the definition of a pattern or schedule," he said.

University of Tennessee labor law professor Jeff Hirsch said the decision is important because the lines between workers and supervisors are blurring throughout the economy.

"You have far more workers who have a lot more responsibility than they did when the National Labor Relations Act was passed almost 60 years ago," he said. "It's not just a production factory floor with people punching out widgets. It's a much more skilled economy."

U.S. Ruling Could Eliminate Union Eligibility For Millions (LAT)

By Molly Selvin

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074639

A federal labor agency Tuesday broadened its definition of who is a supervisor, in a ruling that could keep millions of skilled employees from joining unions and accelerate a decades-long decline in union membership.

In a long-awaited decision, the Republican-controlled National Labor Relations Board held that nurses could be classified as supervisors if they directed and oversaw other nurses.

Under federal law, employees defined as supervisors aren't entitled to legal protections ensuring their right to join unions.

The labor board's definition could be applied to other kinds of workers, particularly in the fast-growing service sector, where unions have made some gains in recent years even as overall union membership has declined nationally, labor experts said.

Even before the ruling, many employers had classified more of their workers as supervisors, in part to avoid paying them overtime. For example, many employees of restaurants, retailers and other businesses have been classified as "shift supervisors" even though most of their duties — such as waiting on tables or cashiering — are indistinguishable from those they supervise.

In recent years, several large retailers, including Home Depot Inc., Abercrombie & Fitch Co. and Staples Inc., have been targets of lawsuits by nonunion employees claiming they were denied overtime pay because they were classified as supervisors, even though only a small fraction of their responsibilities involved supervision.

Harley Shaiken, a UC Berkeley professor who studies labor issues, said as many as 135 cases pending before the labor board, many in the service sector and high-tech fields, could be affected by Tuesday's ruling.

"The notion of supervision in an Internet age is a lot blurrier than when we're talking about an assembly line or a stamping plant," he said.

The ruling was applauded by business organizations but denounced by labor groups, which called it part of a Bush administration strategy to destroy unions.

"It's an outrageous decision," said Rose Ann DeMoro, executive director of the 70,000-member California Nurses Assn., which threatened to strike against hospitals that tried to enforce the new rule.

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said the board's decision would immediately deny as many as 8 million workers "their basic right to have a voice on the job."

Business groups said unions were overstating the ruling's effect.

The decision will probably affect primarily work sites where union organizing is going on, said Stephen A. Bokat, general counsel at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Where there are established collective bargaining relationships," he said, "these issues with regard to supervisors are very well established and I doubt most employers will totally upset their workplaces to meet that definition."

Kaiser Permanente, one of the state's largest employers of nurses, with 24,000 in California represented by two unions, said it would not take nurses out of their bargaining units who under the new ruling could be classified as supervisors.

Federal law defines supervisors as those whose jobs may require them to use "independent judgment" in the course of their duties, or have continuing responsibilities to "assign" or "responsibly direct" the activities of other employees. An employee can be considered a supervisor by performing any one of those duties — or by having the power to hire or fire.

In Tuesday's ruling, the labor board determined that the term "assign" could include dispatching an employee to a workstation, appointing an employee to a specific shift or to work overtime, or directing a nurse to care for a particular patient.

The five-member labor board issued rulings in three related cases. In the first, it voted 3 to 2 that permanent "charge" nurses at a Michigan acute care facility, who oversee staff, were supervisors. However, the board rejected the supervisor designation for charge nurses who rotate in and out of that job. The board's three Republicans voted in favor of the decision, with the two Democrats opposing it.

In the two other cases, the board found that employers did not provide enough evidence to determine whether charge nurses at a Minnesota nursing home or so-called lead workers at a Mississippi manufacturing plant should also be classified as supervisors.

The rulings were triggered by a 2001 U.S. Supreme Court decision directing the board to refine its definition of a supervisor. The court ruled that nurses and other healthcare workers were not entitled to join unions if their duties included supervising others.

It is unclear whether the board's action can be appealed.

DOJ_NMG_0074640

Nationwide, an estimated 400,000 nurses are represented by collective bargaining agreements, said Jennifer Coate, spokeswoman for the Nurse Alliance of the Service Employees International Union. It is unclear how many nurses will be affected by the board's decision.

DeMoro of the California Nurses Assn. said the ruling "opens the door to redefining every nurse as someone who uses professional judgment and is therefore ineligible for collective bargaining."

She said, "We intend to mount a full strike against any hospital that attempts to take rights away from registered nurses."

Workers classified as supervisors by their employers have been winning some legal battles in their bid to get overtime pay in nonunion settings. Abercrombie agreed in January to pay as much as $2 million to settle a suit filed on behalf of 250 California store managers, Longs Drug Stores Corp. paid $11 million to end two suits brought by 1,000 managers, and Countrywide Financial Corp. agreed last year to a $30-million settlement involving 400 employees. Several other cases are pending.

AFL-CIO President Sweeney said as many as 34 million workers and professionals, accounting for 23% of the labor force, would eventually fall within the scope of Tuesday's decision.

Union membership has fallen steadily in recent decades. In 2005, 15.7 million workers, or 12.5% of the labor force, were union members, according to government figures. That was down from 1983, when 1 in 5 workers — nearly 18 million — carried union cards.

Sweeney said the decision would accelerate that decline by creating a category of workers with neither the legal rights of employees nor "the prerogatives of management."

Richard Simmons, a Los Angeles lawyer who represents employers, said the decisions set forth "a more realistic standard and a more developed standard" than the board had previously adopted.

Employers will have to "look at what someone does," he said. "It doesn't mean that simply by ascribing the title of charge nurse to someone that they become a supervisor."

The latest decision follows other federal actions making it harder for unions to organize workers. In 2003, for example, the administration denied collective bargaining rights to newly federalized airport security screeners. In 2004, the labor board ruled that graduate assistants were students, not employees, and therefore not entitled to the protection of federal labor law.

NLRB Decision Angers Unions (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

The federal government yesterday established new guidelines for considering a worker a supervisor, a decision organized labor says will exclude millions of Americans from joining unions.

In a long-awaited health care case involving a group of "charge nurses" at a Michigan hospital, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) ruled the nurses should be considered supervisory staff and thus not covered by a federal law allowing them to join a union.

Charge nurses serve as a head shift nurse for a unit or ward and assign duties to other nurses. But they typically don't have the authority to hire and fire or perform evaluations on other employees, which union groups say is a vital benchmark for classifying an employee as a supervisor.

The decision was one of three related rulings grouped as the "Kentucky River" cases because they were intended to clarify the supervisor question from a case several years ago involving Kentucky River Community Care Inc. in Hazard, Ky.

Union leaders denounced the 3-2 decision, saying it would have broad implications for workers in many fields. The vote was split down party lines.

The AFL-CIO labor federation said the new ruling would strip at least 8 million workers of their right to have a union by reclassifying them as supervisors in name only.

"Today's decision is the latest in the Bush-appointed NLRB's legal maneuvering to deny as many workers as possible their basic right to have a voice on the job and improve their living standards through their union," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said. "The NLRB should protect workers' rights -- not eliminate them."

DOJ_NMG_0074641

Mr. Sweeney added the ruling "threatens to create a new class of workers under federal labor law: workers who have neither the genuine prerogatives of management, nor the statutory rights of ordinary employees."

The decision was not a surprise since Republicans have the majority on the five-member board, said Roland Zullo of the Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations at the University of Michigan.

"This is what happens when you have a political party in power that is just not friendly to labor -- you get decisions like this," Mr. Zullo. "Labor had more favorable decisions during the [President] Clinton administration."

Workers considered supervisors under the new definition can unionize, but management will be under no legal obligation to bargain with them, Mr. Zullo said.

Business praised the board's decision.

"The board has given a clear, reasonable and fair standard employers can apply in determining who is and who is not a supervisor," said Steve Bokat, general counsel for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Some accused labor activists of exaggerating the number of workers that will be affected by the ruling.

"The NLRB articulated a clear test of supervisory authority that is totally consistent with 70 years of statutory and decisional history," said Martin Payson, a New York lawyer with the Jackson Lewis law firm, which represents management in labor cases. "Relatively few people will be impacted," he said.

Labor groups also say the ruling gives employers another tool for fighting organizing efforts by threatening litigation.

"Every case now where an employer wants to drag it out for three years in the courts will be able to do so," said Jon Hiatt, general counsel for the AFL-CIO. "It's an invitation for employers to manipulate job duties."

Business also disputed the union's prediction the decision will lead to widespread litigation.

"The real lesson is that every individual whose job duties put their legal position in question should have their authority and responsibility spelled out in advance, by the employer, so as to avoid uncertainty," Mr. Payson said. "This will avoid what was predicted by the unions -- another decade of litigation."

The decision is expected to be appealed in the federal courts and could reach the Supreme Court, Mr. Payson said.

The question of which employees are considered supervisors has been the topic of debate between unions and employers for decades. The Supreme Court twice has overturned NLRB rulings on the matter.

"This has been a contested area that has see-sawed back and forth," Mr. Zullo said. "But board decisions do change, and if the politics shift, [the decision] could shift right back."

Fate Of Post Office Overhaul Is Up For Debate (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Sometimes it is small provisions that trip up big bills.

That was the case last week with compromise legislation that would overhaul the U.S. Postal Service. The bill's collapse also spawned differing opinions on whether it can be salvaged next month in a lame-duck session.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) is optimistic that the House and Senate will approve a postal bill. "We are going to get it done," Davis said yesterday, adding, "We are conceptually 99.9 percent of the way there."

But Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), a chief sponsor who will broker any compromise, is not as confident as Davis. "Unfortunately, at the eleventh hour, various parties raised objections to some of the bill's long-standing provisions, and these objections caused certain members of Congress to block passage of the legislation," Collins said in an e-mail yesterday from her home state.

"While I remain committed to the goal of passing the bill in the lame-duck session, I do not know if that will be possible," she wrote.

Efforts to overhaul operations of the Postal Service have been underway in Congress for a decade as big mailers have pleaded for a new rate structure that makes it easier for them to predict postage increases. The financial health of the Postal Service also has become a concern, as Americans expand their use of the Internet, e-mail and cellphones and send fewer first-class letters, an important source of revenue for the post office.

DOJ_NMG_0074642

Finding a legislative solution has been a complex effort. President Bush set up a postal commission to study possible changes, and business groups and outside experts floated their ideas. Enthusiasm for an overhaul has waxed and waned at postal headquarters.

Some of the proposed changes involve multibillion-dollar budget issues, such as how to handle costs for pensions and retiree health care. The White House gave in on one of its requests -- that the Postal Service pick up the tab for military pensions earned by postal workers. Under the compromise, the military portion of postal worker pensions will be paid out of the Treasury, as happens with other agencies. The Postal Service will use the savings to fund future retiree health-care benefits.

But the bill stalled on a relatively modest provision that would require a three-day waiting period before injured postal workers could begin accruing workers' compensation benefits. Employees would be expected to use vacation or sick leave for the first three days they were out of work and would be reimbursed for that time if they were unable to return after 14 days, congressional aides said.

The president of the National Association of Letter Carriers, William H. Young , unexpectedly announced that he would not accept the bill because no one had explained to him why the change was necessary.

Union spokesman Drew Von Bergen said the proposed workers' compensation change "would put postal employees in a different classification than other federal employees."

Under current law, injured federal employees receive "continuation of pay" for up to 45 days, and if their disability continues for more than that, they can receive additional compensation for lost wages after three days in a non-paid status.

Young wrote NALC members, "for the Bush administration, it is always easier to pick on those who are less fortunate than others." He wrote, "The nation's injured letter carriers and other postal employees were an easy mark."

Collins was dismayed by Young's action, congressional aides said. The NALC had not brought up the issue in three years of negotiations on the bill and had promised to support an overhaul of postal operations, the aides said.

Collins and the White House had backed off another workers' compensation provision opposed by the union, and Collins had negotiated solutions to issues raised by large mailers and postal competitors, such as UPS.

One troublesome area -- how to regulate postage rates for certain types of mail under a cap linked to the consumer price index and also provide an escape clause for exceptional circumstances -- was resolved to the satisfaction of big mailers and unions, lobbyists said.

"We were within a quarter-inch of getting it done Friday night," Davis said at a breakfast forum sponsored by the nonprofit Council for Excellence in Government and The Washington Post.

But some administration officials and some lobbyists think the postal overhaul could be dead, not only for this year but for two or three years, if control of Congress shifts in next month's congressional elections. They also doubt that Collins and the White House will give in to the NALC.

Still, one administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he participated in the discussions, noted that the bill has survived delays and attempts to kill it. "This has more lives than nine dead cats," he said.

OMB Welcomes Help From Anti-Pork Bloggers (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Call it the Office of Management and Blog-it.

The Office of Management and Budget is turning to bloggers for help in pushing the OMB's government reform plans after last week's success of its pet project, the Federal Funding Accountability and Transparency Act, also known as the Coburn-Obama bill.

The legislation envisions an online, searchable list of all federal government contracts and grants of more than $25,000. Such a window onto pork distribution would, said President Bush when he signed it, "increase accountability and reduce incentives for wasteful spending."

DOJ_NMG_0074643

Despite its bipartisan support, the bill earlier hit a wall when an unknown senator put a secret hold on it. Open-government bloggers leapt off the computer and onto the phone, calling all 100 senators -- minus Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), of course -- to unmask the culprit.

Heady stuff, reading rapid-fire postings as the mostly conservative blogmeisters narrowed the list in real time, flushing out the faceless holder: Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska).

Stevens's explanation -- mostly, that he wanted a cost-benefit analysis -- was lost in a hail of online gotchas, and he lifted his hold. To some Hill-watchers, outing the Senate's per capita pork champ was a "duh" moment. But to the OMB, bill sponsors and their blogger backers, it was sweet victory.

Bush signed the bill last week, flanked by the bloggers who had led the charge, including those from Porkbusters.org, Townhall.com, Instapundit.com and Human Events Online's Right Angle blog. Soon afterward, OMB Deputy Director Clay Johnson III spent an hour with the bloggers.

Right after that, OMB Director Rob Portman and Johnson appeared at a luncheon to talk about OMB's government performance push.

Portman also talked about the blogger fest, saying, "Clay asked them, 'Gee, since you're so good at this, can you help us on some of our other initiatives?' " When Johnson took the floor, he invoked the bloggers several times as weapons in his fight for government performance and accountability reforms.

"Senator Voinovich tried . . . to get a co-sponsor this year for a bill that called for that kind of performance evaluation, and Voinovich added that an employee had to be minimally successful to get a raise," Johnson said at one point, referring to George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio). "This is a no-brainer, right? He could not get a co-sponsor. . . . It might just make its way to the blog community."

But the blogosphere remains an unstable realm: At the height of the search for Stevens, a cry rose to abolish secret holds, which are often used for innocuous reasons, and at least one blogger demanded that the entire Senate be shut down until the holder was found.

OMB official Robert J. Shea seems to grasp that better than his bosses. Using bloggers as advocates, he mused, "could backfire."

Bayer's Duplicity On Drug Safety (NYT)

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

Bayer A.G.'s limp excuse for withholding data suggesting that a heart-surgery drug is dangerous won't wash. The failure by the German pharmaceutical giant to inform the Food and Drug Administration of the disquieting results of a large observational study cannot be sloughed off as a mere "mistake on the company's part."

Rather, the circumstances suggest that Bayer sought to hide the results of a contractor's study until some way could be found to discount them. It came clean only when forced to by a whistleblower.

The drug is Trasylol, which has long been used in heart surgery to reduce blood loss and the need for transfusions. Although extensive data seemed to document the drug's effectiveness and safety, two studies published this year found that it increased the risk of kidney failure, heart attack and stroke.

Even so, an F.D.A. advisory committee, after reviewing extensive data at a public meeting on Sept. 21, overwhelmingly concluded that Trasylol was still acceptably safe and effective for certain patients. The committee had not been told — because Bayer representatives who participated in the meeting kept mum — about the most recent large study the company had sponsored, which raised even more questions about the drug's safety.

After the fact, a whistleblower, possibly an outside researcher, reportedly called both the F.D.A. and Bayer to force full disclosure. Preliminary results of the suppressed study showed that Trasylol may increase the chance for death, serious kidney disease, congestive heart failure and strokes.

The company says it did not initially disclose this retrospective study of some 67,000 patients because it deemed the results preliminary and had significant questions about the methodology and populations of patients. That may be. But that cannot be an excuse for hiding the very existence of this study from an expert advisory panel convened to review the latest safety evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0074644

This incident underscores the importance of requiring drug companies to publicly register all safety studies so that they can't be suppressed later should their results displease the sponsor.

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Climbs From Depths (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 4, 2006

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average made history Tuesday, notching a record closing high that erases some, but not all, of the pain suffered by investors when stocks came crashing down after peaking in early 2000.

It took more than 61/2 years, but the Dow's comeback is complete.

The Dow, a Wall Street icon that dates to 1896, rallied 56.99 points Tuesday to close at 11,727.34, surpassing its prior record close of 11,722.98 hit on Jan. 14, 2000.

"The record's biggest significance is psychological," says Timothy Vick, senior portfolio manager at Sanibel Captiva Trust. "It arouses a lot of bullish sentiment."

The Dow record caps a 4,437-point comeback that began in October 2002 at the low point of the worst stock market decline since the Great Depression.

The record-setting session Tuesday for the USA's oldest stock barometer erased the nearly 38% loss the blue-chip average suffered in the three-year bear market that began in early 2000 after the technology stock bubble burst, wiping out $8.5 trillion of investor wealth.

Sparking the Dow's final sprint to a new peak is a bet by investors that the Federal Reserve will succeed in slowing the economy and keeping inflation at bay without causing a recession.

Also boosting stocks has been a nearly 25% drop in the price of crude oil since mid-July, including a $2.35 decline Tuesday to $58.68 a barrel, a nearly eight-month low.

The Dow, which also notched an intra-day record of 11,758.95 Tuesday, is up 9.4% in 2006.

The best performer for the Dow since its Jan. 14, 2000, peak is Altria Group, parent of tobacco giant Philip Morris, which gained 212%, says Ned Davis Research. Biggest laggard: computer-chip maker Intel, off 60%.

A fresh recovery high for the Dow, which tracks 30 big companies representative of U.S. business, does not erase all the losses suffered by investors during the market's 2000-02 swoon.

During the 1990s stock market boom, most people invested in either mutual funds that tracked the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index or highflying tech stocks, most of which traded on the Nasdaq. The S&P 500 remains 12.7% below its high. The Nasdaq is down 55.6%.

Dow's New Height Not As Giddy As The Last One (LAT)

By Tom Petruno

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

In less than seven years, the value of the typical U.S. home has risen 64%. The price of gold has doubled. The Russian stock market has rocketed nearly 800%.

And the Dow Jones industrial average just broke even.

The world's best-known stock index rose 56.99 points Tuesday to end at 11,727.34, finally topping the previous peak of 11,722.98 reached Jan. 14, 2000.

The day's advance, aided by another drop in oil prices, capped the Dow's long slog back from its 2000-2002 plunge, the worst in three decades.

DOJ_NMG_0074645

Stock market bulls say the index's comeback is a sign of optimism about the nation's economy, given that the Dow's giants — blue-chip names such as Boeing Co., McDonald's Corp. and Walt Disney Co. — account for a colossal chunk of business activity.

"You have everything in place for a continuing bull market," said Neil Hennessy, whose Marin County investment firm manages about $2 billion. He cites strong corporate earnings, steady interest rates, relatively low unemployment and falling energy prices.

Other Wall Street veterans see less to cheer in the Dow's revival. They read it as the final chapter in the market's recovery from the last recession, signaling that another downturn looms.

Blue chip stocks, they say, are winning by default because investors are running out of other viable moneymaking alternatives.

In the short term, however, the Dow's new high may add to the stock market's momentum.

"It's a ringing of the bell for Main Street. People think, 'Maybe I should get out of my money market fund. Maybe real estate isn't the only way to go with my bonus check this year,' " said Art Hogan, chief market analyst at brokerage Jefferies & Co. in Boston.

But no one is predicting a return to the heady days of early 2000, when stocks ruled the investment landscape.

Although volatile technology issues led the mania of the late 1990s, the Dow was no slouch. The 30-stock index rose at an astounding rate of 25% a year from 1995 through 1999 on average, and the sky seemed the limit as the economy boomed.

Financial authors outdid one another in breathlessly forecasting how high the index might soar. The books "Dow 36,000," "Dow 40,000" and, finally, "Dow 100,000" appeared on store shelves within the span of several months in 1999.

"It was the biggest [financial] mania in the history of the world," said Bill Fleckenstein, a Seattle money manager known for his dour outlook on the stock market.

And like all such manias, it finally exhausted itself. The downturn that began in 2000 was led by technology stocks, but the rest of the market tumbled as well. The situation worsened with the recession of 2001 and a plunge in corporate earnings.

In 2002, a wave of scandals involving Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other major companies was the final blow. The Dow sank 17% that year. When it hit bottom in October, the index had plummeted 38% from its peak — its worst loss since the early 1970s.

Amid the downturn, many once-eager blue-chip investors found better things to do with their money. They fled to real estate, commodities, foreign stocks and shares of small U.S. companies.

"A lot of investors got out of blue chips. Other things competed for dollars," said Dan Pemberton, a 66-year-old retiree in Thousand Oaks.

Like millions of other small investors, Pemberton in recent years was drawn to foreign stocks. The rise of emerging economies such as China and Russia lured capital and stoked excitement about the growth potential abroad.

Huge pools of investment capital such as the California Public Employees' Retirement System also gravitated to more exotic investments, including hedge funds, which are known for fast paced trading and chasing opportunities in obscure markets.

CalPERS had 46.4% of its assets in U.S. stocks, mostly blue chips, at the end of 1999. Now that proportion is just 40%.

Meanwhile, foreign stocks have risen from 18.8% of the fund's assets in 1999 to 22.8%; real estate investments have jumped from 4.7% to 7.4%.

For individual investors, little could compete with residential real estate after 2000. Home prices soared across the nation as mortgage rates plunged to generational lows.

And after losing untold billions of dollars in the collapse of technology shares after 2000, many Americans saw real estate as much more of a sure thing than stocks.

Now, however, the housing market has cooled. Nationwide, the median price of a previously owned single-family house declined in August from a year earlier, the first such dip in 11 years.

A sharp drop in many foreign stock markets in the spring, and similar slides in oil and other commodity prices in recent months, have intensified doubts about the wisdom of risking cash in those areas.

DOJ_NMG_0074646

"All of those other markets are beginning to lose their luster," said Robert Morris, director of stock investments at money manager Lord, Abbett & Co. in Jersey City, N.J.

The best argument in favor of the Dow stocks and other big-name issues is that they're inexpensive, said Michael Holland, head of investment firm Holland & Co. in New York.

Even though blue chip companies' earnings have risen sharply since 2002 amid the U.S. economic expansion, "people haven't been willing to pay up for the stocks," Holland said.

One classic measure of stock market value — the price-to-earnings ratio, or stock price divided by annual earnings per share — now averages about 16 for blue-chip issues, the lowest since the mid-1990s, according to Standard & Poor's in New York.

At the height of the last bull market, that ratio reached 28.

Holland, who has his clients in such Dow shares as Microsoft Corp., Johnson & Johnson, General Electric Co. and Pfizer Inc., contends that the stocks are too cheap to ignore.

"These are the world's greatest companies," he said.

But there's another key factor in the resurgence of the 110-year-old index, experts say: fear that the economy, already slowing, is headed for a recession.

Although big-name stocks probably would slide if the economy slumped, their losses might be mild compared with what could befall other investments that have risen much more dramatically in recent years. Home prices could tank. Small companies without deep pockets could be wiped out.

Fleckenstein has been warning clients that the economic expansion of the last five years "has all been done with borrowed money." He cites the explosion of federal debt and the hundreds of billions of dollars that homeowners have pulled out of their properties via mortgage refinancings and credit lines.

"When this unwinds, it will be a disaster, period," he said.

Scott Rutherford, a 49-year-old Pacific Palisades investor who has about $2 million in the market, said he had been turning back to blue chips in part because he's concerned about the economy.

The Dow stocks "represent a safe haven against possible recession, if the housing market truly implodes," he said.

Many investors don't buy the recession talk. They believe the Federal Reserve's interest rate hikes have succeeded in slowing the economy to a pace that will keep inflation subdued. Under the "soft landing" scenario, the economy will emerge healthier and poised for another round of significant growth in 2007.

David Elias, a retired Amherst, N.Y., money manager who wrote "Dow 40,000" in 1999, concedes that he was probably too optimistic in predicting that the Dow would reach that lofty level by 2016.

Nonetheless, "I still strongly believe we will hit 40,000 in my lifetime" as blue-chip companies benefit from the spread of capitalism around the world, said Elias, 61.

"We have all of the ingredients for good, solid growth in the world over the next 10 to 15 years."

Dow Soars To Record As Oil Price Slides (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at a record high on Tuesday as oil prices fell sharply, but the broader stock-market remained well below their peaks of the high-technology boom.

Having flirted with a record several times in recent days, the blue-chip stock index finally broke above the previous high set more than six years ago to close at 11,727.34. Oil prices fell below $59 a barrel, the lowest level since February, reducing worries about inflation.

While the 30-stock Dow rallied into new territory, the S&P 500, remained 12.6 per cent below its record close of 1,527, while the technology-heavy Nasdaq remained 55.6 per cent below its all time close of 5,048 reached at the peak of the internet boom in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0074647

Other indicators also indicated that the US equity markets have yet to recover from the late 1990s, when holding stock, particularly in US technology companies, was seen a superior investment choice over other major asset classes. Since 2001, bonds, commodities, real estate and various international equities have significantly outperformed the US stock market.

"It's not just sentiment that has been poor. It's activity," said Tobias Levkovich, chief US equity strategist at Citigroup.

The bank said that "since the start of 2005, individual investors have poured $207.65bn into international stock funds, compared with only $46.49bn for domestic equity funds, representing 81.7 per cent of total flows."

For the year ending August 31, "a staggering 86.8 per cent of the $118.56bn in total equity flows has headed overseas", the bank said. During the past four months, Citigroup said, "domestic stock funds have witnessed cumulative outflows of $23.72bn, which marks the worst four-month span since October 2002."

Mr Lekovich said breaking the Dow record "doesn't change the underlying dynamic, but it's psychologically good for investors."

The Dow also set a new intra-day high of 11,758.95 on Tuesday, breaking the previous mark of 11,750.28 established on January 14, 2000, when the index set the old closing record of 11,722.98.

Still, there are nagging concerns that the economy faces a tough road in 2007, a view reflected by Treasury yields sitting well below the present Fed funds rate of 5.25 per cent.

"The stock market is neither a bull or a bear, but a turtle, carrying a weight upon its back," said Alfred Goldman, chief market strategist at AG Edwards. "The thinking that the Fed pulls off a soft landing for the economy is not a guarantee," he added.

Dow Jones Index Hits A New High, Retracing Losses (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

The best-known measure of the stock market, the Dow Jones industrial average of 30 major stocks, rose 0.49 percent yesterday to squeak past a closing high that was set in January 2000 amid a technology-driven market boom.

In contrast to those heady days, though, investors and market professionals are greeting the current rally with more relief than euphoria, noting that the broader stock market has yet to find its way back to previous highs.

"I am happy that it has now happened so that we can move onto something else," said Liz Ann Sonders, chief investment strategist at Charles Schwab.

Stocks have been climbing without fanfare since late in July, bolstered by a decline in energy prices and by mounting signs that the Federal Reserve will not raise interest rates again this year.

The spark for yesterday's gains was a 4 percent drop in oil prices that pushed the next-month futures price of crude oil below $60 a barrel for the first time since March.

In 2000 and the years leading up to it, the rally was fueled by demand for computers and telecommunications and a belief that the Internet would transform business. The rally over the last few months has had more modest roots: signs that the economy is moderating and inflation is tame. Investors have been encouraged that falling crude oil and gasoline prices, while a sign of slowing demand, will restrain inflation and spur consumer spending. And investors have been heartened by what they hope is a gradual and orderly end of a five-year boom in home sales and construction.

Indeed, many on Wall Street argue that the housing pullback and the decline in energy prices has put the economy in a sweet spot: not growing fast enough to accelerate inflation, but not so slowly that it risks falling into recession.

"There is and will continue to be a building sense of a Goldilocks" market, said James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management.

Charles P. Mayer of Pioneer Investments, a mutual fund company, added that corporate profits were still growing at robust rates, further supporting stock prices.

Still, a significant number of skeptics say that this view does not fully take into account the risks that falling home prices and sales could crimp consumer spending and cause an economic slump next year. These people note that the Dow's new high is hollow, given that broader gauges of the market have still not returned to their high-water marks.

DOJ_NMG_0074648

There is also the reality that the Dow is a measure by dollar value of only 30 blue-chip companies, and so is not representative of the great majority of traded stocks.

Jane L. Caron, chief economic strategy at Dwight Asset Management, a Vermont specialist in bond investing, took a measured view. "There is a lot of concern that the housing market softening will spill over to the rest of the economy," she said. "But if you look at the stock markets, they seem to think that everything is O.K."

"Somebody is wrong," she added.

The Dow industrials closed up 56.99 points yesterday, at 11,727.34, surpassing the record of 11,722.98 set on Jan. 14, 2000 — a day when stocks were buoyed by a strong profit report from Intel and by comments from Alan Greenspan, then the Federal Reserve chairman, that interest rates would rise only slightly.

Most other market measures were also higher yesterday. The broad-based Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.21 percent, and the technology-focused Nasdaq composite index rose 0.27 percent. The Russell 2000 index of smaller-capitalization companies was fractionally lower.

Unlike the Dow, the S.& P. 500 index is still about 12 percent away from its record high in March 2000. The majority of those stocks have returned to their 2000 levels, but a large minority — including technology stars like Cisco Systems, Sun Microsystems and JDS Uniphase — are trading at a fraction of their prices six years ago. The Nasdaq composite index is still down about 55 percent from its March 2000 peak.

Seen another way, the stock market has spent the last six years exorcising the effects of the technology bubble, Howard Silverblatt, Standard & Poor's senior index analyst, said. He noted that without the technology sector, the S.& P. 500 would be up 17 percent today. Though not a spectacular return for six years, it would be a far better outcome for investors than a 12 percent decline.

And by some measures, the Dow still has some way to go before it can be said to have reclaimed its previous heights. On an inflation-adjusted basis, the average would have to reach a level of 14,104.97 for it to match its January 2000 peak.

Only 10 of the 30 stocks in the Dow today are at or above their levels when the index last reached its high. Most of the highfliers from the late 1990's and early 2000, including Microsoft, I.B.M. and Intel, are a long way from the lofty levels they were trading at then. Even companies like Home Depot, Alcoa and Merck are down more than 30 percent.

"This has been a really rotten five-year period," said James K. Glassman, a fellow at the conservative-leaning American Enterprise Institute and an author of the 1999 book "Dow 36,000."

"It really has, there is no doubt about it," said Mr. Glassman, who maintains that his book was mischaracterized at the time as a forecast for the market. He argues that the fear of terrorism has held down stock prices.

Still, the Dow components that have led the charge back have done exceedingly well. The price of Altria, parent company of Philip Morris, fell to a five-year low early in 2000 because of its multibillion-dollar legal liabilities, but it has more than tripled since. The shares of Caterpillar, United Technologies and Boeing have soared because of strong global demand for their heavy industrial products. Exxon Mobil, the world's largest publicly traded oil company, is up almost 60 percent on the rise in energy prices.

The last time the Dow inched close to the record, early in May, stocks tumbled from India to New York as investors worried that the Federal Reserve, in its eagerness to curb inflation, would raise rates so much that it would push the American economy into recession and precipitate the end of an era of relatively cheap financing worldwide. The Dow industrials fell more than 8 percent and the Nasdaq composite by 11 percent at the start of the summer.

A few months have made a lot of difference. The Fed left its benchmark short-term rate unchanged at 5.25 percent in its last two meetings, on the rationale that a slowing economy and its two-year campaign to raise rates might be enough to lower prices. Indeed, inflation has slowed and data for September is widely expected to show a further drop because of the recent fall in energy prices. Nationally, average retail gasoline prices are at $2.36 a gallon this week, compared with just over $3 at the start of August.

Declining home sales and construction activity has helped slow the economy without causing any major retrenchment, at least so far. The economy grew at a 2.6 percent annual pace in the second quarter after a 5.6 percent increase in the first three months of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0074649

Bond investors remain somewhat more skeptical than stock buyers. The yields on long-term Treasury bonds, for instance, indicate that investors are assuming that the Fed will have to reverse course soon and cut interest rates to resuscitate the economy.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, has fallen to 4.61 percent, from 5.25 percent late in June. Investors demand higher yields when they are worried that inflation will eat deeper into the value of their holdings, and they push yields down when they think that interest rates are headed lower or when they are seeking shelter from tougher times.

Market historians have noted that stocks can take a long time to recover from periods of great excess. The Dow and the S.&. P., for instance, did not return to their 1929 pre-crash peaks until 1954, long after the Depression and World War II ended.

All this does not mean that investors have stood still in the last six years. Many foreign stock markets, especially those in developing countries, have outperformed American markets, as have commodities like oil, gold and copper. In the United States, the stocks of smaller companies have outrun larger ones, though that trend appears to have reversed this summer.

Data on investment fund flows show that Americans have invested more in those faster-growing areas. They have also spent increasingly more on home purchases and improvements, as evidenced by the large run-up in housing sales and prices and the sharp increases in mortgage and home equity lending.

Will the Dow's new record prompt skeptical investors to reconsider stocks, perhaps giving them a psychological boost? Momentum can help propel stock markets, but investors could also conclude that the Dow's return to its early 2000 level means that the index has merely been treading water for six years.

"You're telling me that I have gone six and a half years and gone even," Mr. Silverblatt of S.& P. said. "What about the 19 percent inflation? Well, it's better than being down, but it's not as positive as you think."

Dow Industrials Close At A Record (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

When the Dow Jones Industrial Average last closed at a record, on Jan. 14, 2000, it was a time of exultation. A lot has changed since then.

After flirting with the record for days, the Dow Industrials finally topped it yesterday, pushed higher by the hope that falling oil prices will support consumers and the housing market. The average rose 56.99 points to squeak past the old record close of 11722.98 with a finish of 11727.34. Throughout the market, the mood was more skeptical than during those heady days more than six years ago.

"We're in a vastly different world and a vastly different market," said Stephen Porpora, an independent broker on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. When the Dow registered its previous record, "we were at the tail end of a bull market and everyone was somewhat drunk on the euphoria."

At the Big Board yesterday, as the Dow moved through its old high, jacket-clad traders continued shuffling across the exchange floor checking prices and shouting their orders. When the market closed, they barely reacted. There was no applause. Some traders said they were more worried about news that was trickling out of layoffs at a couple of floor-trading firms.

There's good reason to be more cautious this time. Between the two records came one of the worst bear markets in financial history. From its 2000 high to its 2002 low, the Dow fell 37.85%. The Nasdaq Composite Index, containing many volatile technology stocks, plunged 77.93%. To push the Dow to a new high, investors have had to overcome serious doubts about inflation and the sustainability of economic growth.

"A lot of people who were bearish are throwing in the towel and turning more positive," said David Briggs, head of stock trading at Federated Investors, a Pittsburgh mutual-fund group. "A lot of people have been sitting out this dance, and before we top out, I think we are going to get them in."

In that sense, today's skepticism could prove healthier for stocks than the excitement of January 2000. Stocks are benefiting from a slow but steady flow of money from investors overcoming their fears, rather than from a rush of irrationally exuberant buyers, as then-Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan suggested just over three years before that bull market topped out.

DOJ_NMG_0074650

The Dow almost finished at a record in May, only to succumb to the doubters. This time, it rode a surge that began in mid-July and took the blue-chip average up 9.2% in less than three months.

The gains had a simple catalyst: the Federal Reserve. Beginning in July, investors began to believe that the Fed, at its August meeting, might end its two-year campaign of interest-rate increases. Fed decision makers did stop raising rates in August, and kept the "pause" going at their September meeting, although they left the door open to increases later.

Hopes spread that the Fed's interest-rate management would foster a "Goldilocks" economy, with rates high enough to blunt inflation but not so high as to torpedo corporate profits. Many investors see that kind of balanced scenario as a formula for steady stock gains, and the optimism became so strong that the gains continued even during September, historically the year's weakest month for stocks.

Now talk is spreading that the Fed might actually start cutting short-term interest rates sometime next year, to give the economy a boost. The prospect of lower interest rates has been pushing down the yields on Treasury bonds since late June, pulling many mortgage rates down with them. The prospect of more-moderate economic growth has been pulling oil and gasoline prices down. Consumers are growing more optimistic.

As a result, the stocks leading the latest rally have been those linked to consumer spending, such as McDonald's, Microsoft, General Motors and Pfizer -- some of them rebounding from earlier slumps. Industrial stocks such as Caterpillar and Alcoa, which led until this year, have fallen back, as the pace of economic growth appears to moderate.

The market looks much different from that of January 2000, a time when some believed stocks had entered a new era in which "New Economy" stocks would rise for years. Technology stocks, which had taken on an aura of invincibility, are viewed by many today as battered objects of suspicion.

Even fanciful market forecasts have taken a haircut. In 1999, two scholars at the American Enterprise Institute startled Wall Street with a book named "Dow 36,000," a title that later drew ridicule. Shortly before this latest record, one news release touted a little-known money manager's radical forecast: Dow 16000.

Skeptics worry that the new level reached yesterday might not hold for long. Their concern is that the bull market is aging and that it could be too late now to pile into stocks.

The current upswing, which began in October 2002, has run for almost four years and is the fourth longest since 1900, according to Ned Davis Research in Venice, Fla. But it hasn't been particularly strong, a reflection of investor reservations following the excesses of the 1990s and the bust of 2000-02. The Dow's 61% gain from the closing low of 7286.27 on Oct. 9, 2002, remains below the 85% average total gain for bull markets since 1900. (Generally speaking, a bull market is a 20% rise from a bear-market low; a bear market is the opposite.)

The more volatile Nasdaq composite index has doubled since its own 2002 low, and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index is up 72%. But because the Nasdaq fell so far during the bear market, it would have to more than double again to return to its March 2000 record of 5048.62. It finished yesterday at 2243.65.

The S&P 500, which also holds more tech stocks than does the Dow and also fell harder during the bear market, finished at 1334.11. It would have to rise 14.5% to get back to its record of 1527.46, also reached in March 2000.

The new record for the Dow Industrials means they have recaptured their losses, but it also means they have made virtually no progress in more than six years. Of the 30 stocks in the Dow average, only 10 have surpassed their levels of January 2000.

In general, the biggest losers since then are the big winners from the late 1990s. Microsoft, for all its gains this past summer, remains down 46% since Jan. 14, 2000. Intel is off 60%. General Motors -- not one of the '90s big winners -- has fallen 59%.

And taking inflation into account, the Dow still is 20% from its old record.

The biggest Dow gainers are Altria, maker of Marlboro cigarettes and Kraft cheese, up 214%; equipment-maker Caterpillar, 151% higher; industrial conglomerate United Technologies, with a 103% gain; and Boeing, up 86%.

In January 2000, the world's biggest stock as measured by stock-market value was Microsoft. Today, it is Exxon Mobil, whose stock is up 56% since then.

Another sign of the bull market's age: The Nasdaq stocks, the rabbits of the current bull market, posted some of the largest gains early on but now are slowing down. This year, despite the summer gains, the Nasdaq composite is barely in positive territory, up 1.7%. The Dow industrials are up 9.4% year-to-date, and the S&P 500, 6.9%. Other big gainers during much of the current bull market, such as energy stocks, also have begun to slip.

DOJ_NMG_0074651

Some stock indexes that led the way for much of the past four years, such as those measuring small stocks and transportation stocks, hit records earlier this year, but then fell so hard they still aren't back to record territory. These are indexes of stocks that benefit from a strong economy. Their recent weakness reflects continuing expectations that economic growth will slow.

Typically, toward the end of a bull market, larger, safer stocks start performing better than those of smaller, less-established companies, and that is what has been happening this year.

Prudence and diversification are in again. "Having all your eggs in one basket seems like a great idea...until the basket falls," said Tim Swanson, who manages money for Cleveland's National City Corp., in a recent note to clients. "As others brag about the extraordinary returns that their concentrated bets are delivering, just remember that it takes a lot of eye-popping returns to make up for a couple of weeks where you lose two-thirds of your money." He pointed to the approximately $6 billion loss suffered by hedge fund Amaranth Advisors in natural-gas trading.

For all the doubts, the bull market has shown surprising staying power. It has blossomed in the shadow of terrorism, Middle East conflict, high energy prices and growing U.S. political discord. The latest gains have come despite jitters about the sagging housing market, an engine of economic growth for several years. Some investors seem almost inured to the risk.

But the stock market's strength may be masking the fact that many investors today are demanding higher rewards for risking money in a changed world. "The terror issue is hanging over the market," said Mr. Porpora, the stock-exchange floor broker. "We're at war and we all feel vulnerable." One measure of that: Investors today aren't willing to pay as much for a dollar of profits as they were in 2000.

Back then, the S&P 500 traded at more than 30 times its member companies' earnings for the previous 12 months -- more than double the historic price-earnings ratio of about 15. Since then, stocks haven't risen as fast as corporate profits. So today, the S&P 500 trades at a less expensive 17 times earnings.

"When the Dow hit its peak in 2000, there was a fairly wide gap between the stock price of mega-cap companies and the underlying value of the business," said Bruce Veaco, co-founder of Focused Investors LLC, a money-management firm in Beverly Hills, Calif. Today, he said, stock prices seem better related to profits. "We see a lot of opportunity in names like Wal-Mart, PepsiCo, American Express and Coca-Cola. They're all holdings of ours," he said.

The pace of stock gains has slowed since the late 1990s, a frothy time when a year wasn't considered good unless major indexes rose 20%. After surging 25% in 2003, the Dow was up 3% in 2004, and fell 0.6% last year. Increased investor caution also may help explain the unexpected strength of the bond market, which many investors view as safer than the stock market.

"The analysts have definitely got religion," and there are a lot fewer outrageous stock forecasts, added Mr. Briggs of Federated Investors. "Analysts are more conservative, investors are more conservative, and I would be willing to bet that chief executives are more conservative. The good news is that that has helped prevent us from going back into a bear market. But the bad news is that it probably has served to limit the gains."

Mr. Briggs added that in his view, "you've got to give Bush and Greenspan credit for keeping us in the game." But he noted that "a hurricane, a refinery fire or one event in the Middle East" could send oil-futures prices upward again, creating problems for consumers and possibly having a negative ripple effect on stocks.

A lot of other things have changed since 2000. Then, stocks were practically the only game in town. Many regarded investing in bonds, real estate and precious metals as a waste of time. Stocks like Cisco Systems and Qualcomm drove the average tech-oriented mutual fund to a more than 100% gain in 1999, while shares of small companies and non-tech, "Old Economy" companies languished. In recent years, for many people, U.S. stocks have ceased to be the investment of choice. They have turned things like Florida condos, gold coins, developing-country stocks and junk bonds. Worries have spread about bubbles in those areas.

And yet, similarities to the old days remain. When investors start feeling bullish, they often turn, almost reflexively, to tech companies, which they expect will provide the fastest stock gains. Just that has been happening since mid-July.

DOJ_NMG_0074652

The Dow's New Top (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

It took nearly seven years. But the Dow Jones Industrial Average finally closed at a new record of 11727.34 yesterday, topping the previous high recorded at the peak of the dot-com bubble on January 14, 2000. Adjusted for inflation, the Dow still has some ways to go to catch that earlier peak. And the Nasdaq, loaded as it is with tech stocks, closed with a slight gain yesterday at 2243.65, well below its 5048.62 peak on March 10, 2000.

Yesterday's new Dow Jones high is nonetheless worth celebrating as a sign of America's economic resilience. At the start of every bear market, there are always voices saying we will never see the top again. But the smartest investors always turn out to be those who see new lows as a buying opportunity.

In the current mini-bull market, stocks have been driven by a record 13 straight quarters of double-digit gains in corporate earnings. With more of the same expected this year and next, many stocks have price earnings ratios that make them good targets for "value" investors.

The stock market's strength is an especially good omen given that we are at a point in this expansion when many economists doubt its staying power. Investors seem to be betting that rising rates, the housing slump and a possible change of power in Congress won't stop the economy's growth. They may well be wrong in the short term. But the lesson of yesterday's new stock market high is that in the long term optimism always pays.

Oil Prices Slip Almost 4%, Go Below $60 A Barrel (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Oil prices plunged at the fastest rate in more than a year Tuesday and fell below $60 a barrel for the first time in nearly eight months as high inventories and expectations for reduced demand weighed on prices.

A number of energy analysts, such as those at Wachovia, First Enercast Financial and BNP Paribas Commodity Futures, say prices will likely head lower in the days and weeks ahead, absent a major change in the oil landscape.

The price of a barrel of crude oil trading for future delivery fell $2.35, or 3.9%, to $58.68. That was the lowest price since mid-February and marked the steepest one-day percentage decline in prices since August 2005.

Oil prices have fallen 24% since peaking at $77.03 in July. Prices are poised to fall further, Wachovia economist Jason Schenker says.

“The market is under pressure from both the supply and demand side,” he says.

What's happening:

•Supply. U.S. oil inventories are up more than 6% from this time a year ago and are far above the historical average for this time of year, according to the Energy Department's Energy Information Administration. Such large supplies are the main reason for the oil price decline, BNP Paribas Commodity Futures senior energy analyst Thomas Bentz says.

“Right now, it looks like we're going to continue to slide,” he says.

•Demand. Demand normally declines in the fall after the end of the busy summer driving season and before the winter, when heating oil demand rises. But expectations are growing that demand will soften more than usual in the months ahead, in large part because of a broad decline in economic activity around the globe.

•Weather. Forecasts are suggesting this may be a mild winter, pointing to reduced demand for heating oil and for oil to power electricity to heat homes, says Ben Smith, president of First Enercast Financial, an energy consulting firm that focuses on weather. Such expectations are also reducing expectations for oil demand this winter.

Crude Oil's Drop Is The Largest In More Than A Year (WSJ)

By Matt Chambers

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

How much lower can crude-oil futures go?

DOJ_NMG_0074653

Yesterday, crude futures closed in on their lowest price for the year as traders become more convinced there are no big OPEC production cuts in the pipeline.

The nearly 4% drop in crude on the New York Mercantile Exchange, coming after a 3% fall Monday, was the biggest percentage drop since Aug. 17, 2005.

The front-month November light, sweet crude contract fell $2.35 to $58.68 a barrel, its lowest close since Feb. 16. The front month contract is slightly more than $1 off its lowest settlement for 2006 of $57.65 a barrel on Feb. 15.

"The question being asked is what price OPEC is going to defend and I think you can make a pretty good case it's going to be a lot lower than this," said Bill O'Grady, an analyst at A.G. Edwards Inc. in St. Louis. Mr. O'Grady said the downgrading of Colorado State University's hurricane forecast and its assessment that El Nino conditions took hold quicker than expected also weighed on prices.

Traders are ignoring comments from some members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries suggesting they are cutting output to buoy prices, instead waiting for input from Saudi Arabia, the group's biggest oil exporter and its key powerbroker. Based on comments at last month's OPEC meeting, some traders had been expecting OPEC to try to defend oil prices at $60 a barrel.

Calls from OPEC President Edmund Daukoru for other group members to follow his country of Nigeria in cutting production were dismissed by traders. Iraq also weighed in to the mix of conflicting talk from the producer-group. Cutting oil output is "impractical" before the northern hemisphere winter, when demand normally rises, a senior Iraqi oil official said.

Traders have shrugged off reports that Nigeria and Venezuela intend to cut production this month to support prices, amid OPEC denials that a deal on crimping output has been reached.

"We're going to need strong words from the Saudis," to cause supply concerns over OPEC cuts, said Aaron Kildow, a broker at Prudential Financial Inc. in New York. Mr. Kildow said funds and independent traders were the main sellers of crude. Colorado State's forecasters said developing El Nino conditions in the Pacific Ocean led them to predict there will be no more intense hurricanes for the rest of the Atlantic hurricane season.

In other commodity markets:

GOLD: Futures on the Comex division of the New York Mercantile Exchange fell, dragged lower as a drop in crude oil prices sparked profit taking. Gold prices fell near a three-week low. Most-active December gold fell $21.80 at $581.50 an ounce and nearby October fell $21.40 to $576.30.

WHEAT: Prices on the Chicago Board of Trade tumbled, pressured by profit taking as rainy weather in dry wheat regions in Argentina pressured wheat futures yesterday. Argentina has experienced droughty conditions as its wheat crop develops, but rains Monday and yesterday are expected to alleviate some of the dryness. December wheat slid 6.50 cents to $4.395 a bushel.

Stepping Up Attacks, Bush Calls Democrats 'Softer' On Terrorists (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

STOCKTON, Calif., Oct. 3 -- President Bush ratcheted up his campaign offensive against Democrats on Tuesday with perhaps his bluntest rhetoric yet as he accused them of being "softer" on terrorists and willing to allow attacks on Americans rather than interrogate or spy on the nation's enemies.

With his party in serious trouble five weeks before Election Day, Bush shifted into full campaign mode this week, kicking off a month of frenetic barnstorming aimed at drawing disgruntled Republicans back into the fold. As part of the effort, he has escalated the intensity of his attacks with each passing day, culminating with what aides called a "very aggressive" series of speeches Tuesday.

"Time and time again, the Democrats want to have it both ways," he told donors here. "They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out."

He added: "If you don't think we should be listening in on the terrorist, then you ought to vote for the Democrats. If you want your government to continue listening in when al-Qaeda planners are making phone calls into the United States, then you vote Republican."

DOJ_NMG_0074654

Bush's tough talk Tuesday came after he suggested at a Monday night fundraiser in Nevada that Democrats were content to sit back until terrorists strike again. "It sounds like they think the best way to protect the American people is wait until we're attacked again," he said.

The emphasis on terrorism and allegations of Democratic weakness replicate a strategy used to powerful effect in 2002 and 2004, but polls suggest the president may have a harder sell this year.

"That's not resonating anymore," California Democratic Party Chairman Art Torres said. "It's like the plaintive pleas of King Lear. People don't believe him anymore. You can cry wolf only so many times."

A poll by the Survey and Policy Research Institute at San Jose State University found that just 27 percent of Californians approve of Bush's performance, while 62 percent disapprove. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) stayed away from his three California stops Tuesday rather than be photographed with the unpopular president.

The two House Republicans who were beneficiaries of Bush's fundraising hail from usually safe districts, but both face serious competition this year. Reps. Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle both have ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and Democratic polling suggests both are running roughly even with Democratic challengers.

And the campaigning was interrupted by the mushrooming scandal regarding former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.). During a tour of the George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton, the first in the nation named after him, Bush broke a four-day silence on Foley to pronounce himself "disgusted by the revelations." But he stood by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who faces calls from conservatives to step down for not pursuing early warnings about Foley's contacts with former House pages. Hastert, Bush said, "cares about the children of this country."

Bush opened his three-day swing through the West in Reno, Nev., on Monday, followed by stops Tuesday in Stockton, El Dorado Hills and Los Angeles, and he will conclude Wednesday in Arizona and Colorado. He raised $2.3 million in three events Tuesday, bringing his total to nearly $185 million at 75 events in the two-year election cycle, eclipsing the record he set in 2002.

Along the way, he has sharpened his tone. While saying he does not question their patriotism, Bush paints Democrats as a "cut-and-run" party that enables terrorists.

His indictment centers on three pieces of legislation: the USA Patriot Act expanding law enforcement powers; a measure authorizing warrantless surveillance of telephone calls and e-mail into and out of the United States when one person is suspected of ties to terrorists; and legislation creating military tribunals that restricts the rights of terror suspects and permits harsh interrogation to extract information. Noting that Democrats supported the Patriot Act in 2001 before filibustering its renewal last winter, Bush said, "They voted for it before they voted against it."

Bush's language, though, characterizes Democratic positions through his own prism. Critics of the surveillance program have not argued against listening to terrorist phone calls but say the government should get warrants from a secret intelligence court. Likewise, many critics of the tribunal measure did not oppose interrogating prisoners generally, as Bush said, but specific provisions of the bill, such as denying the right of habeas corpus or giving the president freedom to authorize what they consider torture.

"The sad truth is this White House and this Republican-controlled Congress have put our national security at risk," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "It's time for a change. The American people expect more than tough talk from their leaders. They expect tough and smart action. Democrats are fighting to take this country in a new direction."

A couple of hundred protesters gathered outside the Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium for the Pombo event, holding up signs such as "Lie, Deny, Occupy" and "State of Denial," and shouting, "Shame on you," at those entering the building. While Schwarzenegger stayed away, another actor showed up: Richard Kiel, the actor who played the villain Jaws in James Bond films.

Bush again remarked that it seems "like an eternity" since December elections in Iraq but predicted that "when this chapter of history will be written . . . it's going to be a comma -- the Iraqis voted, comma, and the United States of America understood that Iraq was a central front in the war on terror and helped this young democracy flourish." Democrats have complained that the comment dismisses thousands of American deaths as "a comma."

Bush Campaigning Amid GOP Woes (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

DOJ_NMG_0074655

AP, October 3, 2006

President Bush tried to focus voters on the fight against terror Tuesday and away from the ethics questions that are making the Republican election campaign difficult this year.

Bush ratcheted up his charges against Democrats during a fundraising tour of California, flatly accusing his political opponents of being soft on terror, but could not avoid the scandals that are dogging the GOP. He was campaigning for two incumbents who were benefactors of corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff and was drawn into defending the House speaker from calls for his resignation over a sex scandal on Capitol Hill.

But even if Bush can't erase his party's problems, he provided plenty of cash to fuel their cause in November's elections. His fundraising told for three events Tuesday was $2.3 million.

He told cheering Republicans at a $400,000 breakfast fundraiser for Rep. Richard Pombo that Democrats would raise their taxes and "cut and run" in Iraq.

"They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out," Bush said. He made the same charges later in the Sacramento suburb of El Dorado, where he raised $600,000 for Rep. John Doolittle.

Bush criticized Democrats who voted against legislation authorizing warrantless monitoring of phone calls and e-mails to detect terror plots and another bill that would allow tough interrogation of terror suspects by CIA agents.

"If they feel we are safer without this program, the Democrats in the United States Senate need to explain to the American people which of the attacks that the CIA program stopped would they have been willing to let go forward," Bush said.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada responded that Republicans have put national security at risk by bungling Iraq and ignoring warnings of the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago.

"The American people expect more than tough talk from their leaders," Reid said in a written statement e-mailed to reporters. "They expect tough and smart action."

Bush didn't mention the two Republicans' link to Abramoff in his fundraising stops. Both easily survived primary challenges this year from opponents who criticized them for their Abramoff donations, and both were expected to win in their reliably Republican districts in November.

Pombo received thousands of dollars in questionable contributions from Abramoff or his clients while supporting the lobbyist's causes. After the disclosures, Pombo gave $7,000 to charity that he had received from Abramoff. The congressman had denied taking any positions because of the money.

Doolittle used Abramoff's luxury sports box for a fundraiser without initially reporting it. Doolittle's wife and one of his former aides also worked for Abramoff.

During a stop in Stockton's three-year-old George W. Bush Elementary School, Bush made his first comments on the revelations that Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., had sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage boys he met through the congressional page program. Foley resigned Friday when ABC News obtained copies, and House Speaker Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders are facing questions about why they didn't pursue the matter earlier.

Bush said he was "dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior." Some, including the conservative Washington Times newspaper, have called for Hastert to resign, but Bush expressed confidence in the speaker's ability to resolve the matter.

Meanwhile, the Republican National Committee said Bush would not return $2,000 that Foley's political action committee gave to the president's re-election campaign in June 2003. Some other Republicans were returning or donating money that Foley had donated to their campaigns, but RNC spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt said Bush's re-election campaign "has basically been shut down."

"That money is no longer available to return," she said.

As of June 30, the last date that the Bush-Cheney re-election campaign reported its finances, $315,000 was left. But campaign officials said that money has been committed for outstanding campaign expenses and charitable donations.

Bush's final fundraiser was scheduled for Tuesday evening at a mansion in Beverly Hills. The event, hosted by investor Elliott Broidy and his wife Robin, was expected to raise $1.3 million for the RNC and was closed to the media.

DOJ_NMG_0074656

The president was to wrap up the fundraising tour Wednesday with stops in Arizona and Colorado before returning to Washington.

___

The House interrogation resolution is HR 6166. The Senate bill is S 3930.

The House warrantless wiretapping bill is H.R. 5825; the Senate bill is S. 3931.

___

On the Net:

http://www.whitehouse.gov

Bush Tells Supporters Dems Soft On Terror (USAT)

By John Bacon And Sarah Elkins With Wire Reports

USA Today, October 4, 2006

President Bush tried to focus voters on the fight against terrorism Tuesday as his Western campaign swing swept into California. Bush accused his political opponents of being soft on terrorism at three events in the state designed to raise $2.3 million. He told cheering Republicans at a $400,000 breakfast fundraiser in Stockton that Democrats would raise their taxes and "cut and run" in Iraq. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada issued an e-mailed response that despite Bush's talk about being "tough," Republicans have put national security at risk by bungling Iraq and ignoring warnings of the 9/11 attacks five years ago.

Bush wraps up the fundraising tour today with stops in Arizona and Colorado.

Dems rip Frist for Afghanistan comment

Democrats accused Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of waving a white flag for saying the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can't be won militarily and favoring bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government. Frist, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said Monday in Afghanistan that Taliban members were too numerous and popular to be defeated. "You need to bring them into a more transparent type of government," he said. "And if that's accomplished, we'll be successful." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., citing Taliban links to al-Qaeda, said Frist "suggests that the best way forward in Afghanistan is to coddle the Taliban by welcoming Taliban members into a coalition government, as if 9/11 had never happened." Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said he was referring to Afghan tribesmen targeted for recruitment by the Taliban, not Taliban fighters.

Family goes against Mass. candidate

The siblings of Massachusetts gubernatorial hopeful Christy Mihos have donated to the independent candidate's competitor, GOP Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey.

James Mihos and his wife, Linda, donated $500 to Healey's campaign, while Mihos' sister, Marlene Mihos-Bucavalas, donated $100. James Mihos said that his brother's campaign attack ads have embarrassed the family and that he hopes his donation can "mitigate Christy's despicable behavior." The Boston Globe has reported that Christy Mihos said in the spring, "Hey, look, families stay together, move apart … everyone sort of goes their separate way."

Bush Blasts Democrats' 'Softer Side' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

STOCKTON, Calif. -- President Bush yesterday accused Democrats of being "softer" on terrorists and charged that they compared CIA officers with the Taliban.

"If you don't think we should be listening in on the terrorists, then you ought to vote for the Democrats," Mr. Bush said at a fundraiser here for Rep. Richard W. Pombo, part of a three-day fundraising blitz through the West in the run-up to next month's congressional elections.

In his most bruising campaign speech to date, the president called out Democratic leaders, comparing Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's boast of having "killed the Patriot Act" to Sen. John Kerry's iconic "I actually did vote for the $87 billion before I voted against it" statement on Iraq war funding in the 2004 election.

DOJ_NMG_0074657

Mr. Bush also said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi doesn't understand the war on terrorism because she said this year's elections shouldn't be fought on national security issues.

Last month, Mr. Bush challenged Congress to send him legislation enshrining the tools he says are needed to fight the war on terrorism, including wiretapping authority for the National Security Agency and interrogation authority for the CIA.

This week, Mr. Bush has become the official scorekeeper, tallying up those who opposed him: 160 House Democrats and 32 Senate Democrats on the interrogation bill, and 177 House Democrats on the wiretap authority.

"The Democrats want to have it both ways," Mr. Bush said. "They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out."

But Democrats said Mr. Bush has lost the credibility to level these charges.

"Given that this administration has misled the American people on so many issues like weapons of mass destruction, and what our intelligence agencies really said, it is pretty cheeky for the president to talk about trust," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Mr. Reid fired back by saying the administration is ignoring warnings about how badly the war in Iraq is going and failed to heed earlier warnings about al Qaeda in the run-up to the September 11 attacks.

"President Bush is no longer credible with the American people, no matter how many campaign speeches he gives in the next month," the Nevada Democrat said.

Mr. Bush never mentioned Mrs. Pelosi or Mr. Reid by name, but identified them and several others by position or quote: both California Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein; Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat; and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Bush blasted Mr. Leahy for opposing the interrogation program and said that on the Senate floor, Mr. Leahy compared CIA officers to the Taliban and deposed Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein.

"This exposes a dangerous mind-set on the part of Democrats in Congress," Mr. Bush said. "You can't defend America if you cannot tell the difference between the CIA officers who protect their fellow citizens and brutal dictators who kill their fellow citizens."

Mr. Leahy's spokesman, David Carle, called Mr. Bush's charge a "fabrication."

During a Senate debate, Mr. Leahy was calling for habeas corpus protections and laid out a hypothetical detention without those legal protections. He then compared the hypothetical to "something that would have happened under the Taliban, something that Saddam Hussein would have ordered or something out of Kafka."

The administration has said the CIA program helped foil a number of terrorist plots, and the president yesterday said Democrats must "explain to the American people which of the attacks that the CIA program stopped would they have been willing to let go forward."

U.S. Security At Stake In Upcoming Vote, Bush Says In Stockton (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske And Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

STOCKTON — President Bush painted the midterm election as a referendum on national security at fundraising events in California on Tuesday, saying congressional Democrats failed to provide the tools he needs to fight the war on terror.

"They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out," he told a crowd of about 650 at Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium, flanked by Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy).

Bush also helped raise money for Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Roseville) at an event near Sacramento on Tuesday afternoon on his way to a third fundraiser in Bel Air.

Pombo and Doolittle, tarnished by their ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), have been campaigning hard in their solidly Republican districts.

Bush called Pombo, chairman of the House Resources Committee, a man who "stands on principle" and supports the programs necessary to protect the country, including legislation protecting the CIA's program for detaining and interrogating suspected terrorists and the National Security Agency's communications surveillance program.

DOJ_NMG_0074658

"The stakes in this election couldn't be more clear," Bush said. "If you don't think we should be listening in on the terrorists, then you ought to vote for the Democrats. If you want your government to continue listening in when Al Qaeda planners are making phone calls into the United States, then you vote Republican."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean issued a statement in response to Bush: "What's softer than giving up the hunt for Osama bin Laden and ignoring the 16 intelligence agencies who told him that the war in Iraq is making us less safe at home and around the world?"

Shawn and Wiley Chandler, grocery store owners from Stockton, are Pombo supporters who brought their three daughters to Tuesday's event. They said they were not upset that the congressman had accepted campaign donations from Abramoff, but they did worry about terrorism, and saw voting for Pombo as a way to protect themselves.

"I think he's on a mission, and we support what he's doing to keep hard-working families' taxes down, to help small businesses and to keep us safe," said Wiley Chandler, 42.

Peter Petroski, 58, a registered Republican from Danville, stood across the street from the auditorium Tuesday with several hundred protesters, hoisting a sign for Pombo's Democratic opponent, scientist Jerry McNerny.

Petroski said he voted for Pombo in 2004 and Bush in 2000, but found Pombo's ties to Abramoff and DeLay "embarrassing." He said he was troubled by Bush's speech, and by the NSA program, which he said violates basic civil liberties.

Both Doolittle, 55, an eight-term incumbent and Pombo, 45, now in his seventh term, waged expensive primary campaigns to fend off attacks from MoveOn.org, the Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund, the Sierra Club and other groups.

Pombo accepted campaign money from Abramoff and his clients and helped an Indian tribe Abramoff represented. The congressman later donated the Abramoff money to charity.

Doolittle also accepted campaign money from Abramoff and used the lobbyist's luxury skybox at a Washington sports arena for a fundraiser without reporting it. He has not returned the campaign money, instead defending Abramoff as a friend.

Years ago, Pombo and Doolittle also joined with DeLay, the former House majority leader who resigned amid money-laundering charges, to stop a federal investigation of a Texas businessman who donated to their campaigns.

Both McNerny and Doolittle's opponent, Charlie Brown, have been spotlighted by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee as among the top 15 competitive "emerging races" nationally.

Tuesday's events raised about $400,000 for Pombo, $600,000 for Doolittle and $1.2 million for the Republican National Committee.

More than 300 people paid $2,000 each to attend the Doolittle fundraiser at Serrano Country Club in El Dorado Hills.

Doolittle acknowledged Tuesday that his wife's consulting firm stood to make $90,000 for her role in organizing the event. He defended the arrangement with Julie Doolittle's political consulting company, Sierra Dominion Financial Solutions Inc., under which she makes 15% of all money the company raises for her husband.

"I hired her. She is a very good fundraiser, and she works very hard," Doolittle said.

Brown has repeatedly attacked Doolittle for his relationship with Abramoff, Julie Doolittle's fundraising commission and other purported ethical lapses.

Bush spoke for 30 minutes, focusing on national security issues. Afterward, he flew south for a reception at the Bel Air mansion of Robin Broidy, a former 20th Century Fox executive, and Elliott Broidy, chairman and CEO of Broidy Capital Management Co.

Absent from the day's events: Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger. His staff said he agreed months ago to campaign Tuesday for a handful of ballot measures to authorize $37 billion in bonds for levees, hospitals, schools and other public works.

Expensive Ad Markets Hike Campaign Costs (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats will have to overcome the high cost of TV advertising to win pivotal races in their bid to control Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0074659

They're trying to pick up 11 House and Senate seats held by Republicans in expensive media markets. Republicans are attempting only four takeovers in top markets, a USA TODAY analysis shows.

The contrast underscores one of the chief difficulties Democrats face in their drive to win congressional majorities: raising enough money to make it happen.

In Philadelphia — where Democrats are going after House seats held by Republicans Jim Gerlach, Curt Weldon and Michael Fitzpatrick — a typical 30-second ad during a local newscast on a network affiliate costs about $2,100, according to the non-partisan Campaign Media Analysis Group.

In Waco, Texas, where Republican Van Taylor is trying to oust Democratic Rep. Chet Edwards, a similar ad costs about $250.

"It's like comparing Mercedeses to Hyundais," says Evan Tracey, founder of the group.

Federal reports show some Democratic challengers keeping up with incumbents, such as Lois Murphy and Joe Sestak in their races against Gerlach and Weldon. And the Democrats' Senate and House campaign committees had as much or more money as Republicans did on Aug. 31.

However, the Democratic National Committee, which has invested heavily in a long-term program to build up party infrastructure in all 50 states, has far less money than its Republican counterpart going into the final weeks before Nov. 7 elections.

High advertising costs can translate into shorter media campaigns or more reliance on outlets that reach fewer voters, such as cable.

"There are lots of these (competitive) seats in very expensive areas," GOP pollster Bill McInturff says. "It gives incumbents one more modest edge because it's so much harder for challengers to build name ID."

Thomas "Doc" Sweitzer, a Philadelphia-based Democrat who is handling Sestak's ads, says vulnerable incumbents also must spend money this year: "They may have name recognition, but they don't have the job ratings … to ignore those markets."

Democrats are trying to win GOP-held Senate seats in Pennsylvania, Virginia, Missouri and Ohio, which means running ads in the top-20 markets of Philadelphia, Washington, St. Louis and Cleveland. Democrats are also making strong plays for seven GOP House seats near Philadelphia, Houston, Tampa, Chicago and Minneapolis.

Republicans are gunning for Democratic Senate seats in New Jersey and Maryland, which means buying ads in Philadelphia, New York City, Baltimore and Washington. While they're also vying for Democratic House seats near Chicago and Cleveland, many of the Republicans' top House takeover targets are in districts with smaller cities such as Waco; Rock Hill, S.C.; Burlington, Vt.; Wheeling, W.Va.; and Des Moines.

In New Mexico, One Of The Nation's Hottest Races (CSM)

By Jeff Kass

The Christian Science Monitor, October 4, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

The fault line in one of the country's tightest congressional races runs between Iraq, New Mexico, and who gets to march first in the state fair parade.

Republican incumbent Heather Wilson, seeking her fifth full term, faces the state's Democratic attorney general, Patricia Madrid, in a race that polls have shown as very close.

The race is a microcosm of dueling strategies other Democrats and Republicans are using in their campaigns this fall. Ms. Madrid is trying to tie Ms. Wilson to an unpopular president, a troublesome war in Iraq, and a culture of corruption in Washington. The Wilson campaign is trying to focus on local issues, and saddle Madrid with a state corruption scandal.

One issue that has not cropped up, despite New Mexico's status as a border state, is immigration. One that has been resolved - via coin toss - was that Madrid got to march ahead of Wilson in the parade. What remains is a tight contest.

An Albuquerque Journal poll released Oct. 1. showed Wilson and Mardrid dead even with each taking 44 percent of the vote. Seven percent of registered likely voters were undecided, and 5 percent said that they wouldn't vote for either one.

DOJ_NMG_0074660

"Madrid's campaign is definitely a must-win race for Democrats' battle to regain control of the House," says Ramona Oliver, spokeswoman for EMILY's List, a political action committee for pro-choice Democratic women, which has funneled $220,000 to Madrid, according to the campaign. Money flows into both campaigns

Madrid has raised approximately $1.8 million total so far, while the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) has reserved $1.9 million for television ads in the district.

Wilson has raised some $2.8 million, and the National Republican Campaign Committee has spent $550,000 on the race, according to spokesman Alex Burgos.

Voter registration in New Mexico's first congressional district is 46 percent Democratic and 35 percent Republican, although both Wilson and Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry won the district in 2004. Republicans are counting on that split to continue working for Wilson.

"New Mexico One voters are very independent-minded," says Mr. Burgos. "They elect independent representatives." The incumbent

Wilson's campaign website notes that she is "independent, honest, effective," and adds that she has "a clear independent streak."

Yet Wilson has been tied to Washington in some uncomfortable ways. Over the weekend, she said she would give $8,000 to charity that she had received from former Rep. Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who resigned Friday after news broke indicating that he had sent inappropriate e-mails to at least one male page.

And in line with other representatives, Wilson has returned other monies, such as $10,000 from former House Majority Leader and Republican Rep. Tom Delay of Texas.

An Air Force veteran who holds a PhD in international relations from Oxford University in England, Wilson sits on the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

She also serves on the House's Energy and Commerce Committee. In 2004, while serving on that committee, she excoriated CBS executives after Janet Jackson's breast-baring incident at the Super Bowl halftime show. Wilson has backed legislation for increased penalties for broadcast indecency.

Her campaign manager, Enrique Knell, did not return numerous phone calls over several weeks requesting an interview with Wilson. But he did e-mail a number of news articles about corruption allegations in the New Mexico state treasurer's office.

"As you can see," Mr. Knell wrote, "corruption in Santa Fe [the state capital] and Patricia Madrid's failure to root it out is the biggest issue in this race." The challenger

Yet one of Madrid's talking points has been her tough stance as a prosecutor. Sitting in a conference room at her husband's Albuquerque law firm, she touts her office's criminal prosecutions and pursuit of corporate wrongdoing against companies such as Enron. Those are also among the reasons the DCCC says it recruited Madrid into the race.

Madrid dressed in a black pantsuit, says Wilson is attempting to divert attention from a key issue on voters' minds: the war in Iraq.

"This race is going to be a referendum on this administration's conduct of the war and its unwillingness to give us a responsible exit plan," Madrid says. "Stay the course is not a plan. Stay the course is paralysis." New Mexico's demographics

New Mexico is 43.6 percent Latino, according to the 2005 American Community Survey from the US Census Bureau.

Madrid would be the first Latina elected to the House from New Mexico if she wins.

But the otherwise hot-button issue of immigration has not surfaced in the race. One possible reason is that the state's poor economy has failed to draw large numbers of outside workers, says F. Chris Garcia, professor emeritus of political science at the University of New Mexico. The large Latino population may also mean that Latino immigrants blend in more easily, he adds.

In these parts, Historic Route 66 becomes Central Avenue as it runs through Albuquerque, and is dotted with trendy restaurants, boutique shops, and tattoo parlors. Locals weigh in on the race

Ryan and Lisabeth Harwood, both 24 and brandishing a few tattoos, were outside the Sachs Body Modifications tattoo and piercing parlor one recent afternoon. Both plan to vote in the upcoming election, but the couple has been turned off by the negative commercials on TV.

DOJ_NMG_0074661

Mr. Harwood, who works in an automotive shop, said his voter registration is unaffiliated. He voted for Wilson in the last election after meeting her at an art show - she answered his questions, and appeared competent. But he also voted for Kerry in 2004 because he agreed with the candidate on abortion and birth control issues.

Ms. Harwood, a body piercer at Sachs, did not live in the district during the last election, and has a mixed views of the candidates. "It seems that Patricia Madrid has more points that I would agree with, but the whole state treasurer fiasco has me kind of doubting her, and Heather Wilson seems more conservative and a George Bush lackey, so that has me more turned off towards her."

Ms. Harwood says of her vote in November, "I have no idea which way I'll go at this point."

First District facts

• Pop. in 2005: 640,640
• Pop. in 2000: 606,400
• Nonhispanic white: 48.5 percent
• Black: 2.3 percent
• Hispanic: 42.6 percent
• Median income: $38,413
• Poverty status: 14 percent
• Military veterans: 15.2 percent
• The International Balloon Fiesta is held in Albuquerque every October
• In 1975, Bill Gates founded Microsoft in Albuquerque
• The town of Rio Rancho is home to an Intel plant, and Sprint PCS facilities

Sources: The 2006 Almanac of American Politics and 2005 American Community Survey

Schumer Sweats His Wall Street Ties To Fill War Chest (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

It is often said in Washington that the most dangerous place to stand is between Senator Chuck Schumer and a microphone. But it is an adage that does not seem to ring true these days.

In fact, for Republicans battling to hold on to their majority in the Congress, this election cycle has proved that the New York Democrat's sharp tongue and insatiable appetite for media attention are not nearly as dangerous as his lethal ties to Wall Street.

Most Democrats have set their hopes on wresting back control of the House of Representatives this November. But Mr Schumer's fundraising efforts as chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Commission (DSCC), and improving prospects in a handful of Senate races, have some Democrats believing that a narrow Senate victory is in reach.

The support of Democratic donors from New York, particularly Wall Street, has been key to Mr Schumer's success. Of the $81.3m (€64m, £43.3m) he has helped raise - $12m more than Senator Elizabeth Dole, his Republican counterpart - roughly 18 per cent has been donated by New Yorkers, making it the most lucrative donor base. That compares with 9 per cent in 2002, during the last midterm election cycle, when Washington DC held the top spot.

"We have had a lot of DSCC chairs over the years - some have been better than others. Chuck is certainly among the best: the energy and drive and leveraging of his relationships is quite extraordinary - all you have to do is look at the numbers," says Steven Rattner, a Democratic donor and principal of Quadrangle Group, the private equity firm.

It is difficult to compare current and previous election cycle fundraising statistics because of changes in campaign finance laws enacted in 2002. However, figures compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics show a significant increase in the amount individuals from some Wall Street banks have donated to the DSCC under Mr Schumer's watch. Some examples include Goldman Sachs, where individuals have donated $512,000 to the DSCC in this cycle compared with $125,832 during the last midterm election in 2002; Citibank employees have individually given eight times more to the DSCC over the past two years than they did in 2002, or about $228,701.

DOJ_NMG_0074662

"I know a lot of people who are giving the maximum, or people who haven't given before. In NY, it helps that it's him - people know him and like him, and it's harder to say no when he makes an appeal," said one Wall Street donor.

Heather Podesta, a lobbyist and Democratic fundraiser, says Mr Schumer has differentiated himself by showing "tough love" to candidates, avoiding long-shots and personal favourites and narrowing in on races that Democrats believe are winnable: Virginia, Missouri, Ohio, Rhode Island, Montana and Pennsylvania.

"If we pick up four seats, Chuck Schumer is a hero. If we pick up six, he has God-like status," she says, hinting, too, at Mr Schumer's more ruthless side. "He is grateful but he pushes. He pushes donors, he pushes fundraisers, he does it only as a New Yorker can. It is matter-of-fact, it is to the point. And it gets done."

Mr Schumer's ties to the business community go beyond his home address: the veteran lawmaker sits on the banking and finance committees - a point not lost on some who analyse his fundraising prowess.

"In terms of the financial institutions, [donating to the DSCC] is a twofer [bonus]. Schumer is a noted fundraiser in his own right; if you can be responsive to a solicitation, you are really getting an extra bang for your buck," says Kenneth Gross, an attorney at Skadden Arps who advises on campaign finance issues. While supporters of the senator say he is liked by the business community because he is responsive to Wall Street, they also acknowledge he is not always on the "right" side of business.

Earlier this year Mr Schumer played a key role in orchestrating the backlash against the sale of US port terminals to Dubai Ports World. Although his campaign scored Democrats significant political points by portraying the White House as weak on national security and, some critics say, exploiting anti-Arab sentiment, business groups were aghast - and rattled - by the politicisation of the deal.

Even Democrats who disagree with Mr Schumer on the ports issue, as well as his stance on trade, however, recognise that for the New York senator, some political opportunities outweigh risks to the business community.

"Frankly, how can you argue with the politics of it?" says one Democratic donor. "If we do well in November, he deserves more than his share of credit. He is certainly pulling his weight, and more."

Dems, Lobbyists May Expand Partnership (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, October 4, 2006

There have been hotter tickets on K Street than the informal breakfasts sponsored by a group of centrist House Democrats.

Off and on for the past two years, the New Democrat Coalition (NDC), a “pro-growth” group that bills itself as a link between Democrats and the business community, have held regular meetings with a few friends and financial backers on K Street.

Over coffee and a modest breakfast, the handful of lobbyists who regularly attended swapped ideas with members and helped them develop a list of priorities, as they all dreamed of the day when Democrats regained control of the House so that they could actually implement the agenda.

But even if Democrats fall short of the majority this midterm, New Democrats and like-minded lobbyists say they may need to hold their meetings in a bigger room.

In a more evenly divided House, groups like the New Democrats and the Blue Dogs, a group of centrist-to-conservative Democrats, will likely hold greater sway over the legislative agenda, and therefore will be more sought after among K Streeters.

“On every issue, no matter the outcome in November, the slim majority will result in enormous influence for the NDC and other moderate blocs,” said Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.), who directs the NDC political action committee.

Moreover, Smith added, the Democrats who take over Republican seats will most likely represent swing areas that favor centrist candidates, adding to the New Dem numbers and influence on Capitol Hill.

“The closer we get [to the majority], the more relevant the New Dems are,” said Coalition Chairwoman Ellen Tauscher of California.

Lobbyists who have attended the regular meetings say that they were among the few on K Street who bothered with House Democrats, who were up against a majority that put a premium on party discipline.

“Any number of lobbyists on K Street thought the best play was the Senate because they could have a greater impact,” says attendee said.

DOJ_NMG_0074663

With a solid majority and firm grip on the Rules Committee, which decides which amendments can be introduced on the floor, House Republican leaders could pretty much determine the legislative agenda on their own, the lobbyist said. It was up to Democrats in the Senate, where the margin was closer, to block policies the party opposed.

But in recent months both New Dems and Blue Dogs have both done a "great job of presenting themselves as key to control the next Congress," said another Democratic lobbyist.

That success can be seen in the money both groups have raised in the run-up to the election.

The New Democrat Coalition PAC has raised nearly $500,000, distributing funds to more than 30 candidates. That number includes 21 challengers who would add to the ranks of the 43-member group if elected.

The Blue Dogs have done an even better job raising money. The group for the first time has raised over $1 million for candidates it supports.

Other caucuses, too, will be competing for the hearts and minds of party leadership. There are 64 members of the Congressional Progressive Caucus and 43 members of the Congressional Black Caucus, whose ranks include several members in line to take over key committees should Democrats win back the majority.

New Dems, with members from urban or suburban areas, and Blue Dogs, with a more rural base, are likely to be in conflict at times, too, particularly over social issues.

On those occasions Blue Dogs could be tough to beat. Lobbyists who support both groups say Blue Dogs have been more unified, focusing on budget issues, and attracted more support downtown. The group also sponsors weekly meetings with lobbyists.

But while New Dems have lost members in recent years, lobbyists said the result has been a more cohesive group that could rival the Blue Dogs in business community backing. Members are now required to regularly attend coalition meetings to demonstrate their commitment.

One thing that hasn't changed is the New Dems closeness to the high-tech community. Many of its members hail from districts with a large number of high-tech jobs.

Members are strong supporters of the "innovation agenda" developed by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) that seeks more money to support math and science education, permanent extension of the popular research and development tax credit, and a goal for universal broadband Internet access within the next five years.

In August, Smith, Tauscher and fellow New Dems Joseph Crowley and Carolyn McCarthy, both of New York, met executives from Sun, Oracle, Google, Yahoo!, Cisco, and several financial services groups in a series of meetings in Silicon Valley.

That followed a retreat last spring at the Hyatt Regency Resort at Chesapeake Bay. Lobbyists who attended had to have contributed $5,000 to the PAC. Twelve New Dem members and more than 100 congressional staff members and K Street lobbyists attended the retreat.

And the breakfast meetings, once held once a month, have been "amped up," in the words of one congressional aide, to once a week. Regularly attendees include: Dan Tate, of Capitol Solutions, Cory Alexander of Fannie Mae, Matt Tanielian of Cisco, Josh Ackil of the Information Technology Industry Council, Bruce Andrews of Quinn Gillespie, Scott Parven at Clark Consulting, and Melissa Schulman of the Bockorny Group.

Lobbyists said their clients could be expected to take an even greater interest in New Dems after the election.

"For a long time there were entire sections of the business community that haven't looked at these groups," Tate said. "But there is a natural fit there."

That doesn't mean, though, that business groups can expect to be as welcome in Democratic offices as they are in Republican ones.

"We represent swing districts," Tauscher said. "But we are damn good Democrats."

Senate Candidates Sound Familiar Themes In First Debate (AP)

By Kristen Wyatt

AP, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074664

BALTIMORE - In their first debate of the general campaign, Maryland's candidates for an open Senate seat repeated familiar themes in laying out a case for votes.

The Democrat, U.S. Rep. Ben Cardin, emphasized his opposition to the war in Iraq and a call for universal health insurance.

The Republican, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, called for more investment in minority businesses and said he'd be a careful listener for voters.

The independent, Kevin Zeese, mostly lobbed criticisms at the main parties and called for immediate abandonment of the war effort in Iraq.

The debate, held at the Baltimore Urban League, was the first - and so far only - forum for all three candidates before the election Nov. 7 to replace retiring Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes. Most of the 200 or so people in the audience were there in support of a candidate.

Race and the war were dominant themes at the two-hour forum. Cardin, who spoke first, immediately launched into the Iraq situation, reminding voters that he voted against the war while in the House.

"We may be in fact encouraging more terror than we've solved with the war in Iraq," he said.

Steele made only oblique references to the war in his opening statements, not saying how the nation should proceed. Asked about his position later, Steele said he opposed a withdrawal plan for the troops and said the war should be fought differently, perhaps, but not ended.

"We need to make sure we finish the job," he said. "This is not the time to step back."

Zeese, whose opposition to the war is paramount to his outsider campaign, was happy to deride both Democrats and Republicans for allowing and funding the war. "The sensible thing to do," he said, "is to get out."

Race was another theme in the forum. Steele is the only African-American elected statewide, running against a white Democrat. Steele brought up race early, opening his remarks with a story about his sharecropping ancestors and working-poor mother. He said he was proud to be a Republican.

"The real Michael Steele is someone who was raised to think for himself," he said. He later said that his status as a rare black Republican "empowered me to look across party lines."

Cardin said he'd be the best candidate for black voters because, even though he is white, he would challenge Republicans and President Bush.

"The voters in the African-American community want change," he said, describing himself as the best candidate to change the nation's direction.

But Steele and Zeese laid claim to that role as well. Steele plainly told voters not to choose him if they don't want a major shake-up in Washington, and Zeese argued that no one from a major party would be the agent to change the federal government.

The debate was the only one scheduled so far in the general campaign to include all three candidates on Maryland ballots. Steele and Cardin have agreed to a televised debate on NBC's "Meet the Press" late this month, but no other debates have been set.

Steele, Cardin Draw Distinctions (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

BALTIMORE, Oct. 3 -- Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and U.S. Rep. Benjamin Cardin stripped away the niceties and exchanged sharp words Tuesday night in their first debate in the race for the U.S. Senate.

Steele, the Republican, at one point told the Baltimore congressman to "shut up and listen" to the citizens of the state. Cardin unloaded on Steele for failing to address a series of issues while campaigning -- most pointedly, the war in Iraq.

The debate offered the first chance to see the striking contrasts between the two major party candidates vying for the seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D).

DOJ_NMG_0074665

The physical differences between the two, standing on stage in a Gothic 19th-century church building in downtown Baltimore, were impossible to miss -- Steele, 47, 6-foot-4 and looking polished in a designer suit; Cardin, 62, short and a bit portly in standard dark pinstripe, looking every bit the bookish legislative technician.

For Cardin, a chief goal of the debate was to turn the focus away from style and onto substance, where there are also sharp differences between the two that put him more in line with the views of Maryland's large population of Democratic voters.

"It's not about how nice we appear or how we deal with friendliness or how well we listen, because I'm a pretty good listener," Cardin said. "It's about how you are going to represent the interests of the people of Maryland."

In the first remarks of the night, before 300 people, Cardin checked off a long list of positions he has taken: opposing the Iraq war, supporting a minimum wage increase, backing embryonic stem cell research. He urged Steele to address each one, and concluded that his experience on Capitol Hill would put him in the position to "get things done."

"I have been effective when the Democrats controlled Congress and when Republicans have controlled Congress," he said. "As a result, I've changed Washington."

When Steele took his first turn to speak, he tried to turn Cardin's 20 years in Congress and 40 years in elected office against him. The man who took his first elected job in 2002 repeatedly described himself as an agent of change and his opponent as someone who has been on Capitol Hill too long.

"I do not want to go to Washington to retire," Steele said. "I want to go get something done."

The lieutenant governor, seizing the offensive, chided Cardin for not acknowledging the presence of independent candidate Kevin Zeese.

"What you just watched was the problem of Washington," Steele said, stepping out from the podium to face Cardin. "They run their mouths, but they do not listen. After 40 years of service, honorable service, he still has not learned to look around the room and shut up and listen. That was a lesson my mother taught me a long time ago."

Zeese, who has the backing of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties, spoke next.

"I don't think we've been more off track than we are now," Zeese said of the nation. He derided the war and the efforts by special interests to control Washington. "We all know that the elephant in the room is that this country is being sold to the highest bidder."

Cardin succeeded only somewhat at his primary aim: pinning down Steele on issues that the lieutenant governor has avoided discussing: the Iraq war, health-care policy, Social Security.

The starkest differences between the candidates emerged during a question about the Iraq war. Cardin called for an immediate redeployment of troops without a specific timetable for withdrawal. Zeese called for an immediate withdrawal. Steele said that troops should stay but that the United States should "shift our tactics."

"This is not the time to step back," Steele said.

The moderator pressed Steele: "Tell me Mr. Steele, are things going badly?"

"In what respect?" Steele replied, prompting derisive laughter from the crowd. Pressed again, Steele conceded: "It's not going well, no."

The stylistic distinctions were ever-present on stage. On several occasions, Cardin slipped into using acronyms and impenetrable government-speak, while Steele fell back on his compelling personal story.

Steele presented himself as an independent voice, and he challenged Cardin's assertion that he would "change the direction of this nation" in the Senate.

"I appreciate your definition of change, but, frankly, it's an outdated definition," Steele responded. "How can you be a change agent when you vote 95 percent of the time with your party?"

Cardin disagreed, saying after the debate that his long record shows that "I call it as I see it."

Steele came armed with numbers for one of the most consistent lines of attack against Cardin: his campaign contributions from political action committees tied to large drug and energy companies.

In commercials and in person, Steele has suggested that Cardin is beholden to special interests in Washington. In reality, both of them have raised hundreds of thousands of dollars from PACs. Steele has enlisted a group of lobbyists -- known as Team Steele -- to solicit PAC contributions for him.

DOJ_NMG_0074666

Both campaigns view debates as critical in the hotly contested race, although it remains unclear how many there will be. Among Cardin's advisers, the debates are viewed as a chance to humanize a candidate who has spent the past 40 years in public life, and to turn the race into a clash of policy ideas.

For Steele, the debates are a chance to present himself as a serious alternative to Cardin, even for Democrats who might normally shy away from a former chairman of the Maryland Republican Party.

Steele, Cardin Wrangle Over Race In Debate (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland's U.S. Senate candidates Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin clashed over racial issues last night in their first debate of the campaign.

"There are too many divisions in America along racial lines and along economic lines," Mr. Cardin, a Democrat, said during the two-hour debate at the Greater Baltimore Urban League, which is based in a church that once served as a refuge for escaped slaves on the famed Underground Railroad.

"Voters in the African-American community want change, and if they vote for me, they will get change," Mr. Cardin said. "I voted against [President] Bush's budget because Bush's budget is leading America in the wrong direction, and the people in the African-American community know that."

Mr. Steele, a Republican and the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland, responded: "I appreciate your message of change, but it is an outdated message."

"My opponent, Mr. Cardin, says he wants to be a change agent," Mr. Steele told the boisterous crowd that filled the old church hall. "How can you be a change agent if you vote with your party 95 percent of the time?"

The candidates also clashed over the Iraq war, health care and education.

Mr. Cardin said his Republican opponent was allied with the president in support of the Iraq war and against raising the minimum wage and universal health care coverage.

"I've stood up to the presidents of both parties when it was in the interest of the citizens of Maryland," said Mr. Cardin, who has been running on his experience as a 10-term congressman from Baltimore and former speaker of the state House of Delegates.

Mr. Steele criticized Mr. Cardin, 62, for spending 20 years in Congress and showing little change to the quality of life in his district.

"At what point, Mr. Cardin, will you begin looking at what is going on in your own back yard?" he said.

Earlier, Mr. Steele, 47, chided Mr. Cardin for opening remarks that focused almost exclusively on the lieutenant governor's association with Mr. Bush.

"What you have just witnessed is the trouble with Washington," Mr. Steele said. "They run their mouths, but they don't listen. ... After 40 years of humble public service, he still has not learned to look around the room, shut up and listen."

The remark drew competing cheers and jeers from the crowd.

Mr. Steele said Mr. Cardin had ignored the other candidate in the debate, Kevin Zeese, 51, an anti-war activist running under the banners of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele are expected to meet at least one more time before the Nov. 7 election, including an appearance Oct. 29 on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele have similar stances on key issues, such as advocating an expedited exit strategy for troops in Iraq. But they confront each other from opposite ends of the political spectrum.

Mr. Cardin is a liberal who last year received a 95 percent rating from the liberal Americans for Democratic Action.

Mr. Steele is a conservative, but with an independent streak that at times could put him at odds with his party.

The starkest contrast is on abortion. Mr. Steele is pro-life; Mr. Cardin is pro-choice.

However, racial politics remain the focus of the contest.

DOJ_NMG_0074667

Black voters account for much of the Democrat's 2-to-1 advantage in voter registration. Maryland has nearly 900,000 registered Republicans and about 1.7 million registered Democrats, of which an estimated 700,000 are black.

Mr. Steele's ability to forge inroads to black communities has made the race one of the most closely watched in the country and one of the most hard-fought campaigns between the national parties.

Mr. Cardin has scrambled to connect with black voters since his narrow win in the Democratic primary over Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 43.8 percent to 40.4 percent, despite outspending Mr. Mfume by about $3 million on television ads.

Mr. Mfume won by large margins in Baltimore and Prince George's County, two of the state's most populous and heavily Democratic jurisdictions that also are more than 65 percent black.

Mr. Cardin last week wooed black voters at a campaign rally in Prince George's County with Mr. Mfume and Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat and the country's only black senator.

However, the rally was tempered by Mr. Mfume's public criticism that the state Democratic Party still lacks black candidates at the top of the ticket.

"The Democratic ticket of four nominees for statewide office ... still looks like the Democratic ticket for state office in 1956," he said.

The sting of racism keeps infecting the campaign.

Mr. Steele has criticized Mr. Cardin for stirring anti-Republican sentiment in black communities by repeatedly invoking Mr. Bush and the Hurricane Katrina disaster, which for some has come to symbolize the Bush administration's supposed neglect of poor black people.

The references to Katrina and Mr. Bush follow the Democratic National Committee's strategy of convincing voters that Mr. Steele is a "typical Republican" as opposed to a black candidate.

Mr. Cardin, who last year pledged not to use racial attacks against Mr. Steele, said he is not race-baiting by talking about the government's response to the hurricane because it is an issue in the Senate race.

"It is about the failure of government to protect its most vulnerable citizens," he said.

Mr. Zeese railed against the Democrats and Republicans, saying they are "status quo parties" that are beholden to corporate special interests. He advocated free college tuition, an end to the United States' global military presence and development of clean energy technologies.

"We've got to say no more corporate control," Mr. Zeese said. "We need a government of the people. That's what I'm running for."

The forum was Maryland's first debate for statewide office to include a third-party candidate.

Sen. Clinton Supports Webb In Va. Campaign (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton endorsed Democratic Senate candidate James Webb yesterday as he and Republican Sen. George Allen intensified their efforts to woo female voters in the Virginia campaign's closing month.

The high profile appearance by Clinton (D-N.Y.) at a fundraising lunch in Old Town Alexandria provided a needed boost to Webb, whom Allen has criticized for his past attitude toward women in the military.

While the former first lady was announcing her support for Webb, Allen was attending a similar function in Fredericksburg held by his wife, Susan, and Cecelia Howell, the wife of House of Delegates Speaker William J. Howell (R-Stafford).

The Senate candidates' views toward women have become a central character issue of the campaign. Allen, who has had problems with questions about his racial sensitivity, has sought to shift attention to Webb's opposition 27 years ago to women in combat.

Allen is running an expensive statewide television advertising campaign featuring three female graduates of the U.S. Naval Academy complaining about remarks Webb wrote in a 1979 magazine article, "Women Can't Fight." Webb, a former Marine and secretary of the Navy, began airing an ad yesterday with a female academy graduate rebutting the allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0074668

Echoing the theme of Webb's ad, Clinton told reporters: "I've watched and analyzed what Jim Webb has done when he was in the Pentagon, opening up positions -- thousands of them -- to women when previously they had not been available. We have women serving with valor and distinction because the battlefield has changed."

A day after paying for a two-minute TV commercial calling for the campaign to focus on political issues instead of character issues, Allen said at the Fredericksburg luncheon that his Webb commercials are about "respect for women." His campaign vowed to continue attacking what they say is the Democrat's biggest vulnerability.

"That article from 1979 gives an insight into the core of James Webb that is not going to go away and is going to cut deeply," Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said. He said the Democrats have "gone into a defensive posture, trying to blunt the criticism about Webb's disrespect of women."

Webb has said he was not wrong for participating in a national debate in the late 1970s about whether women should serve in the military. He has said he is "fully comfortable with the roles of women in the military today."

The most recent polls show the Allen-Webb race tied. Advisers for both camps said the winner Nov. 7 could be the candidate with an advantage among women, who account for 3.7 million, or slightly more than half, of Virginia's population.

Female voters helped Timothy M. Kaine (D) beat former attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore (R) last year in the governor's race after Kaine offered messages about preschool, traffic and faith that were tailored specifically for church-going women in the suburbs.

Nationally, both parties have spent millions courting "soccer moms" and "security moms," mothers worried about terrorism and security issues.

"It's the same group. It's moderate to conservative women who are perhaps not so consumed with the political process because they have lives to live," said Democratic pollster Pete Brodnitz, who worked for Kaine last year and is now on Webb's team. "They are making their decision a bit later. There's a lot of effort expended on both sides to talk to women."

Allen aides said they will continue to seek advantage among that group by hammering Webb for his past views, which included highly-charged language to describe women at the Naval Academy. Wadhams said they will also continue to showcase Allen's wife, who was a popular first lady when Allen was governor.

"We have a very strong opportunity to appeal to women voters, and I think that's a significant part of the debate," Wadhams said.

Webb campaign manager Steve Jarding dismissed Allen's appeal to women, noting that the senator opposes abortion rights and embryonic stem cell research -- two issues that Jarding said put Allen at odds with most women in Virginia.

"This is not a champion of women's issues," Jarding said of the senator. "The Allen campaign knows that." One of the Naval Academy graduates who initially joined Allen in criticizing Webb has now accepted his apology and endorsed the Democrat.

Clinton, who raised about $75,000 for Webb, praised him as a decisive leader who would stand up to the Bush administration. She said it was important to "replace subservient Republicans who are unwilling to ask the hard questions with Democrats like Jim Webb, who will."

Webb once called President Bill Clinton's administration the most "corrupt" in history. He has said his animosity was fueled by Clinton's attempts to get out of serving in Vietnam, where Webb was wounded and received several medals and commendations.

As for his support of women, Webb said yesterday that "probably the most important thing I can say about that entire issue is that there's a term in law, res ipsa loquitur , the thing speaks for itself"; he then introduced his top campaign staff members, five of whom are women.

Allen spoke yesterday to about 50 women in Howell's backyard in Fredericksburg. Several of the women there wore buttons proclaiming "Vote for Susan Allen's Husband."

The senator said he has been a leader in efforts to get more women interested in pursuing careers in math and science. Allen also talked about keeping taxes low and winning the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0074669

When Susan Allen was asked whether she agreed with her husband's opposition to abortion rights, she said: "Labels are not necessarily a good thing. I believe George's record looking at that particular issue is excellent. He's represented Virginia values."

Hillary Headlines Webb Event (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton endorsed Democrat James H. Webb Jr. in the U.S. Senate race in Virginia at a fundraiser yesterday, while incumbent Sen. George Allen tried to refocus his stumbling campaign on his political accomplishments.

The former first lady also downplayed a television advertisement paid for by Mr. Allen that hammers Mr. Webb for the view he held about a woman's role in combat 27 years ago.

Mrs. Clinton, who headlined the "Women for Webb" luncheon in Alexandria, said Congress needs someone with Mr. Webb's military expertise and demonstrated leadership who can stand up to President Bush and the Republican majority.

"We need to elect Democrats," Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, said. "We're never going to have the right kind of debate about what needs to be done in Iraq or Afghanistan until we have some leverage in the Congress and frankly replace some of the subservient Republicans who are unwilling to ask the hard questions, and Democrats like Jim Webb will."

Mr. Allen has backed Mr. Bush 96 percent of the time, making the senator the third biggest supporter of the president in the U.S. Senate.

When asked about Mr. Webb's 1979 "Women Can't Fight" article that questioned whether women were fit for military combat and apparently led to women facing harassment at the Naval Academy, Mrs. Clinton said, "Times have changed."

"That was about 30 years ago, and I've watched and analyzed what Jim Webb has done when he was in the Pentagon -- opening up positions, thousands of them to women where previously they had not been available," Mrs. Clinton said.

Mr. Webb has apologized for the "tone" of the article and stressed that as secretary of the Navy under President Reagan he opened more military billets to women than any secretary in history had.

Meanwhile, Mr. Allen kicked off an "Issues, Ideas, Proven Record Tour" in Fredericksburg, Va., yesterday, as he tries to refocus his campaign on his record as state legislator, congressman, governor and U.S. Senator.

Mrs. Clinton's appearance at Mr. Webb's fundraiser came the morning after Mr. Allen aired a rare two-minute statewide TV address Monday evening to turn around a floundering campaign. Mr. Allen's campaign spent $50,000 on the ad.

Mr. Allen's campaign has been bogged down in character questions concerning his "macaca" remark, his reaction to a reporter's question about his Jewish heritage and accusations that he often used the "n-word" in the 1970s. Mr. Allen referred to a Webb aide as a macaca -- considered a racial slur in some cultures -- while campaigning in August.

"The negative personal attacks and baseless allegations have also pulled us away from what you expect and deserve," Mr. Allen told viewers in the ad.

The prerecorded address ran a few minutes after one of Mr. Allen's spots attacking Mr. Webb for his positions in the "Women Can't Fight" article had aired.

Mr. Webb's campaign yesterday responded to Mr. Allen's negative attacks with a 30-second TV ad featuring retired military women praising Mr. Webb's record as Navy secretary.

"He created more operational positions for women than anybody in the history of the Navy," retired Coast Guard Petty Officer 1st Class Nancy McPherson says in the ad.

"It's easy to just take shots at people, it's harder to actually change things, and that's what I did as Navy secretary," Mr. Webb says in the ad.

The new spot comes toward the end of a three-month period in which Mr. Webb has benefited from Mr. Allen's missteps and raised an estimated $3 million.

Kristian Denny Todd, a spokeswoman for Mr. Webb, said the campaign will use the money to air additional TV ads that will highlight differences between the candidates.

Allen Adlifts Hopes Of Backers (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0074670

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Virginia conservatives, frustrated with Sen. George Allen's re-election campaign, were hopeful yesterday that the Republican's address televised statewide Monday evening will reverse his slip in the polls.

The senator now is almost tied with or slightly favored over his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr. Supporters say Mr. Allen needs to refocus on the issues if he wants to win re-election.

That was what Mr. Allen promised in the rare two-minute ad, saying that until the Nov. 7 election he will talk about his record, both as a senator and as governor in the 1990s.

"Good enough, but hardly enough to change the course of the race," wrote Norman Leahy, an Allen supporter who runs the One Man's Trash blog. "Will this spot change any votes? No."

The taped spot, which ran on five stations just before 8 p.m., was a smart move but might not be enough, said state Sen. Jay O'Brien, Fairfax County Republican.

"It was the right thing to do to say, 'Let's get off this other junk and talk about the issues,'" he said.

Mr. O'Brien said he was shocked at Mr. Allen's defensive stance to accusations that he used racial slurs as a college football player and to the fallout from the widely televised moment when he called an Indian-American Webb volunteer "macaca." The word is considered an ethnic slur in some cultures.

David B. Botkins, a former press aide to Mr. Allen, said the ad charts a positive course.

"It changes the calculus" and re-energizes Mr. Allen's conservative base, he said.

Delegate David B. Albo, Fairfax County Republican, said energetic conservatives will be key for Mr. Allen on Election Day.

"All we need to win the Senate seat for George Allen is to have the Republicans in Northern Virginia show up," he said. "If they stay home, we have problems."

Some Republicans put Mr. Allen at fault for steering the campaign off course, particularly with the "macaca" remark.

Mr. Allen acknowledged in the ad: "Some of this I've brought on myself."

"This whole campaign has degenerated into macaca and all the other racial allegations, and no one knows that he's probably going to go down in history as one of the best governors of Virginia, putting him on the same level as Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson," Mr. Albo said.

One Republican expressed regret last week that Jay Timmons, a longtime Allen adviser, was not on board.

"He was a control freak, but there was control," the Republican said.

Mr. Timmons left to join the private sector in 2004, but Hotline on Call reported Monday that he has returned to Mr. Allen's staff as a senior adviser.

The Allen campaign said the Monday night ad cost $50,000. The senator is following up with a statewide tour with the theme "Issues, Ideas, Proven Record."

Shaun Kenney, a conservative Republican who ran unsuccessfully for a Spotsylvania seat in the House of Delegates last year, called the ad a "huge" step forward for Mr. Allen.

"Take note, Webb supporters. When the opposition is getting dogpiled by the press, go positive," he said.

Critics said Mr. Allen's wife, Susan, seemed "awkward" and "plastic" standing next to her husband in the ad.

Others praised the placement of a photograph of Mr. Allen's late father, George H. Allen, near a helmet of the Washington Redskins, the team he coached.

Understanding George Allen's Best Black Friend (WP)

By Courtland Milloy

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Benjamin J. Lambert III, who serves in the Virginia Senate, hears the question all the time: Why would such an influential black Democrat come to the rescue of George Allen, a white Republican U.S. senator who was being tarred and feathered by his own racist past?

DOJ_NMG_0074671

Allen's once seemingly sure-shot bid for reelection remains in jeopardy because of accusations that he used a racial slur and the fact that he had an affinity for racist symbols such as nooses and the Confederate flag. But the political hemorrhaging has eased somewhat since Allen found a powerful new best black friend to help burnish his image.

"I look at it from the point of view that people are capable of change, of learning from their mistakes," said Lambert, a 28-year veteran of Virginia electoral politics and former campaign manager for L. Douglas Wilder (D) during his run to become the first African American governor since Reconstruction. "George has apologized. He said he understands the plight of African Americans and their sensitivities regarding the Confederate flag. He said he was going to do much better. I say, 'Let's give him a chance.' "

It is no coincidence that Lambert's endorsement came after a pledge by Allen to secure nearly a half-billion dollars in federal funding for financially troubled historically black colleges. Moreover, at Lambert's urging, Allen, along with Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), announced their sponsorship Monday of a bill that would honor the late U.S. District Judges Spottswood W. Robinson III, who was black, and Robert R. Merhige Jr., who was white, by having a new federal courts building in Richmond named after them "for their historic roles in the nation's civil rights struggle."

No small order in the capital of the Confederacy.

Asked if Allen's financial commitments had influenced his decision to endorse, Lambert demurred: "Let's just say I have a strategy."

But not everybody is convinced that a half-billion dollars is adequate reparation for Allen's alleged insults, which some see as evidence that the racist underpinnings of Virginia's virulent history of slavery live on.

One blog, Skeptical Brotha, offered a reaction to Lambert's endorsement that is no doubt shared by many African Americans: "George Allen's confederate bandwagon of confused colored folks has grown by another this week," the blogger wrote last month.

Other blacks who support Allen include William R. Harvey, president of historically black Hampton University, and Charley Taylor and Roy Jefferson, both retired professional football players who were coached by Allen's late father on the Washington Redskins. "For these manifestly fraudulent endorsements, these contemptable black sycophants have earned themselves Skeptical Brotha's '2006 House Negroes of the Year Award,' " the blogger wrote.

But Lambert is undaunted. To hear him tell it, there is always more to racial politics in Virginia than meets the eye. Sometimes a whole lot more -- as in, say, the legendary affair between Thomas Jefferson and Sally Hemings.

"I was born in 1937 and went to segregated schools in Henrico County," Lambert told me. "But I had white friends. Somehow, we all got along. I found that people could be different up close than they appeared to be from afar."

To Lambert, Allen looks better up close. He is more than someone who referred to a person of color as "macaca," which is a genus of monkey. "I'm not going to hold a person's words against them, especially after they stand up and apologize," Lambert said. "I'm most interested in education for African Americans, making sure historically black colleges stay in existence, and I'm going to work with anyone who can help keep them alive. George and I share that goal."

As for people who call him a sellout, Lambert said, "What have they done to keep a school open?"

And yet, the appearance of Allen buying his way out of a racially explosive predicament discounts the black struggle against racism -- which continues despite the insistence of some whites that race no longer matters. During a speech in February about the need for a U.S. Slavery Museum, former governor Wilder, now mayor of Richmond, noted that slavery and racism were not ancient history. "The legacy of slavery is as much a part of our present and, if left alone, will tragically remain a part of our future."

Wilder has publicly expressed bewilderment at his former campaign manager's decision to support Allen. But in private talks with Lambert, Wilder does not come off as confused at all. "He asked me to talk to George about getting money for the slave museum," Lambert recalled.

Race relations are not always what they seem. And in a state fraught with racial contradictions, macaca may turn out to be a gift to African Americans that keeps on giving. At least if Lambert has his way.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

DOJ_NMG_0074672

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

A real achievement

"The 109th Congress limped out of town at a particularly ugly moment. But it had some achievements worth noting. Well, one achievement, anyway," syndicated columnist James P. Pinkerton writes.

"It might be the case that this November the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley ... will be foremost in the voters' minds. If that's the situation, Republicans will have a bad Election Day, exactly five weeks from now," Mr. Pinkerton said yesterday.

"And if so, then the biggest accomplishment of this Congress, the authorization for construction of a wall across much of the U.S.-Mexican border, is likely to be downplayed by the media. Yet, fortunately, the wall-building issue is firmly planted in voters' minds, not only for this election, but for the future. And while the partisans on both sides of the debate are fired up by the wall-troversy, it's obvious that immigration hawks far outnumber immigration doves."

Cash infusion

Democrat Ned Lamont, seeking to erase Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman's double-digit lead, is turning to his campaign's biggest financial backer for another infusion of cash: himself.

The multimillionaire businessman, who trailed by 10 percent in a recent poll, wrote a $500,000 check to his campaign this week, an aide said yesterday. Just last week, Mr. Lamont had tapped his personal wealth for $750,000 to help fund the race. He has spent $6,751,500 of his own money to unseat the 18-year incumbent.

The Lamont camp said it needs the money to blunt Mr. Lieberman's aggressive television ad campaign. Both sides are spending heavily on commercials. Mr. Lieberman has run ads recently suggesting that political newcomer Mr. Lamont lacks the experience to be an effective senator.

"Ned is not going to let Senator Lieberman's negative allegations go unanswered," said Lamont spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl. "We've said all along we're not going to take this lying down."

The Lieberman campaign scoffed at Mr. Lamont's move to bolster his campaign, the Associated Press reports.

"We fully expect Ned Lamont to keep drawing on millions of his own money to continue funding his negative campaign," said Lieberman spokeswoman Tammy Sun.

Meanwhile, in another good sign for the Lieberman campaign, the Hill newspaper reports that Mr. Lieberman says the chamber's Democratic leadership has assured him he would keep his seniority if he returns to Congress as an independent.

But Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, said his boss "won't make any decisions until after the elections in November."

A taxing agenda

"Democrats are campaigning on 'a new direction for America,' but they've been deliberately abstemious with any details of what that means," the Wall Street Journal says in an editorial.

"New York Sen. Chuck Schumer told the Journal last week that silence is their strategy because laying out an agenda 'gives Republicans a target.' So much for the courage of one's convictions," the newspaper said.

"Apparently, however, Mr. Schumer hasn't connected with Charlie Rangel, the 36-year House veteran from New York City who will chair the Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win a majority. Mr. Rangel has been happy to explain his own agenda on taxes and the war in Iraq.

"In a recent interview with Bloomberg News, Mr. Rangel was asked specifically if any of the Bush first-term tax cuts were worth preserving, and he answered that he 'cannot think of one.' Then last week, Mr. Rangel was asked by Congress Daily whether he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum. 'No question about it,' he said. 'Everything has to be on the table.'

"'Everything' would mean repealing the 10 percent low-income bracket, the child tax credit and marriage-penalty relief, all of which passed in 2001 and expire in 2010. According to the Treasury Department, repealing those provisions would raise taxes on the average middle-income family by about $2,000 a year. Most Democrats say they only want to raise taxes on the rich, so give the would-be chairman points for honesty."

Back in the race

DOJ_NMG_0074673

Rep. John P. Murtha is back in the race for House majority leader, should the Democrats come out on top in November, Roll Call reports.

"We're back campaigning again," Mr. Murtha said Friday in an interview taped for C-SPAN's "Newsmakers."

The Pennsylvania lawmaker had suspended his bid in June just days after announcing his intentions, faced with criticism from fellow Democrats who feared a divisive leadership campaign could distract the party heading into the November elections.

Name game

A divided Ohio Supreme Court yesterday threw out a lawsuit attempting to force the release of the names of donors backing a group that ran ads critical of the Democratic candidate for governor.

Democrats want to know who donated $1.5 million that a group called Common Sense Ohio gave to Common Sense 2006, which used the money for ads criticizing Democratic Rep. Ted Strickland. The two groups say the contributors' identities are protected by their nonprofit status.

The court ruled 4-3 that it didn't have jurisdiction to rule on the lawsuit, filed by the Ohio Democratic Party on behalf of Mr. Strickland. The court said state law gives that authority solely to the Ohio Elections Commission.

10-point lead

Washington Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Democrat, has a 10-point lead over Republican challenger Mike McGavick five weeks before the election, according to a new McClatchy-MSNBC poll.

Miss Cantwell was at 50 percent, and Mr. McGavick, a former insurance company executive, at 40 percent, with 9 percent undecided. Nearly half of those polled had a favorable opinion of Miss Cantwell. She is seeking a second term six years after she was elected by 2,229 votes in what was then one of the closest races in state history.

Mr. McGavick's approval rating stood at 30 percent, but even after months of nonstop campaigning, 45 percent of those surveyed had no opinion about him or didn't recognize him.

Back in Ohio

Returning to the state that dashed his presidential hopes in 2004, Sen. John Kerry urged college students: "Take back Ohio; take back our country."

"All of the things that make a difference in the real quality of life are going in the wrong direction," the Massachusetts Democrat told about 300 supporters in the rally at Ohio State University.

Mr. Kerry, who conceded the 2004 election after he lost Ohio's 20 electoral votes, defended the Democrats against charges that they have no ideas, citing plans by Democrats for health care, education, jobs, trade and global warming, the Associated Press reports.

Democrats' Jersey Barrier (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

JERSEY CITY -- It's 1 in the morning, and Bob Menendez, a red bindi dot on his forehead, is at his third Navratri festival of the night. "Namaste," says the Democratic senator, pressing his palms together and looking out over a street thronged with Indian Americans who've taken a break from the exuberant dancing at the traditional Hindu festival.

On this day, Menendez's pitch to keep his Senate seat has taken him on a marathon spin through the ethnic kaleidoscope of New Jersey politics. He dropped by the city's Irish Festival, a backyard barbecue with the Latino community, a meeting with African American leaders and a Korean celebration -- before boarding a bus full of Indian American supporters for this late-night blitz.

"I always drive myself hard," he says, but this fall the 52-year-old Menendez has especially good reason to push. In a year when Democrats across the country are doing better than expected, his race could be a glaring counterexample -- and a potentially costly one, given Democrats' outside chance of retaking the Senate.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine tapped Menendez, then the House's third-ranking Democrat, to fill his unexpired Senate term. Winning election on his own should have been the easy part -- this reliably blue state hasn't elected a Republican senator for 34 years, and President Bush's popularity is low. But Menendez now finds himself in a too-close-to-call race against Republican Tom

DOJ_NMG_0074674

Kean Jr., the 38-year-old son of the popular former governor. The scion of a patrician family, Kean is waging a decidedly ungentlemanly campaign against Menendez, the son of poor Cuban immigrants.

The race, in broad strokes, comes down to Bush fatigue vs. corruption fatigue. Menendez is doing his best to lash Kean to the president and his policies. Kean hardly mentions Bush or his party, though he's been happy to accept fundraising help from Laura Bush and Karl Rove. Instead, much as Menendez seeks to link Kean to Bush, Kean paints Menendez as "an individual who personifies the system that has hurt New Jersey for so long."

In hammering on corruption, Kean may have lucked out -- in his timing and opponent. Even in a state where tales of corrupt officials are as common as turnpike traffic, this has been a busy season. One powerful Democratic state senator was implicated in arranging a no-show state job for himself. The former state Senate president pleaded guilty to taking bribes. The attorney general, a Menendez protege, had to quit after intervening in a traffic stop of her boyfriend. Former governor Jim McGreevey, who resigned after admitting he put his gay lover on the state payroll, has just published a book.

And Menendez, who got his start in the notoriously corrupt politics of North Jersey's Hudson County, has offered Kean ample ammunition. Some of the attacks on him have been decidedly below the belt, others overstated even by the loose rules of political license, but some involve the kind of back-scratching coziness that looks even worse in the unforgiving light of a 30-second attack ad.

Kean accused Menendez of being "part of a massive kickback scheme" in Union City 25 years ago, citing his 12 appearances before a federal grand jury that culminated in the racketeering conviction of Menendez's political mentor, Mayor William V. Musto. In fact, four former federal prosecutors in the case contradicted Kean's assessment. "[I]t was certainly an act of courage for him to testify against the entire city government," one told the New York Times.

Similarly, Kean assails Menendez for "putting $350,000 of federal taxpayer money in his own pocket" -- accusations that arise from Menendez renting a house he owned to a nonprofit agency he helped to get federal funds, even as agency employees donated to his campaigns. Reports from the time indicate that the rental was at market rates; Menendez says the ethics panel approved the arrangement. Still, federal prosecutors have subpoenaed records, and Menendez himself says he wouldn't do it again.

Adding to Menendez's woes, last week he had to sever ties with his childhood friend and closest political adviser, Donald Scarinci, after a tape surfaced in which Scarinci urges a Hudson County contractor to make a particular hire. "That would be a favor to the congressman," Scarinci says, adding that "it makes sense for you because it gives you protection."

Kean tries to bring home the corruption issue, linking it, not entirely convincingly, to the state's "unaffordability," especially high property taxes -- never mind that local taxes aren't something a U.S. senator can do much about. "That type of personal profiting from public office is what raises people's taxes and makes this state more unaffordable," he says.

Politically, Kean is no Lincoln Chafee moderate -- or even a Tom Kean Sr. moderate. He is pro-choice and supports federally funded embryonic stem cell research, but he backs the Bush tax cuts, would have voted for his Supreme Court nominees and the war in Iraq, and denounces Bush's immigration plan as unacceptable "amnesty."

Menendez, for his part, seems offended by having to run against the unseasoned Kean in what he describes as "probably the most vile campaign I have ever participated in."

Dismissing the closeness of the polls, he says, "New Jersey is a late-deciding state." The open question is what, 34 days from now, its voters will decide they're most fed up with.

Steve Poizner For Insurance Commissioner (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

CALIFORNIA HAS ONLY HAD TWO elected insurance commissioners. First there was Democrat John Garamendi, who was seen as a champion of consumers, and then Republican Chuck Quackenbush, who resigned in disgrace amid allegations he allowed insurance companies to underpay their 1994 Northridge earthquake claims. Prosecutors never filed charges, but after two appointees filled out the term, voters returned Garamendi to the job in 2003.

Now Garamendi is leaving again, and the fight is renewed between consumer advocates — who say the industry is out to cheat customers — and insurance companies, which say regulators don't understand the market. Garamendi is backing

DOJ_NMG_0074675

Democratic Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante over Republican tycoon Steve Poizner. The twist is that the best choice for consumers, hands down, is Poizner.

The Silicon Valley entrepreneur has solid market credentials, having built a billion-dollar company from a global positioning device that locates cellphone users for emergency operators. He has made reducing insurance fraud a priority, which would protect the industry but also would allow companies to offer lower prices to consumers. He acknowledges that "insurance companies want to own this position" — and he vows not to let them. He has said he'll defend Garamendi's auto insurance rate regulations, which put a person's driving record ahead of where the driver lives. He vows to defend Proposition 103.

He's credible, and his history shows he's a man of integrity. He thinks before he acts, a trait exemplified by his careful study of a liberal Democratic Bay Area Assembly district that he almost won, and his equally studious approach to and backing for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's redistricting reform, a measure that, while unsuccessful, was worthy. The insurance commissioner's job, he notes, "requires analytical horsepower." Poizner has it.

Bustamante, as a legislator, often backed bills that insurance companies sought to help them avoid complying with Proposition 103. For example, he advocated the repeal of the initiative's good-driver discount. When he ran for governor in the campaign to recall Gray Davis, he misused donations from Indian tribes and was heavily fined. As a candidate for insurance commissioner, he accepted insurer contributions, then returned them when it became a campaign issue. It was not a proud day for Democrats when it became clear that he would be their nominee. His election would be a step backward for consumers.

Poizner is no Garamendi; with his market orientation, Poizner is open to permitting lower-premium health policies and other types of coverage with very high deductibles, along with other moves that may not prove popular with consumers. But he is dedicated to making sure insurers are competitive and, where the market falls short, he will be an effective consumer watchdog.

The Real Market For Fuel Efficiency (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

Detroit is talking up small cars again, but Americans haven't gotten any smaller since the 1970s.

You've heard the statistics: Nearly two-thirds of adults are overweight, and 31% are obese. In the late 1990s, the so-called Civilian American and European Surface Anthropometry Resource began cataloging body shapes and sizes, and auto makers discovered that a substantial chunk of the car-buying public couldn't fit its tummies behind the wheel while still reaching the pedals. They also found that demand for pickups and SUVs was partly related to taller cabs -- no bending over and scrunching down was required to get aboard. Some child safety seats now are designed to accommodate a 100-pound toddler.

To wit, growing vehicle size over the past two decades is a function of more than just the price of gasoline. Add the fact that commutes have been getting longer as Americans choose to live farther from town. They spend more time in their cars. And their cars also must hold more stuff: DVD players, airbags, and if Washington has it way, mandatory stability control by 2012.

The thing to notice about fuel economy is that it steadily improved relative to the growing weight of the average vehicle. People want fuel-efficient cars so they can afford to drive bigger cars and drive them more miles.

Therein lies the beginning of wisdom in understanding the market for fuel economy, which has recently thwacked Detroit across the nose with the near collapse of SUV and truck sales amid higher gas prices the past two years.

It should be delicately pointed out that Detroit as an industry has long put up with unusually close public and political attention and has developed PR habits that amount to a comprehensive smokescreen around its decision making and internal motives. Re-enacting this history amid the latest challenge is GM Vice Chairman Bob Lutz, a licensed "car guy," who was put forward to introduce a new fuel-cell prototype vehicle developed by GM. He also sang GM's praises for rolling out millions of cars that can run on E85, a gasoline-substitute consisting of 85% ethanol.

Uh huh. Fuel cells are destined to remain a negligible, if not nonexistent, part of the market over the relevant time horizon, which could easily witness GM's bankruptcy. As for E85, it's a regulatory hoax. Mr. Lutz, to the cognoscenti of the Detroit Free Press, gave a more likely explanation of the alternative fuels medicine show. "We need a moon shot to get out from the notion that Toyota is miraculous and GM is run by a bunch of aging stumblebums who wouldn't know technology if it hit 'em in the face."

DOJ_NMG_0074676

GM's management is in a fight for its life right now, trying to hold out against superinvestor Kirk Kerkorian's plan to force it into an alliance with Renault and Nissan. The stakes only get more urgent as GM begins to figure out how to deploy billions in cash flow liberated by its labor cuts to begin developing products competitive with the best of its foreign-born rivals.

It won't be with fuel cells and E85 that GM puts itself back into the game. Nor will it be with teensy eurocars. Mr. Lutz, in passing, noted that GM can now make money on small cars, having unloaded some of its fixed labor overhead by trimming UAW health benefits and paying thousands of workers to leave the company. He implies an undisclosed accounting judgment about how to allocate costs to various vehicle categories, but never mind: Ford and Chrysler still can't make money on small cars and are willing to admit as much.

Yet to equate small cars with fuel efficiency may be a serious mistake if that informs the industry's investment strategy. University of Michigan's Walter McManus, in a new paper, argues that the one vehicle attribute that Detroit can leverage most profitably in the coming years is continued progress on fuel efficiency. Or if you prefer, cost of ownership as impacted by fuel consumption. But this applies up and down their model line. GM earlier this year acknowledged as much when it offered to guarantee SUV buyers a year's worth of gas at $1.99 a gallon.

GM, with its structural labor cuts, has freed up capital to invest in new product, but how? The authors argue that at any gas price between $2.00 and $3.10 per gallon, GM (as well as Ford and Chrysler) can produce more profit by investing a buck in fuel efficiency than by any other approach. The technologies are already available -- better lubricants, lighter materials, variable valves, six-speed transmissions, mechanisms to shut down spark and fuel to unneeded cylinders.

Mr. McManus, a former GM staff economist, uses game theory and estimates of how consumers discount their future gas expenditures to produce a guesstimate ($578) of how much an additional mile-per-gallon of fuel efficiency is worth to the average car buyer. Whatever the merits of his conclusion, his method is refreshing because it recognizes that fuel efficiency is not a virtue independent of economics -- the chief selling proposition behind hybrids, which expect you to pay extra for the privilege of saving gas.

It also points to the decision that faces GM, now that survival is in sight, on how to use its capital to upgrade its auto lineup. Foreign alliances are not an answer to this quandary -- that idea is geared mainly to cost cutting, and over a longer period than GM should be worrying about right now. GM has already shown (see Cadillac) that it has the vehicle design savvy. Its cars have lagged for lack of investment and the company's low tolerance for financial risk taking -- exactly the problems GM has increasingly put itself in a position to solve.

Civic Priorities (WT)

By John M. Bridgeland And Peter Levine

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Five years after September 11, we can begin to assess whether tragedy also bred civic transformation. The National Conference on Citizenship, a non-profit created by Congress to strengthen our civic ties, recently released its new Civic Health Index, which charts our nation's civic progress over the last 30 years. While there are signs of civic recovery in areas of national focus, our civic health shows steep declines in most of 40 measures.

Youth volunteering is a bright spot. Over the past decade, young people age 16 to 24 have narrowed the gap with adults in volunteering. Levels of volunteering have been so high for youth compared to their Baby Boomer parents that some talk of a "9/11 Generation." By some measures, about half of today's youth volunteer, up 10-15 percentage points from the 1970s. Although we cannot be sure why youth volunteering has burgeoned, or whether resume-building played a role, we note growing efforts to combine classroom learning with community service, increases in national and international service opportunities, and calls to service issued from presidents.

But youth and adults alike are not participating in community projects or attending club meetings: the everyday, face-to-face settings of democracy. And those who still participate tend to be privileged. College graduates now dominate community life, while high-school dropouts are almost completely missing. Half of Americans who work on community projects and attend meetings are college graduates, while only 3 percent of these active citizens are high school dropouts. College graduates are more than four times as likely to volunteer and twice as likely to vote as their peers who never finish high school.

DOJ_NMG_0074677

Our political participation, while spiraling downward from 1975 to 1998, has risen lately in activities such as voting in federal elections, attending political meetings, and making political donations. During the 2004 presidential election, more than 122 million Americans voted — the highest turnout since 1968 and largest uptick since 1952. Nearly 4.3 million more 18-29-year-olds voted in 2004 than in 2000, a significant upsurge given steep declines in prior years.

While political activities are rising, trust in one another and in key institutions has steadily declined. As many Americans suspect, our politics are both more engaging and more divisive, drawing more people to the polls but making it more difficult to solve public problems.

Across the vast majority of our 40 indicators of civic health, we see declines in most — belonging to civic and religious groups, attending meetings, connecting to family and friends and staying informed on public affairs. Even in areas where there is progress, we still under-perform as a nation, with only 29 percent of the population volunteering and 58 percent of the population voting. Of 172 countries ranked for voter turnout in elections since 1945, the United States ranked 139th.

History tells us we can make civic gains. The Greatest Generation, born prior to 1930, ushered in robust civic health in the mid-part of the last century. During that time, there also was more equal opportunity, a smaller gap between rich and poor, and greater cooperation across party lines to address our nation's challenges.

So what's to be done? Schools need to foster civic learning and skills, teach the core ideas from American history, offer students opportunities for participation, and increase the numbers of students who graduate from high school with the skills for college and the experience of community service.

Community and national service programs, such as AmeriCorps, Peace Corps and the new Citizen Corps for homeland security, should enlist more Americans into full-time and part-time service. Workplaces should conduct civic audits to ensure their policies regularly enlist employees to serve in their communities. Houses of worship of different faiths should mobilize youth to serve in communities together, promoting both problem-solving and peace.

We must make congressional and other elections more competitive, by giving redistricting authority to neutral commissions and finding ways to increase citizen voices and decrease the influence of money.

These policy debates should occur with better data. The new Civic Health Index is a start in having good feedback measures with localized information. Given the challenges we now face, it is time to make civic health a greater national priority. For when that health is vibrant, opportunities for social mobility are higher, our communities and country are stronger, and our own lives are enriched.

John M. Bridgeland is CEO of Civic Enterprises and on the advisory board of the National Conference on Citizenship. Peter Levine is director of the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement at the University of Maryland. Both participated in the the National Conference on Citizenship's study, Broken Engagement: America's Civic Health Index.

Arabs Pressure Rice On U.S. Peace Efforts (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 3 -- The Bush administration's effort to foster a bloc of moderate Arab states to stand against growing militancy in the Middle East has come up against a brick wall, with several close U.S. allies bluntly telling Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday that they do not want to be pitted against other Arab governments and movements, according to senior Arab officials. The solution, the allies told Rice, lies with stronger U.S. leadership in solving the Arab-Israeli conflict.

During talks Tuesday in both Saudi Arabia and Egypt, Rice was confronted by friendly but firm pressure from eight Arab governments -- Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Oman and Bahrain -- to follow up on promises by President Bush to help achieve a two-state solution in the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians. They also questioned whether the administration still has the energy or full commitment to pull off a solution to the Palestinian issue before Bush leaves office, officials said.

Arab officials also expressed frustration that the United States seems far more focused on the issue of Iran's nuclear program. Although Arab states share concern about Iran's nuclear potential, Rice and her Arab interlocutors sometimes seemed to be talking at cross-purposes, according to Arab officials involved in the talks in Cairo. One senior Arab official described the talks as warm but unproductive.

DOJ_NMG_0074678

The new Arab pressure came on the same day as a global appeal by 135 former presidents, prime ministers and Nobel Peace Prize winners from the United States, Europe, Africa, the Middle East and Asia for a concerted international effort to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict. The U.S. signatories to the document, released by the Brussels-based International Crisis Group, included former president Jimmy Carter, ex-defense secretary Frank Carlucci, 9/11 Commission vice chairman Lee Hamilton and retired Gen. Wesley Clark.

After talks with Rice in Jiddah on Tuesday, the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, called on the Bush administration to "restart" the peace process, warning that the issue had become like a disease that weakened the body's ability to deal with all other diseases.

"There is a very short step from extremism to terrorism. And ever since the problem arose of Palestinian-Israeli conflict, the region has been destabilized. . . . Therefore we think it's a core problem [that], if settled, would have beneficiaries on all the other core problems of the region," Faisal told reporters at a joint news conference with Rice.

After afternoon meetings in Cairo, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said foreign ministers from the eight Arab countries told Rice of the urgent need to push the peace process forward "as envisioned by President Bush. . . . After all this suffering, we must achieve it," he said at a joint news conference.

Rice is scheduled to fly to Israel on Wednesday for talks with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Rice appealed to the Palestinians on Tuesday to immediately end internal fighting that has killed a dozen people recently and threatened to unravel the troubled Palestinian Authority.

"Innocent Palestinians are caught in this violence and in this crossfire, and we call on all parties to stop. . . . The Palestinian people deserve calm," she told reporters at the news conference with Faisal.

Rice also called on the Palestinians' ruling party, Hamas, to accept negotiations with Israel as the only route to a political solution that will ensure peace. Hamas, which won an upset in January parliamentary elections, continues to balk at any political arrangement that involves recognizing Israel's right to exist.

At the news conference with Aboul Gheit in Cairo, Rice said she was pleased to hear ideas from Arab allies about how the United States might further support Abbas. But Arab officials said they are increasingly concerned that, since the cutoff of tax revenue by Israel and aid by foreign governments since Hamas formed a government, an already serious humanitarian problem has deepened.

Arab foreign ministers also made clear to Rice that they do not want a group of Arab states that she assembled last month at the U.N. General Assembly to be considered a formal bloc, Arab officials said. The group, referred to as the "GCC plus two," comprises the six oil-rich sheikdoms in the Arabian Peninsula, plus Egypt and Jordan.

On Iran, Aboul Gheit said the Arabs listened to Rice but did not agree to any statement or action.

Rice warned Tuesday that after weeks of diplomatic delays and Iranian stalling, time has run out for talks. The issue, she added, is no longer just Iran, but the United Nations' ability to deal effectively with global crises. "I hope that there is still room to resolve this, but the international community is running out of time because soon its own credibility . . . will be a matter of question," Rice said.

Rice is tentatively planning to meet with her European counterparts, possibly in London, at the end of her Middle East tour this week to agree on sanctions to impose on Iran; Security Council action could follow as early as next week.

The United States has not formally specified which sanctions it supports, although they are widely reported to include a travel ban on Iranian officials involved in the nuclear energy program and a ban on the sale of any technology and hardware that could be used for production of deadly weapons. U.S. officials have said the first actions would be mild but would be followed by tougher measures if Iran failed to comply.

Rice, In Mideast, Meets Skeptics (LAT)

By Paul Richter

DOJ_NMG_0074679

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

CAIRO — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, touring the Middle East in an attempt to build support for U.S. goals and allies, found herself Tuesday on the defensive about the Bush administration's search for partnerships and its efforts for democratic reform.

Meeting in Cairo with ministers of eight moderate Arab regimes, Rice was questioned on whether her desire to work with the countries masked an American desire to line up allies against the growing power of Iran.

The Egyptian foreign minister and dubious local media asked whether President Bush's campaign of democratic reform was nothing short of meddling by a country that doesn't accept election results it doesn't like.

Bush dispatched Rice to the Middle East at a time when, in the wake of the war in Lebanon, European and Arab countries, among others, are clamoring again for progress in the ArabIsraeli dispute. But as Rice arrived in Cairo on the second day of a weeklong trip, it was apparent that many in the region feared the effort was a veiled attempt to build a new "coalition of the willing" to stand up to Iran, like that employed in the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

Administration officials have faced tough questions in the region for some time. Still, the tone Tuesday was another sign that Washington confronts a stiffer challenge rebuilding ties in the aftermath of the war in Lebanon, which many here contend the American government was unwilling to stop.

Rice, in a meeting with the local media, insisted that "this is not a meeting or a coalition against anyone."

Ahmed Aboul Gheit, the Egyptian foreign minister, made clear his government's view that although Cairo had been a key target of U.S. efforts for democratic reform, it was capable of advancing at its own speed.

Aboul Gheit challenged Rice to stay in Egypt a month to witness for herself the country's eagerness for development.

"Not everything is done in haste … and not everything is done in one day," he said. "But we will move … we will be there."

Rice was asked at the evening news conference about widespread reports that the United States was secretly supporting the choice of Gamal Mubarak to succeed his father, longtime President Hosni Mubarak.

She insisted that the United States was not involved in the decision.

"It is absolutely going to be up to the people who is going to be the president of Egypt," Rice said.

The secretary of State said the administration's goal in funding nongovernmental programs for building democratic institutions was "not to interfere in choices Egyptians make, but to help civil society develop the capability to give Egyptians choices."

"The United States is going to stand for certain values," she said.

"We always have and we always will — and it is not a matter of interference in Egypt's internal affairs. How Egypt conducts its internal affairs will, of course, be up to Egyptians."

Reporters questioned whether U.S. aid to nongovernmental organizations wasn't actually interference.

Rice was also asked whether the United States did, indeed, favor democratic outcomes, considering that it had worked to halt aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority government elected this year.

In response to another question, Rice made a slight change in the administration's vocabulary. She said she preferred "the future Middle East" to the phrase "the new Middle East," which has become controversial because it suggests U.S.-engineered change.

Bringing back an important word from Bush's 2000 election campaign, she said the United States intended to be "humble" in the way it encouraged countries to change.

During Rice's visit to Cairo and a stop Monday evening in Jidda, Saudi Arabia, it was clear that American allies in the region had greater ambitions for a renewed Israeli-Palestinian peace effort than the administration did.

U.S. officials have said that the most they hope for now is limited progress. Bush said last week that the United States did not intend to impose a settlement on the Palestinians and Israelis.

But Aboul Gheit and Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al Faisal made it clear that they wanted major steps to be taken swiftly to move the parties toward an eventual two-state solution.

"Ever since the problem arose of Palestinian-Israeli conflict, the region has been destabilized," Saud said.

DOJ_NMG_0074680

"Like a disease on the body, it calls for other diseases to attack that weakened body. And, therefore, we think it's a core problem."

Rice Calls For Hamas To Work With Abbas (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday the Hamas government cannot govern in the Palestinian territories and she urged the Islamic militants to moderate and cooperate with the secular president.

Rice also said the world's credibility is on the line in the nuclear standoff with Iran as U.N. diplomats declared last-ditch talks with Tehran a likely failure. She said the nations that could impose sanctions are unified, despite Russia's public misgivings Tuesday.

"The international community is running out of time because soon its own credibility in terms of enforcing its own resolutions will be a matter of question," Rice said midway through a Middle East tour.

Although she got a polite hearing from the United States' two most powerful friends in the Arab world, Rice also got a lecture. Saudi Arabia and Egypt both told Rice on Tuesday that the Middle East's many volatile conflicts are hinged to Israel's long conflict with the Palestinians.

Arab nations, including the few moderate states that are key to U.S. goals in Iraq, Iran and Lebanon, view improving the Palestinians' lot as essential. They argue that the festering grievances of the stateless Palestinians feed unrest and radicalism elsewhere.

"The issue is how to make peace, and in order to make peace you have to identify the problem," Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said during a sometimes strained news conference with Rice.

"We think and we claim and we keep telling everybody that it is the Palestinian problem, and the lack of a settlement for the Palestinians. The Palestinian problem is the scourge of this region," Gheit said.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal likened the nearly 60-year-old conflict to a disease that weakens the body and invites further infection.

"Whenever there is an answer to question in justice and the rights of people are not responded to, it's a breeding ground for extremism," Saud said with Rice by his side in Jedda, Saudi Arabia. "There is a very short step from extremism to terrorism. And ever since the problem arose of Palestinian-Israeli conflict, the region has been destabilized."

Rice is in the Middle East this week seeking ways to strengthen Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in his standoff with Hamas radicals who control part of the Palestinian government. Rice was to meet with Abbas on Wednesday.

Rice's talks in Ramallah will be the administration's third meeting in less than three weeks with Abbas, whom President Bush called a "man of courage" for trying to revive Mideast peace talks.

Rice wants Saudi Arabia and Egypt to put greater diplomatic muscle behind the secular Palestinian president in his standoff with Hamas militants, and to bolster moderate secular governments in Lebanon and Iraq.

Rice met in Cairo with diplomats from Egypt and seven other Arab allies in hopes of reviving the moribund Arab-Israeli peace process and making headway on other regional issues. During that session the ministers of the six-nation Gulf Cooperation Council and Egypt and Jordan gave broad support to Abbas, Rice said.

Her first appointment in Egypt was with the country's intelligence chief, seen as key to ongoing efforts to release an Israeli soldier captured in June by militants close to Hamas.

The top aide to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak last week demanded that Hamas release the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, immediately.

Egypt is a longtime mediator among Palestinian factions and between Israel and the Palestinians, and its exasperation with Hamas may signal a turning point.

Israel wants to reopen dialogue with Abbas and work with him to establish a Palestinian state. But Abbas has been in a weakened position since January when Hamas, which seeks the destruction of Israel, won the Palestinian elections.

DOJ_NMG_0074681

Abbas retains his position as president but is caught between Hamas and the West, which considers Hamas a terrorist group and refuses to underwrite it with vital international aid. Abbas has tried to persuade Hamas leaders to moderate their anti-Israel policies and join with his Fatah Party in a coalition government, but the U.S. and Israel are leery of the plan.

"Clearly, they cannot govern in a circumstance in which they cannot represent a responsible government before the international system," Rice said in Saudi Arabia. "I would hope that they would take up what I understand to have been many overtures" by Abbas.

The Bush administration and Israel are increasingly convinced Hamas eventually will crumble, and they look to Abbas to capitalize.

Blockade Of Gaza Could Be Eased By Rice Plans (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

International observers could be deployed at the main cargo crossing point between Israel and the Gaza Strip as part of expected proposals by Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, to loosen the economic siege of the Palestinian territory, diplomats said.

Ms Rice was due in Jerusalem on Wednesday for separate talks with an Israeli government politically weakened by the war in Lebanon, and with officials of a Palestinian administration that risks disintegrating in an upsurge of factional violence.

In the face of political stagnation on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian divide, US officials played down the prospect that she would bring any new initiative to restart the peace process. But western diplomats said she was expected to try to revive a moribund agreement on easing the movement of Palestinian goods and people. Ms Rice brokered the agreement last November, eventually overcoming Israeli objections in an extended round of frequently abrasive talks. But 11 months on, most elements of the deal have yet to be implemented.

In the intervening period, and particularly since Hamas won Palestinian elections in January, movement to and from the Gaza Strip has actually been more restricted than before Israel withdrew from the territory more than a year ago.

The Israeli authorities have frequently cited security concerns when ordering closure of crossing points, an argument that was reinforced by the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier on June 26 by Palestinian militants who tunnelled out from Gaza.

The negative impact of closures on Palestinian exports has exacerbated the economic decline brought on by Israeli and international financial measures against the Hamas government.

The only element of Ms Rice's November deal that was implemented was the deployment of unarmed European observers to monitor traffic at the Rafah crossing between Gaza and Egypt. Since the June kidnapping, however, Israel has forced the closure of Rafah for all but a few days.

Among the proposals Ms Rice was expected to bring with her this time was a plan to deploy international observers at the main Karni cargo crossing point between Gaza and Israel. It has also been closed for about a third of the time since the November agreement was an-nounced. Palestinian officials say the frequent closures of Karni cost Gazan farmers $400,000 a day during the 2005 harvest season. The measures have also hit Gaza's lucrative textile export trade.

Diplomats said that the US was unlikely to offer to supply its own forces and might appeal again to EU states that are already playing a central role in the expanded international presence in south Lebanon.

Foreign observers might also be deployed along the Egypt-Gaza border where Israeli officials say arms smuggling is out of control.

"After Lebanon, people are more interested in internationalising security in the region," said one diplomat.

There is growing concern in Arab capitals about the disintegrating social and political conditions in the Palestinian territories and the ammunition this is providing for extremists throughout the region. Egyptian officials argue that only when there is a more comprehensive framework for negotiations on substantive issues between the Israelis and Palestinians will it be possible to make progress on details.

Foreign ministers from eight US-allied Arab countries who met Ms Rice in Cairo on Tuesday had hoped to impress this on her but are themselves increasingly frustrated by the inflexibility of Hamas, with months of efforts by Cairo to negotiate the release of the kidnapped Israeli soldiers in return for the release of Palestinian prisoners so far achieving little. The meeting in Cairo appeared to break little new ground.

DOJ_NMG_0074682

"The Palestinians need a government that can represent the interests of the Palestinians and can engage with the international community in accordance with the broad consensus for a two-state solution," Ms Rice said in a press conference with Ahmed Aboul Gheit, Egypt's foreign minister.

Rice Urges 2 Palestinian Groups To Halt Violence (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 3 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Tuesday for an end to the new wave of bloodshed between Palestinian factions as she prepared to travel to the West Bank to support the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas.

"Innocent Palestinians are caught in this violence, and we call on all parties to stop," Ms. Rice said. "The Palestinian people deserve calm."

In fighting on Sunday and Monday, at least 10 Palestinians were killed and more than 100 were wounded in some of the worst fighting in recent years between Hamas and Fatah, the two main Palestinian factions.

Gunmen linked to Mr. Abbas's secular Fatah movement suggested Tuesday that there would be more violence and threatened to kill three senior leaders of Hamas, the militant Islamic group that won the Palestinian elections in January.

The gunmen, Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, accused Hamas leaders of "sedition" and said they would be killed so "these filthy people can be made an example."

Only scattered incidents of violence were reported Tuesday, and no casualties as of nightfall.

The week's violence appeared to complicate Secretary Rice's campaign this week to drum up support among Arab nations for Mr. Abbas in his struggle to form a unity government with Hamas that could be recognized by the United States.

The Bush administration has said that it would resume financial aid to the Palestinian Authority only if a Hamas-run government agreed to recognize the right of Israel to exist and to forswear violence.

Hamas rejects the conditions.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, called Tuesday for Arab nations not to support American policy in the Middle East, telling reporters in the Gaza Strip, "It looks like Ms. Rice is adopting the old law — divide and conquer."

Secretary Rice began her latest Middle East trip with a stop on Monday in Jidda, Saudi Arabia, to meet with King Abdullah, before traveling to Cairo for a gathering of Arab counterparts. She is to leave Wednesday to see Mr. Abbas on the West Bank and to meet in Israel with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

She has discussed an array of issues with Arab leaders, including the violence in Iraq and mounting concerns over Iran's refusal to curtail its nuclear program. But she suggested at a news conference in Jidda that the trip would be centered on efforts to end the political and financial turmoil in the Palestinian territories, in large part by pressing Hamas to moderate its views toward Israel and to renounce violence.

"Clearly, Hamas cannot govern in a circumstance in which they cannot represent a responsible government before the international system," Ms. Rice said, adding that she hoped the group's leaders "would take up what I understand to have been many overtures" by Mr. Abbas.

She described the Palestinian Authority president as a "man who is committed to the agreements that the Palestinians have signed over the last decade or so."

In Cairo, Ms. Rice's first appointment was with officials of the Egyptian intelligence services who have been involved in negotiations for release of an Israeli soldier who was captured in June by militants linked to Hamas. The Egyptian government has called for the soldier, Corp. Gilad Shalit, to be freed.

State Department officials traveling with Secretary Rice said she was looking for modest if concrete methods of easing financial pressures on Mr. Abbas's government, which found itself cut off from American and other Western aid after the Hamas victory in January.

DOJ_NMG_0074683

Secretary Rice said in Jidda that she hoped the Israelis would lift some travel restrictions now placed on Palestinians "because the economic situation in the territories is, of course, made very much worse if there is not the ability to move through some of the crossings."

Palestinian Rivals On Brink Of Civil War, Abbas Aide Says (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Armed Palestinian factions are just "centimeters" away from civil war, a top aide to President Mahmoud Abbas said yesterday after two days of deadly factional fighting.

The violence, the worst since the West Bank and Gaza Strip won autonomy 12 years ago, has raged as Mr. Abbas' Fatah party and the militant Hamas movement, which controls the Palestinian government, have struggled to agree on a unity government that can end a crippling international aid freeze.

"If we don't reach a political solution, we are headed toward a civil war," Nabil Amr, a communications adviser to Mr. Abbas, said in an interview. "It could happen at any time."

Each side blames the other for the fighting that has left 12 Palestinians dead and more than 100 wounded since Sunday. No new injuries were reported yesterday, but the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a Fatah militia, threatened to kill Hamas Interior Minister Saeed Seyam and Damascus-based Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting with Arab leaders in Cairo, appealed for an end to the fighting. "Innocent Palestinians are caught in the crossfire and we call on all parties to stop," she said. "The Palestinians deserve calm."

The violence has filled a vacuum left by government paralysis and the failure of the parties to agree on a government program that would meet international conditions for the restoration of aid -- recognition of Israel, a renunciation of violence and agreement to honor past agreements with Israel.

Mr. Amr said he opposed a unity government because of the differences between Hamas and Fatah over whether to recognize Israel and conduct peace talks. He proposed alternative solutions to the crisis, such as new elections or the formation of a Cabinet made up of political independents and technocrats.

"Yesterday a red line was crossed, but they retreated," Mr. Amr said of Monday's fighting. "I am afraid that without a political solution, more groups will cross the red line. Gaza isn't just chaos. It's a big storehouse of weapons. Each family has its own militia and its own organization."

Fatah leaders accused Mr. Seyam, the interior minister, of ordering Hamas gunmen to fire on a group of protesters in the Gaza community of Khan Younis. The Gaza clashes spread to the West Bank, where Hamas-controlled government offices were torched and the bodyguards of the deputy parliament speaker was fired upon.

Since Hamas took over the government after elections in January, gunmen from its military wing have sparred with Fatah security services. The atmosphere deteriorated further because of the economic boycott, which left the Palestinian Authority unable to pay the salaries of policemen and other public servants.

Sheik Yazeeb Khader, editor of the Hamas newspaper Mumbar el-Islah, said he and other editors had kept a low profile in recent days for fear of new clashes. As he crunched across the shards of glass that littered the floor of a Hamas political office in Ramallah, he claimed the windows had been smashed over the weekend by vandals acting with the approval of the Fatah-controlled security services.

Ultimately, he said, Mr. Abbas should be held responsible.

"This took place under the eyes of the security agencies," he said as he flipped through pictures taken by a Palestinian journalist showing a policeman standing alongside Fatah militants as they burned government buildings.

"The government didn't fail. The government was made to fail and the presidency participated" in the failure, he said.

Even so, Mr. Khader said, Hamas prefers a unity government with Fatah. But he insisted that Hamas would prevail over Fatah in any new election.

A recent poll by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Center showed a statistical dead heat between the parties. The same survey indicated that Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas was perceived as more trustworthy than Mr. Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0074684

The Ha'aretz newspaper reported yesterday that mediators from Qatar had suggested that the parties form a unity government that would be headed by an independent prime minister.

Hamas PM Vows To Prevent Civil War (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, October 4, 2006

Prime minister Ismail Haniya has vowed that his Hamas-led government would not let Palestinians slide into civil war following the deadliest bout of internecine fighting since he took office.

Ten Palestinians were killed and more than 100 wounded in two days of clashes between supporters of Haniya's ruling Islamist movement and the rival Fatah party, concentrated in the Gaza Strip and the flashpoint West Bank.

Compounding the tension, an armed group affiliated to Fatah threatened to kill Hamas leaders, blaming the hardline faction for violence unprecedented since the Islamists took power after a landslide election win in January.

"We are against internal clashes," Haniya told a cabinet meeting in Gaza City Tuesday. "We cannot allow a civil war to erupt, but this question is the responsibility of everyone."

The embattled premier was speaking just hours after a radical group linked to Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas's Fatah issued a vitriolic statement, threatening to kill leaders in his Hamas party.

The Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades pointed the finger at Hamas's powerful exiled political supremo in Damascus, Khaled Meshaal, Gaza-based interior minister Said Siam and chief of the group's paramilitary force in Gaza, Yussef al-Zahar.

"In this statement, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades declare loud and clear the decision of the people and the revolution to condemn to death the head of the discord Khaled Meshaal, as well as Said Siam and Yussef al-Zahar," it said.

"We will charge ourselves with executing this sentence so that these scoundrels serve as an example to all those who dare spill Palestinian blood."

Hamas reacted immediately, accusing Fatah of sowing discord and poisoning the atmosphere.

"We are speaking about a seditious current in the heart of Fatah that searches to sow discord and poison the atmosphere in order to realize personal aims," said MP Mushir al-Masri.

On Tuesday, some 100 security forces loyal to Fatah blocked the Gaza Strip's main highway with vehicles and burning tyres, but a paramilitary controlled by the Hamas government did not intervene.

The two days of violence erupted on Sunday, when the Hamas paramilitary force tried to stop the mainstream security forces from blocking roads in Gaza as part of their demonstrations against non-payment of salaries.

Hamas has been unable to pay any full public service salaries since taking power in March owing to an international aid boycott stemming from its refusal to recognise Israel, renounce violence and abide by past agreements.

In the northern village of Azzun, in the occupied West Bank, a car belonging to a Hamas member was set alight and gunmen opened fire on a house belonging to another official of the party.

Further north in Nablus, suspected Fatah loyalists burnt two buses operated for a Hamas-run school and opened fire on the car of a university lecturer close to the ruling party.

On the eve of a visit to Israel and the West Bank by US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Haniya lashed out at her regional tour.

"It is clear that Condoleezza Rice is resorting to the old policy of divide and rule," he told the cabinet.

"We urge all the brother Arab countries not to bow to the American plans and aspirations of the American administration to carve up the region," he added.

In Saudi Arabia, Rice called for "moderate forces" to be helped at the expense of "extremist forces", called for a halt to the Palestinian violence and for the creation of a unity government that would abide by Western demands.

Political talks between Fatah and Hamas on forming such a government have stalled over Hamas's hardline stance despite an initial agreement last month between Abbas and Haniya on a political platform.

The fighting brought a plea from the Arab League for an end to what an official called the "Palestinian madness."

DOJ_NMG_0074685

Mohammed Subeih, assistant secretary general for Palestinian affairs, said in Cairo: "Let us leave the killing, aggression and destruction to Israel, because that is enough for the Palestinian people."

He urged an end to the fighting, otherwise the Arab League would not be able to "speak to the world on behalf of the Palestinians."

Fatah Militia Threatens Hamas Leaders (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, October 4, 2006

Gunmen linked to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement threatened Tuesday to assassinate leaders of the rival Hamas group — heightening tensions from three days of fighting that has killed 10 Palestinians.

The violence, the worst since Hamas took office in March, heightened fears of a full-scale civil war. The fighting came after efforts broke down last week to bring Fatah into the government.

Abbas, who had hoped a broader and more moderate coalition would end an international boycott of the Hamas government, is running out of options to end the crisis created by the aid cutoff.

Abbas had considered calling early elections, but polls indicate Fatah would tie with Hamas. Also, a poll published Tuesday showed voters consider Abbas less trustworthy than Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas.

The U.S. and moderate Arab states were making a new push to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace talks. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the foreign minister of Bahrain, Shaikh Khalid Bin Ahmed Al-Khalifa, were to hold separate talks with Abbas on Wednesday.

The threat to kill Hamas leaders came in a statement by the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a violent Fatah offshoot. A caller reading from the statement told The Associated Press that Al Aqsa would try to assassinate Interior Minister Said Siyam, Hamas militia chief Youssef Zahar and the group's supreme leader in exile, Khaled Mashaal.

"We are going to implement the rule of the people and the revolution by executing the heads of this seditious group," the caller said. Al-Aqsa confirmed the authenticity of the statement when contacted by the AP.

The latest round of fighting began Sunday, when Hamas militiamen used beatings and gunfire to put down protests by civil servants and members of the security forces who demanded payment of salaries.

The confrontations triggered armed clashes over the weekend between the 3,500-strong Hamas militia and the Fatah-dominated security forces. In all, 10 people were killed and more than 100 wounded.

The violence also spread to the West Bank, where Fatah militants torched the Cabinet building in Ramallah and trashed Hamas offices.

On Monday, Fatah militants shot at bodyguards of Deputy Prime Minister Nasser Shaer of Hamas as they rode in a government car, injuring two of them. Shaer was not present during the attack. Hospital officials said a Fatah militant also was injured.

The Palestinian Authority's 165,000 government employees have largely gone unpaid for seven months because of the international aid freeze. Many of the civil servants have been on strike for the past month, though compliance in schools has been spotty, particularly in Gaza.

On Tuesday, Fatah gunmen closed several schools in central Gaza by force. The gunmen also blocked a major intersection, shouting "Down, down with Hamas!" burning tires and garbage and shooting in the air.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas government, called for a new effort to establish a national unity government with Fatah, but also condemned the civil servants' strike.

"I know there is suffering and there is a big problem," Hamad told Israel Radio, speaking in Hebrew. "When there is a strike you don't go to work but you don't cause problems and riots all the time. This is not acceptable to us."

Palestinian Poll Shows Fatah-Hamas Close (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074686

The Fatah movement of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas is tied with the Islamic militant Hamas in voter support, according to a poll published Tuesday, undercutting hopes by Palestinian moderates that Fatah could oust Hamas if new elections were held.

As one of several options, Abbas is considering calling early elections, both for president and parliament, but Tuesday's poll and other recent surveys indicate there is no guarantee voters would return Fatah to power.

Also, previous polls have understated support for Hamas. Before Hamas won a January parliamentary election by a wide margin, polls showed Fatah leading, and even exit polls on election day forecast a Fatah victory.

Abbas' party controlled Palestinian politics for four decades and was forced out in January amid growing anger over official corruption and mismanagement. Support for Hamas remains steady, even though many Palestinians have been plunged deeper into poverty because of an international aid boycott of the Hamas government.

The face-to-face poll among 1,200 Palestinians also indicated that Palestinians consider Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas more trustworthy than Abbas, by 19 percent to 14 percent.

The survey was conducted by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Center Sept. 19-22, before a new round of deadly internal violence erupted this weekend. At the time of the survey, Hamas and Fatah were negotiating the formation of a national unity government, but the talks have since broken down.

In the survey, 56 percent said a national unity government was the best way out of the current crisis. If an election were held today, Fatah would get 32 percent of the vote, compared with 30 percent for Hamas.

The poll has an error margin of 3 percentage points.

More than half said they oppose attacks on Israel and 47 percent said they support a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Reach Out To The Red Zone (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is in the Middle East this week, trying to bolster America's allies to confront an enemies list that includes Iran, Syria, Hezbollah, Hamas and the all-party anarchy in Iraq. My worry is that Rice is becoming a traveling version of Baghdad's Green Zone, talking about hopeful strategies that are disconnected from events on the ground.

The focus of Rice's trip is to talk with moderate Arab governments -- Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states -- about how to form a united front against Iranian-backed extremism. This mission of containing Iran has become increasingly urgent because of growing signs that Iran is resisting a diplomatic compromise over its nuclear program. In recent weeks, European diplomats have offered various formulas to finesse the West's demand that Iran suspend uranium enrichment as a precondition for talks, but so far the mullahs in Tehran haven't budged.

Talking to your allies is always a good idea, but consider the parties Rice isn't engaging on this trip: Syria, Hamas, Hezbollah and Iran -- the sources of the trouble. The idea of traveling to a Middle East in crisis and talking only to your friends is, I'm sorry to say, the equivalent of meeting Iraqi leaders in the protected Green Zone and imagining that you are thereby stopping the brutal killing out in the "Red Zone," which is the term U.S. officials in Baghdad have been using to refer to the real world.

U.S. officials talk hopefully about how the recent war in Lebanon "clarified the fissures" in the region and encouraged the moderate Arab states to finally take decisive action to curb Iran and its allies. They hope the squeeze on the Hamas government will embolden Palestinians to embrace the moderate leadership of President Mahmoud Abbas and resume negotiations with Israel. To which a cynic would respond: Are you kidding? This is the Middle East.

The lesson for Rice should have been clear after the war in Lebanon: Left to themselves, our moderate Arab allies will make the deals that are necessary for their survival. They will quietly cheer for America in Iraq and Israel against Hezbollah -- until it's clear that the extremists are winning. Then, for self-protection, they will lean in the other direction. I'm told that Sunni women from Bedouin tribes in Jordan were carrying amulets of the Shiite militia leader Hasan Nasrallah at a wedding in Amman last week. That's a small sign of which way the wind is blowing.

DOJ_NMG_0074687

America needs to break out of its diplomatic Green Zone, or it will become a prisoner of events beyond its control. What's needed is aggressive, innovative policy that, to use a favorite Israeli term, "creates new facts on the ground." To me, that means a process of engagement -- especially now, when the mullahs in Tehran and their allies in Damascus and Beirut seem so afraid of it.

We should send an ambassador back to Damascus, tomorrow. We should encourage the widest possible contacts with Iran, leading to an eventual resumption of diplomatic ties. We should treat reconstruction of postwar Lebanon with the urgency we should have applied to postwar Iraq. We should deepen our contacts with a Lebanese government that includes two Hezbollah ministers. We should designate a special presidential envoy for the Middle East -- the obvious choices would be former secretary of state James A. Baker III or former president Bill Clinton.

Absent more aggressive action, the situation will keep slipping away from the United States, day by day. Iraq shows the price of the Green Zone mentality. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki says all the right things about a "government of national unity," but every night dozens more bodies are dumped in the streets. Tragically, Maliki can't connect his upbeat unity talk with reality. A good example of the disconnect is the fundamental economic issue of oil: Maliki's central government has been stalled working out the details for sharing Iraq's potentially massive oil revenue. Meanwhile, the regional government in Kurdistan is about to sign new oil drilling agreements with three companies, including one in the United States, with more deals pending. The Kurds' argument is simple: The Green Zone government is a fiction. It's time to move on our own.

To escape a traveling Green Zone mentality in the Middle East, Rice needs to create a process for engaging America's friends and adversaries. This is not a time for holding back, for testing the waters, for "staying the course" of current diplomacy. If we keep doing what we have been doing, we will keep getting what we've got -- which is a mess.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues at www.washingtonpost.com. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

US And UK Warn Of Fresh Iran Sanctions Drive (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

Renewed tensions over Iran's nuclear programme emerged on Tuesday as the US and Britain warned that world powers would return to the United Nations Security Council to consider targeted sanctions against Tehran.

Speaking in Cairo after meeting foreign ministers from eight Arab states, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said she feared Iran's latest proposals on enriching uranium abroad were a stalling technique.

"I hope there is still room to resolve this," she said, "but the international community is running out of time, because soon its credibility will be in question."

A senior British official said preparations for a new UN resolution had intensified after Iran informed Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, that it would not abide by UN demands for a suspension of uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of the nuclear programme. But talks at the UN are likely to be difficult, given the reluctance of Russia and China to take a confrontational approach.

To maintain an international consensus, the British official said the strategy at the UN would be incremental, with the first sanctions targeting Iran's procurement of materials for the country's nuclear and ballistic missiles programmes – a measure limited in scope.

The Security Council had set an August 31 deadline for Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment or face sanctions.

The five permanent council members plus Germany had also offered Iran a set of economic and political incentives if it agreed to the suspension.

Mr Solana had been holding talks with Ali Larijani, Iran's top security official, on a temporary suspension that would pave the way for formal negotiations on the six-nation package. These meetings had lowered tensions and helped ease pressure on oil markets.

But Mr Solana told world powers at the weekend Iran was not prepared to suspend uranium enrichment, according to the British official.

DOJ_NMG_0074688

On Tuesday, after speaking to Mr Larijani, Mr Solana referred to his discussion as constructive but without yielding a breakthrough.

Attempts to talk Iran into a uranium suspension will not be broken off. Igor Ivanov, secretary of the Russian president's security council, held meetings in Tehran on Tuesday. But the US and European powers will now put more emphasis into UN action.

Ms Rice said failing to win Iranian agreement on suspension left the international community with sanctions as the only choice.

Iran's regime appears confident it can weather the impact of sanctions and often hints it can retaliate against the west.

U.S. May Back Iran On Nuke Alliance (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

CAIRO -- The United States is willing to consider setting up an international consortium to help Iran's nuclear program, but Tehran must suspend enriching uranium before any discussions can take place, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday.

Miss Rice expressed skepticism about a new Iranian idea about French investment in its nuclear activities, saying it may be a stalling tactic to delay possible U.N. sanctions, which Washington is prepared to push for as early as next week.

"There is a consortium idea that the United States supports, which is the joint venture that Russia has proposed," she said, adding that there cannot be enrichment and reprocessing activity on Iranian soil.

"The issue here is that Iran should not be in a position to acquire the technical expertise to enrich and reprocess, which is the most important step to knowing how to develop a nuclear weapon," the secretary told reporters during a visit to Egypt.

The idea Iran floated yesterday would allow it to enrich uranium in its territory. Tehran faces sanctions if it does not agree to suspend such activity by the end of the week.

"To be able to arrive at a solution, we have just had an idea. We propose that France create a consortium for the production in Iran of enriched uranium," Mohammad Saeedi, deputy chief of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, told France Info radio.

"That way France, through the companies Eurodif and Areva, could control in a tangible way our enrichment activities," he said, referring to a branch of a French state-controlled nuclear manufacturer created in part with Iranian backing in the 1970s.

Miss Rice, who is trying to build an anti-Iran coalition in the Middle East, raised the nuclear issue with foreign ministers of Egypt, Jordan and six Persian Gulf countries last night. Diplomats said the Arab participants in the meeting chose only to listen to her and say nothing.

"If the Iranians have ideas about how to come to [an] agreement about what they may be able to do in a civil nuclear program, the way to propose this is to suspend enrichment and reprocessing ... and then to come to the table with their ideas," the secretary said.

"But I fear that this may instead ... be a stalling technique because [they] don't want to get to the basic issue, which is that Iran has to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing in order to begin negotiations," she said.

French officials were skeptical about Tehran's consortium proposal. Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei said in Paris that he was surprised by the idea, which he called "totally new for us."

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said the idea of a consortium has long been discussed in his talks with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani.

"It's an interesting thing, but it's difficult to put it in place," Mr. Solana said during a meeting of EU defense ministers in Finland.

R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, told The Washington Times on Monday that the Bush administration is confident that Russia and China will join it in pushing for sanctions against Iran if it does not agree to suspend enriching uranium this week.

DOJ_NMG_0074689

"For four months now, we've been waiting for an answer," Mr. Burns said. "We've said, if they don't suspend enrichment, we'll take them to the Security Council and sanction them. We do believe we have Russian and Chinese support for that."

Iran's Proposal To End Nuclear Standoff Is Rejected By The West (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 3 — Iran has proposed that France organize and monitor the production of enriched uranium inside Iran, complicating negotiations over the fate of its nuclear program.

The United States, France and Britain rejected the proposal on Tuesday, saying it was a stalling tactic and fell far short of the United Nations Security Council's demand that Iran freeze all uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

The proposal, made by Mohammad Saeidi, the deputy director of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, was presented as a sign of flexibility in negotiations between Iran and six world powers represented by the European Union.

"In order to reach a solution, we've just had an idea: we propose that France create a consortium for the production in Iran of enriched uranium," Mr. Saeidi said in an interview in Tehran with France Info radio that was broadcast Tuesday.

A senior French official on Tuesday said: "This is totally excluded. There is nothing substantive behind it. This is not the first time the Iranians have tried to divide the international community."

Another senior European official — who, like the first, spoke on condition of anonymity under diplomatic rules — said that proposal "seemed to have the intention of distracting."

The United States, meanwhile, is giving Iran until the end of the week to declare whether it will agree to fully stop making enriched uranium or face sanctions. Enriched uranium can be used to make energy or to fuel weapons, and Washington has consistently taken the position that any uranium enrichment on Iranian soil is out of the question because it could give Iran the ability to master the nuclear fuel cycle.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the foreign ministers of the other five governments involved in the negotiations with Iran — Britain, France, Russia, China and Germany — have discussed the possibility of meeting in London on Friday to plot a strategy for the next steps, officials said.

While at a meeting of Arab foreign ministers in Cairo on Tuesday, Ms. Rice told reporters that there was nothing new in the Iranian proposal, and that it continued to fall far short of international demands.

"The Iranians have floated it before," she said, suggesting that the United States would reject any proposal that allowed Iran to enrich and reprocess uranium on its own soil. "This may be a stalling technique."

The Iranian proposal, which has been rejected by Iran's negotiating partners in the past, comes as Iran has hardened its position in negotiations between Ali Larijani, its chief nuclear negotiator, and Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief.

Mr. Solana reported to the six governments in recent days that Mr. Larijani rejected the calls to halt key nuclear activities even though Iran could face sanctions by the Security Council, three senior European officials said.

Instead, in meetings in Berlin with Mr. Solana last week, Mr. Larijani floated the idea of the creation of an international consortium to administer Iran's production of enriched uranium. He did not mention France as the central player, the officials said.

In what was widely perceived as a stalling tactic, Mr. Larijani also spent much of his time in recent conversations with Mr. Solana, airing Iran's historical grievances against the rest of the world.

Specifically, Mr. Larijani told Mr. Solana that Iran's current enrichment activities would have to continue, and that Iran would consider only a temporary halt to the expansion of its uranium enrichment program, the officials added.

The six powers, through Mr. Solana, had been trying to persuade the Iranians to accept a three-month halt on all uranium enrichment activities at their vast plant at Natanz and on construction at the plutonium plant at Arak, the European officials said. Uranium conversion, an earlier stage of processing, would have been allowed to continue at the Isfahan plant.

These officials also spoke on condition of anonymity under normal rules of diplomacy.

DOJ_NMG_0074690

There is also increasing frustration among European governments with Mr. Solana for presenting the results of his talks in too positive a light, several European officials said.

Mr. Solana has acknowledged the lack of progress on substantive issues, telling reporters in Finland on Monday, “The fundamental matter of suspension has not been agreed.” But he has repeatedly pointed to “progress” on peripheral issues, like where and when further negotiations with the six governments would take place.

On Tuesday, Mr. Solana appeared to keep the door open to Iran’s new proposal, describing it as “interesting,” and adding, “This is something we have to analyze in greater detail.”

In the radio interview, Mr. Saeidi proposed that Iran’s uranium enrichment activities would be monitored “in a tangible way” by Eurodif, a multinational enrichment consortium based in France, and by Areva, the France-based nuclear energy giant and majority shareholder in Eurodif.

Eighty-seven percent of Areva is held by French governmental institutions, and the company has vast interests in the United States ($1.8 billion in earnings in America in 2005) that it may not want to jeopardize by seeming to negotiate with Iran.

Can Rice Rally Mideast Against Iran? (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, October 4, 2006

CAIRO

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is in the Middle East this week seeking to build a network of support for what she calls "emerging moderate forces" (i.e. Iraq, the Palestinian Fatah Party, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt) against "extremist" ones that are opposed to US interests.

The No. 1 extremist Ms. Rice intends to to counter, say analysts, is Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. This trip comes at a time when an oil-flush, potentially nuclear Iran has growing clout in the region, particularly among armed Shiite groups in Lebanon and Iraq.

Ms. Rice is seeking to tap a deep, historical concern among Sunni Arab countries wary of Shiite Iran, with the aim of building a counterweight to Iran's influence.

"The US sees Iran now as the source of destabilization in the Middle East and because there are fears among the Arab countries that Iran also possess a threat this gives the US a chance to form a coalition against Iran and against all its allies, like Syria, like Hizbullah, like Hamas," says Hassan Nafai, chair of the political science department at Cairo University.

Rice's public statements so far have given more time to shoring up the secular Lebanese and Palestinian leaders, ending Iraq's insurgency, and disarming Hizbullah in Lebanon than to Iran. But the confrontation with the Shiite state seems to be at the top of the agenda, and in many ways sits at the center of America's concerns in the region.

Hizbullah is seen by the US as an Iranian proxy that could harass Israel if the nuclear dispute with Iran moves to open conflict; disorder in Iraq is seen as serving Iranian interests by tying up US forces and creating the possibility that the country's Shiites could rise up against US forces in support of their coreligionists; and Hamas, too, is seen by America as a threat to speed attacks against Israel in the event of war.

But Washington's conviction that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons (Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes only) trumps all other concerns.

Rice said in Saudi Arabia Tuesday that Germany and the five permanent members of the UN Security Council would meet soon on Iran, and indicated the US will press for sanctions if Iran doesn't suspend its uranium-enrichment program. Enriched uranium can be used for either nuclear power plants or bombs.

Rice is meeting foreign officials from eight Sunni Arab nations on the trip, before meeting with Israeli and Palestinian officials later in the week, who all fear the implications of an Iranian nuclear bomb but are also worried about the consequences of an armed confrontation over the issue, since it is likely to inflame popular public sentiments against their own regimes.

Tuesday, Rice flew from Saudi Arabia to Egypt, where she met privately with Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman, who has been working on reconciling Palestine's warring factions.

DOJ_NMG_0074691

"Expectations have to be kind of low on this trip. There are not going to be any major policy breakthroughs, either on the peace process or on Iran," says Josh Stacher, a lecturer at the British University in Cairo. "For Rice this is mostly a bit of a listening trip, finding out what allies want in the lead-up to building a coalition to go after Iran, be that sanctions, or military strikes, or further diplomacy."

Mr. Stacher says that while all eight of the Arab governments are eager to limit the possibilities Iran could go nuclear - particularly Saudi Arabia, which has feared Shiite expansionism since Iran's Islamic revolution - they will be urging the US against military action because of potential blow-back against their own regimes, none of which are democratic and six of which are monarchies.

Mr. Nafai agrees, and says that while the US might get fairly tepid support for sanctions against Iran, he doesn't see an eventual Arab coalition backing military action, largely because of the unresolved conflict over the Palestinian territories. "As long as the US continues to support unconditionally Israel's policies in the region and is not trying to seriously help find a settlement it will be almost impossible to form a strong coalition."

The recent confrontation between the Shiite Hizbullah and Israel boosted the regional popularity of Mr. Ahmadinejad, who supports Hizbullah, and hurt the standings of regimes like Egypt and Saudi Arabia because they were seen by their people as insufficiently condemning Israel's strikes inside Lebanon.

Rice has also adopted a new rhetorical approach on this trip, in which America's allies in the region are cast as moderates, and its enemies as extremists, something she said was demonstrated by the war in Lebanon.

"When Lebanon happened ... [we] got in very stark relief a clear indication that there are extremist forces and moderate forces" in the region, she told reporters. "The countries that we are meeting ... is a group that you would expect to support the emerging moderate forces in Lebanon, in Iraq, and in the Palestinian territories."

"The President isn't going to stop pressing for democracy because he believes that ultimately it's the force that will stabilize the Middle East most," Rice said. "But it does not mean that even if states ... are not yet transformed to democracy that we're not going to have relations with them and that we're not going to work together to resist extremist forces in the region."

Stacher says her comments at the start of her trip make the current administration policy on the region look similar to those of past administrations, when the stability and support of allies was more important than promoting change. "The Bush administration has redesigned policy toward the region. Nondemocratic states that are friendly are being painted as moderates and unfriendly undemocratic states are being branded as extremists. The rhetoric is about to reflect reality"

None of the Arab countries Rice is talking to on this trip - Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, and Oman - are democracies, and most severely limit free speech and political organization.

For many Arabs, says Nafai, ongoing US support for these "despotic" regimes means the promises of President Bush to promote democracy aren't believed, and residents of these countries end up more inclined to support US enemies.

Diplomats: Iran Nuke Stance Hurts Talks (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, October 3, 2006

Iran's refusal to freeze uranium enrichment has sabotaged talks meant to defuse the standoff over its nuclear program, opening the way for the U.N. Security Council to start considering sanctions next week, senior U.N. diplomats said Tuesday.

The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity, citing agreement not to publicly pronounce the talks dead before a final attempt by European Union envoy Javier Solana and Ali Larijani, Tehran's chief nuclear negotiator, to bridge differences in a phone call scheduled for Wednesday.

But with both sides standing firm, "the talks are considered a failure," even in key European capitals that had favored negotiations over U.N. sanctions, said one of the diplomats, adding the Larijani-Solana phone call could focus on nothing more than how to publicly acknowledge that the discussions had failed.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, told The Associated Press: "It's only a very short time before we'll be seeking sanctions," unless Iran complies with international demands to suspend enrichment. And, he added, "there is not a single sign that they're prepared to give up" the activity, which can be used to make fissile material to arm nuclear warheads.

DOJ_NMG_0074692

Beginning Sept. 9, the EU-Iran talks had been billed as a final attempt to head off a confrontation between Tehran and the Security Council, after Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend enrichment or face punishment. Two diplomats familiar with several rounds of negotiations between EU envoy and Larijani told the AP that the prospect of an up to three-month enrichment freeze was floated, and both men until recently spoke of progress in resolving the impasse.

But on Tuesday, another diplomat said Larijani — considered a moderate — told Solana he had been unable to sell the concept of even a limited enrichment freeze to the more hard-line leadership in Tehran. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had said as much during the weekend, telling professors at Tehran University that Iran would not suspend enrichment for a single day.

Wednesday's planned Larijani-Solana phone call is to be followed by a meeting Friday in London by the foreign ministers of the five Security Council nations and Germany or their senior representatives.

Those countries spearheaded the latest effort to persuade Tehran to renounce enrichment by offering it a package of economic and political rewards if it cooperated — and dangling the prospect of punitive action by the Security Council if it did not.

Then, the Security Council could meet as early as Monday to start work on a resolution imposing the first of a series of sanctions meant to make Iran turn course. One of the diplomats said Western council members — the United States, Britain and France — favor an embargo on sales of nuclear or missile technology to Tehran as a first step, to be followed by others, including travel bans on Iranian officials and the freezing of their assets.

While relatively mild, such punishments are meant to maintain council unity in the face of opposition to any sanctions from Russia and China, the other two permanent Security Council members.

The diplomats offered conflicting opinions on how Russia would respond, but both agreed China remained skeptical about using such punishment to rein in Iran.

Moscow and Beijing are Tehran's economic partners and have been traditionally opposed to sanctions, fearing they could ultimately lead to the council's most potent weapon — the threat of military action.

In refusing to give up enrichment, the oil-rich nation says it has a right to nuclear technology as an alternate means of generating power. But Bolton on Tuesday dismissed that argument.

"They've been throwing sand into the eyes of the people concerned about their weapons program for three years now" — he said, alluding to the more than three-year investigation by the International Atomic Energy Agency into suspicious nuclear activities. While the agency says it has found no direct proof that Iran has a secret weapons program, its worrying findings — including revelations of secret plutonium experiments by Tehran and its possession of a diagram showing how to mold weapons-grade uranium into the shape of nuclear warheads, has increased suspicions.

In an attempt to ease the pressure, a top Iranian official on Tuesday revived a proposal of foreign oversight on its enrichment activities. Mohammad Saeedi, deputy chief of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, suggested that France create a consortium to enrich uranium in Iran.

Georges Le Guelte, a nuclear expert at France's Institute for International and Strategic Research, called Saeedi's announcement "a diversion tactic."

He said the international community was unlikely to agree to such a deal because the enrichment would take place in Iran.

"This is something that would be almost as dangerous as leaving the Iranians to do it alone," he said.

People Hold Promise For Peace (USAT)

By Shirin Ebadi

USA Today, October 4, 2006

While the current standoff between the United States and Iran over that country's uranium enrichment program is often portrayed as a clash of cultures — the West against Islam — the truth is much more complex. That depiction mistakes politics for culture, rhetoric for reality.

A more accurate picture requires looking at the relations between the two countries through different lenses: one, the political relations between the two governments; the second, the more personal attitudes of the people toward each other. The former, with the threats of sanctions and even war, receives the most attention; the latter could hold the most promise for a possible resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0074693

There was a time when relations between the United States and the Iranian government were mutually beneficial. That honeymoon period began in 1953 when Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, the shah of Iran, was in power. A good friend of the United States, the shah purchased U.S. weapons and signed important oil contracts with American companies. He also became a close ally of Israel in the Middle East.

But in 1979, the shah was overthrown and the Islamic Revolution marked the beginning of a new chapter of political relations. Later that year, hostages were taken at the U.S Embassy in Tehran, an event that led to the complete rupture of political relations between the two countries and to U.S.-imposed economic sanctions against Iran that continue to this day.

Relations between the American and Iranian people today are markedly different from their governments'. Hundreds of thousands of Iranians live in the USA. These people are decent U.S. citizens; most of them are educated, and many have prosperous businesses. Many young Iranians wish to visit or emigrate to the USA, seeking out its first-rate universities, its social, civic and creative freedoms as well as its economic opportunities. The people of America have always been welcoming to Iranian immigrants. American visitors to Iran, in turn, are warmly welcomed by the Iranian people.

This is not true, however, across all of the Middle East. That is because the United States has protected and defended the actions of the rulers of non-democratic, Islamic governments in the Middle East and has forgotten the people who must live under those regimes. As a result, many people of the Middle East distrust the U.S. government, for there is a proverb that says, "My enemy's friend is my enemy as well."

In Iran, however, the feelings of the people for America are the opposite because the U.S. government has never supported nor defended the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran. Therefore, its people are not sensitive to the rhetoric of the U.S. government.

Many Iranians clearly understand that the cultures and people of the two countries are separate and distinct from their respective governments. This is the reason that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is more popular among the young Arabs than among the young Iranians.

The U.S. government must realize that the positive feelings of the Iranian people will continue only if it does not initiate a military attack against Iran. The Iranian people are exceedingly proud of their 2,500-year history and culture. Iran as a country is larger and greater than its rulers and exists apart from any government in power at any particular time.

If America attacks, however, Iranians will unite, forgetting their differences with their government, and they will fiercely and tenaciously defend their country.

That is why misguided commentaries from even supposed experts such as Princeton Middle East scholar and author Bernard Lewis are irresponsible. Lewis recently wrote that an atomic Iran would most probably use atomic weapons against Israel and America. Lewis even outrageously predicted that Aug. 22, a date that corresponded on the Islamic calendar with the date in which Muslims commemorate the night of prophet Mohammed's prophetic mission — could be a possible time for an Iranian attack on Israel.

The government of the United States must listen to those who are more enlightened with regard to Iran's issues and the complexity of U.S.-Iran relations. It is only then that it can reach informed, realistic and sustainable decisions regarding its differences with Iran.

The differences between the governments of Iran and the United States must end one day, and the sooner this takes place, the better.

The American government must accept the fact that Iran is the most important country in the Middle East because of its strategic location, population, wealth, natural resources, army and scientific achievements. It cannot be talked down to or treated as if it's a powerless Third World country.

And the Iranian government must also accept the fact that after the downfall of the Soviet Union, the United States is the one and only superpower — a reality that should preclude pejorative political remarks. Only through recognition of these facts can a solution for resolving the conflicts be reached.

DOJ_NMG_0074694

The conflict must be resolved through direct negotiations. Negotiations must be explicit, overt and to the benefit of the people, not to the governments, of these two countries. These negotiations must be engaged at three levels in both countries: the executive, the legislative and among their respective citizens through non-governmental organizations.

With a realistic viewpoint, any difference can be resolved. Let us gaze into the future instead of dwelling on the past.

Shirin Ebadi, a lawyer in Iran, won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2003 for her efforts on behalf of human rights and for democracy, which she continues today. She also is author of the book Iran Awakening: A Memoir of Revolution and Hope.

The Six-Million Person Question (WSJ)

By Mark Bowden

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

"As to the Holocaust, I just raised a few questions. And I didn't receive any answers to my questions."

-- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, interviewed in Time magazine in September 2006.

When Mr. Ahmadinejad visited the U.S. last month, he backed off slightly from his earlier position that the Holocaust was a myth. The systematic extermination of six million Jews by Nazi Germany in the 1930s and 1940s, an atrocious historical fact that is as thoroughly documented as a fact can be, remains a living memory for thousands of survivors. My guess is that someone in Mr. Ahmadinejad's circle has pointed this out to him since he publicly doubted it last December.

The president of Iran is a man for whom facts are mere fodder for political purposes, but there is little political advantage in making a fool of yourself on a world stage. So he has now retreated to the last refuge of all intellectual scoundrels, calling for "more research." And he has adopted a slightly different critical tack, which he repeated in numerous forums during his recent trip to New York. In Time it went like this: "I said that during World War II, around 60 million were killed. All were human beings and had their own dignities. Why only six million?"

Here, if I understand it correctly, he is asking: Why, in a war where 60 million were killed, has the West made such a big deal out of the deaths of six million Jews? Were the other deaths not equally terrible? Was the world not equally impoverished by each of these losses?

This seems a fair question, and I can think of a good answer. I'm sure others can think of even better ones than mine. But since Mr. Ahmadinejad has complained about not receiving any, for what it's worth, I'm happy to offer this one:

It is a tricky business, rating the moral depredations of the human species, because just when you have settled on the worst, somebody somewhere achieves a new low. In the 20th century alone, communism and its variants in the Soviet Union, China and Cambodia have been responsible for the slow and rapid execution of millions. Millions more perished in the saturation bombing campaigns and the atom bomb blasts of World War II. Conflict and murderously misguided idealism were big players in the atrocity game, and accounted for the deaths of many times more innocents than Adolf Hitler and his Final Solution.

The Holocaust haunts us more than these others for a good reason. The Final Solution was the deliberate act of a government to exterminate a portion of its own people. It employed the resources of the state -- its policy makers, planners, intellectuals, legal system, police and military, industry, transportation system and to a large extent its people -- to single out a particular group of citizens, systematically demonize and isolate them, and then count them, label them, strip them of everything, round them up, ship them to concentration camps, kill them and incinerate them. It attempted to squeeze some last value out of the most fit among those doomed, by employing them as slave labor or subjecting them to medical experimentation before killing them, and even then looked for ways to make saleable products out of their remains.

This horror began in peacetime, so the nation was not lashing out in self-defense, nor was it being threatened in any concrete way. In the early 1930s, when the state-driven process of isolating and demonizing Jews began, Germany had rebuilt itself after its defeat in World War I, and was the most powerful nation on the European continent. Indeed, it would soon sweep across its borders and conquer every country within its reach. Its science, medical and technological prowess were the envy of the world.

The Holocaust disturbs us so deeply because it demonstrates that none of the things we associate with the advancement of civilization -- peace, prosperity, industrialization, education, technological achievement -- free us from the dark side of the human soul. Just as there is evil in the heart of every man, there is evil at the heart of even the most "civilized" human society. It is a humbling recognition. Man and society are both capable of the most appallingly depraved behavior. Only in the case of society, it occurs on an industrial scale.

DOJ_NMG_0074695

The lives lost in the firebombing of Dresden or the nuclear flash over Hiroshima are no less significant, and the military choices that brought about those deaths remain profoundly disturbing, but they at least took place in the context of war. Whole societies were caught up in a life-or-death struggle.

What the Holocaust demonstrates is the danger of a one-party state. It shows what can happen when a group of true believers, convinced of the superiority of their own ideas, have unchecked power. They are then free to rewrite history to suit their political ends, and crush those who disagree or protest . . . or who worship God in a different way.

Like, say, the mullahs in Iran.

Mr. Bowden, a national correspondent for the Atlantic Monthly, is the author of "Guests of the Ayatollah" (Atlantic Monthly Press, 2006).

Rice: Nuclear Test A 'Provocative Act' (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday a North Korean nuclear test would be "a very provocative act," and she prodded Asian nations to rethink their relationships with the North Koreans.

The top U.S. diplomat said the United States would have to assess its options should such a test be carried out, but she did not elaborate.

"It would be a very provocative act by the North Koreans," Rice said during a press conference in Cairo, second stop on a Middle East tour. "They have not yet done it, but it would be a very provocative act."

Rice's warning reflected widespread concern within the Bush administration. She stressed, however, that a North Korean test was an issue "for the entire neighborhood" and not just for the United States.

"A North Korean nuclear test ... would create a qualitatively different situation on the Korean peninsula," Rice said. "I think that you would see that a number of states in the region would need to reassess where they are now with North Korea."

The remarks appeared directed primarily at China and South Korea.

White House spokesman Dana Perino complained about North Korea's "provocative announcement" and said other countries should join in pressing Pyongyang to avoid testing.

A test "would be directly contrary to the interests of all of North Korea's neighbors and to peace and security in the Asia-Pacific region," Perino said in a written statement.

The United States has long urged China, Pyongyang's only ally, to exert more pressure on North Korea to return to stalled diplomatic talks.

South Korea, divided from its northern neighbor for more than 50 years, has sought better relations and eventual reunification. Seoul is a key U.S. ally but often tries to smooth over rhetorical and other disputes between Washington and Pyongyang.

Pyongyang has said it has nuclear weapons, but it has not conducted any test known to outsiders to prove its claim. South Korea's spy agency has said the North could test a nuclear bomb at any time.

North Korea announced Tuesday that it would conduct a nuclear test in the face of what it claimed was "the U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war." The statement from Pyongyang gave no precise date when a test might occur.

The North regularly uses the United States as a foil, and has used similar language in the past. The latest threat may carry more weight, however, because it follows the test-firing of seven missiles in July, including one believed to be capable of reaching the United States.

Although the long-range missile failed during flight, tests of both a nuclear device and a missile theoretically able to deliver it to U.S. shores would give the North considerable bargaining power.

DOJ_NMG_0074696

The U.S. and its allies have been trying to lure the North back to stalled international efforts to persuade Pyongyang to scrap its nuclear weapons program.

The North has pushed for direct talks with the United States, something Washington says it will not do outside the framework of the stalled six-nation talks. The North has refused to return to the disarmament talks because of U.S. financial restrictions imposed for its alleged illegal activity, including money laundering and counterfeiting.

Many experts believe the North has enough radioactive material to build at least a half-dozen or more nuclear weapons.

"They are an active proliferator," said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "And were they to test and were they then to proliferate those technologies we'd be living with a proliferator and obviously we'd be living in a somewhat different world."

Rumsfeld, in Managua, Nicaragua, for meetings with Central and South American foreign ministers, declined to say whether Pyongyang's announcement had triggered any changes in the U.S. alert status.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, told The Associated Press on Tuesday that the U.S. would bring up North Korea's statement for discussion in a regular meeting of the U.N. Security Council. The Council is expected to talk about it on Wednesday.

Bolton said the Council should embark on "preventive diplomacy" and not just a "knee-jerk reaction" to the North Korean threat.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said a North Korean nuclear test would be an "unacceptable threat to peace and stability" and further isolate North Korea from the rest of the world.

The U.S. and other countries have imposed financial sanctions on Pyongyang.

Vice Adm. John Morgan, the Navy's chief of strategy and plans, told reporters that a possible test is "something we're very concerned about. We think there needs to be a diplomatic solution to this. We think the international community is working hard to achieve that."

___

Associated Press writers Foster Klug, Barry Schweid, Robert Burns and Peter Spielmann contributed to this report.

North Koreans Say They Plan A Nuclear Test (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — North Korea announced Tuesday that it intended to conduct its first nuclear test, prompting warnings from Tokyo to Washington that an underground explosion would lead to a sharp response and could undermine the security balance in Asia.

North Korea did not say when it would try to test a weapon, and experts inside and outside the Bush administration said the announcement itself was a negotiating ploy, intended to force the White House into lifting economic sanctions and holding one-on-one talks with North Korea.

American intelligence officials said they saw no signs that a test was imminent. But they cautioned that two weeks ago, American officials who had reviewed recent intelligence reports said American spy satellites had picked up evidence of indeterminate activity around what is thought to be North Korea's main test site. It was unclear to them whether the activity was part of plans for a test, or perhaps a feint related to last month's visit to Washington by President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea.

At that meeting, Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh discussed the possibility of a test, and Mr. Roh said the event would "change the nature" of South Korea's policy of economic engagement with the North, Mr. Roh told Americans he met afterward.

But the two leaders did not appear to have a coordinated strategy, and a senior Asian diplomat in Washington said Tuesday that "no one is quite sure how to respond" if the North conducted a test in the near future.

In public, the Bush administration's response was muted and left the American response as unclear as the North Korean threat.

North Korea has long possessed plutonium fuel to manufacture nuclear weapons, and American intelligence agencies say they believe the country expanded its fuel stockpile in recent years so that it could now make roughly six to eight weapons, and perhaps more. That inventory was increased, North Korea says, after the eviction of international inspectors in early 2003, just as the Bush administration was focused on the invasion of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0074697

North Korea claimed more than a year ago that it possessed a "nuclear deterrent," but the absence of a test has created a diplomatic ambiguity, allowing China to raise doubts about how far the country had progressed, and giving Washington room after President Bush's declaration in his first term that he would never "tolerate" a nuclear-armed North Korea.

It is unclear whether the North Koreans have determined that ambiguity is no longer in their interests. In a statement issued Tuesday, North Korea's Foreign Ministry said that "the U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war and sanctions and pressure compel the D.P.R.K. to conduct a nuclear test, an essential process for bolstering nuclear deterrent, as a self-defense measure in response." North Korea's official name is the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

But earlier this month a North Korean general, Ri Chan-bok, told a visiting American expert, Selig S. Harrison, that no test was necessary.

Mr. Harrison quoted General Ri as saying last week: "If we have an underground test it could have radioactive leakage. These rumors are spread by U.S. agencies to smear us. I have never heard indications of a nuclear test in our government or armed forces."

In a statement, Frederick Jones, the National Security Council spokesman, said a test would "severely undermine our confidence in North Korea's commitment to denuclearization" and "pose a threat to peace and security in Asia and the world."

"A provocative action of this nature would only further isolate the North Korean regime and deny the people of the North the benefits offered to them" in six-nation talks that have not reconvened in more than a year, the statement said.

But behind closed doors the announcement touched off a flurry of meetings, as officials wrestled with uncertain intelligence, questions about whether China or South Korea could prevent a test and the possibility that a test could take place before the Congressional elections.

The American statement did not draw the lines in the sand that marked the nuclear standoffs of the 1990's, when the Clinton administration began reinforcing American forces on the Korean Peninsula in response to a threat by the North to convert its supply of spent nuclear reactor fuel into bombs. President Clinton's advisers recommended at the time that if the North began to move that supply to a plant where it could be fashioned into bomb fuel, the president should order an airstrike to destroy the plant. Mr. Clinton never had to face that choice.

But American officials, who declined to be named because they were not authorized to speak about North Korean policy, have recently said the administration assumes that sooner or later, North Korea will conduct a test. "You could argue that it wouldn't be an all-bad thing," one administration hawk said, "because it would finally unify the Chinese, and the Russians and the South Koreans," all of whom have been reluctant to pressure North Korea.

Michael Green, who handled North Korea issues for the National Security Council until he left the White House last year, said, "I think that the evidence has grown, especially with the missile launch, that North Korea has its own escalation ladder, and they would agree to postpone a test only for the right price."

Mr. Green said he thought it was unlikely that North Korea's price would be met, and he said he thought the North had "calculated that they can take the heat from China and Japan, and they are not losing much from South Korea anyway."

In Tokyo, North Korea's sudden announcement was the first international test for Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, a nationalist who has vowed to make security a top priority. Mr. Abe warned North Korea against the test in stern terms rarely heard in the cautious language of Japanese diplomacy.

"Japan and the world absolutely will not tolerate a nuclear test," he told reporters, in a statement worded more sharply than the Bush administration's. "The international community would respond harshly."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters in Cairo, where she met with several Arab counterparts on regional issues, including Iran's nuclear program, that the announcement was disturbing and that a nuclear test would be "a very provocative act by the North Koreans."

For First Time, N. Korea Announces Plans For Nuke Test (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

DOJ_NMG_0074698

USA Today, October 4, 2006

CAIRO — North Korea announced Tuesday that it will conduct a nuclear test, the first such declaration from the nation.

The prospect that North Korea could take a major step forward in its nuclear weapons development sparked condemnation and concern in foreign capitals.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in Cairo for a meeting with Arab foreign ministers, said a North Korean test would be "a very provocative act." The Bush administration has said it wants a diplomatic solution to the dispute with North Korea.

Rice said the Bush administration "would have to assess what options we have" but did not detail them. The United States has already imposed economic sanctions on North Korea for its refusal to return to six-nation talks about its nuclear program.

North Korea gave no date for a test and said it was committed to "the denuclearization of the peninsula."

The country has warned in the past that it might test a nuclear weapon. The statement Tuesday was the first time it announced its intent to do so.

North Korea blamed U.S. threats "and sanctions and pressure" for its decision to conduct a nuclear test, a key step in the manufacture of atomic bombs. North Korea said the test was a "self-defense measure." The communist government said it wanted to "settle hostile relations" between North Korea and the United States.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said today that Japan "could not accept if North Korea were to conduct a nuclear test." South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun, meanwhile, called for a "cool-headed and stern" response, his office said.

North Korea is believed to have enough plutonium for as many as a dozen bombs, according to the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Most of the material has been created since 2003, when North Korea withdrew from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and resumed activity at its Yongbyon nuclear facility that had been suspended since 1994.

Rice stressed that the current dispute was not just between the United States and North Korea, but between North Korea and its "neighborhood."

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, raised the issue during a Security Council meeting.

The council, which condemned North Korea this year for conducting a series of missile tests, agreed to hold further discussions today.

Multilateral talks on North Korea's nuclear program have been stalled for almost a year. The nation has boycotted the six-nation talks in protest over U.S. financial restrictions imposed for its alleged illegal activity, including counterfeiting.

David Straub, a former State Department official, said he believes the North Koreans "will go through with it."

A nuclear test "would pose an unacceptable threat to peace and stability in Asia and the world," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in a statement.

North Korea To Conduct Nuclear Test (AP-Y)

By Bo-Mi Lim And Christopher Torchia

AP, October 3, 2006

North Korea triggered global alarm on Tuesday by saying it will conduct a nuclear test, a key step in the manufacture of atomic bombs that it views as a deterrent against any U.S. attack. But the North also said it was committed to nuclear disarmament, suggesting a willingness to negotiate.

The contradictory statement fits a North Korean pattern of ratcheting up tension on the Korean Peninsula, a Cold War-era flashpoint, in an attempt to win concessions such as economic aid. The strategy has had mixed results in recent years as the totalitarian regime sinks deeper into isolation and poverty, with China serving as its lifeline for food and fuel.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called North Korea's announcement "a very provocative act." It came as the standoff deepened over Iran's nuclear program, with senior U.N. diplomats saying six world powers would begin negotiations Friday in London on possibly imposing sanctions against Tehran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment.

It was the first time the North had publicly announced its intent to conduct a nuclear test. Previously, it had warned that it might conduct a test, depending on U.S. actions.

"The U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war and sanctions and pressure compel the DPRK to conduct a nuclear test, an essential process for bolstering nuclear deterrent, as a self-defense measure in response," said a statement by the North's

DOJ_NMG_0074699

Foreign Ministry and carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency. DPRK stands for Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

Yet it said it wanted to "settle hostile relations" between the North and the United States, and that it "will do its utmost to realize the denuclearization of the peninsula."

Many North Korea watchers believe the country's dictator, Kim Jong Il, knows that all-out confrontation with the United States would lead to his destruction. Even if Kim seeks negotiations, though, the risk of a miscalculation that spirals out of control cannot be ruled out.

The North Korean statement did not say when a nuclear test might occur, but the prospect drew rebukes from Japan, South Korea and the United States. The allies, along with China and Russia, had participated in the stalled six-party talks aimed at getting the North to give up its nuclear ambitions.

The announcement was not a big surprise to many observers of North Korea because U.S. intelligence reports previously had indicated that Pyongyang might be preparing a nuclear test. Many experts believe the North has enough radioactive material to build at least a half-dozen or more nuclear weapons.

In Cairo, Egypt, Rice said the United States would have to assess its options if the North carries out the test, without detailing what those options were. She stressed, however, that a North Korean test was an issue "for the neighborhood" and not just for the United States.

"It would be a very provocative act," Rice said. Still, she said, "they have not yet done it."

The White House, which has denied it has any intention of attacking the communist nation, also denounced the threat.

"A provocative action of this nature would only further isolate the North Korean regime and deny the people of the North the benefits offered to them in the six-party talks that they so rightly deserve," said Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

In Finland, European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana said such a test "is always bad news."

Japan's foreign minister, Taro Aso, called the North's nuclear test plans "totally unforgivable," and said Japan would react "sternly" if the North conducted the tests, according to Kyodo News agency.

The presidential office said South Korea had raised its "security level" and that security officials planned to hold an emergency meeting Wednesday. The United States keeps about 29,500 troops in South Korea, a legacy of the 1950-53 Korean War.

China, North Korea's ally and chief benefactor, had no immediate comment. North Korea counters U.S. influence in the region, but China is believed to be increasingly frustrated with North Korea's go-it-alone belligerence.

In a worst-case scenario, a North Korean nuclear test could prompt Japan to seek its own nuclear deterrent, intensifying historical tensions with China and South Korea, both of which suffered under Japanese colonial rule in the early 20th century.

A test could also strain the alliance between the United States and South Korea, which has sought to engage its neighbor.

The United States is likely to seek a military solution to the North Korean problem only as a last resort, partly because of the burden of conflict in Iraq and Afghanistan.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton raised the issue before a regularly scheduled meeting of the U.N. Security Council on Tuesday. He said he urged members "to come up not just with a knee-jerk reaction ... but to develop a coherent strategy to convince them that it's not in their interest to engage in nuclear testing."

But France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere said he wants a swift council statement, and China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said the best place to deal with the threat is in the six-party talks. Wang urged stepped up efforts to get the North to return to the stalled talks.

After a brief discussion, members decided to meet Wednesday morning to address the issue.

North Korea has sometimes made a splash with statements or military actions on important anniversaries at home, or political events such as elections in South Korea and the United States.

The test declaration came ahead of congressional elections in the United States in November and shortly before the expected election of South Korea's foreign minister, Ban Ki-Moon, as secretary-general of the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0074700

North Korea staged a series of missile tests to coincide with July 4, needling the United States on its Independence Day. But no talks or concessions were forthcoming.

Six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear activity have been stalled for almost a year. Pyongyang skipped the talks in protest over U.S. financial restrictions imposed for alleged illegal activity, including money laundering and counterfeiting.

"If they feel they are not getting interaction with us, they tend to do things to get our attention," said Charles Kartman, a U.S. nuclear negotiator with North Korea under the Clinton administration. "The tools that they have are all bad ones. They don't really have anything else going."

Top diplomats from the five permament members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany will attend Friday's meeting in London to discuss what to do about Iran's nuclear program, the U.N. diplomats said. The six nations have offered Tehran a package of economic and political rewards if it agrees to renounce uranium enrichment; sanctions are possible if is doesn't.

The officials spoke on condition of anonymity, citing an agreement not to pronounce the end of talks before European Union envoy Javier Solana and chief Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani speak on Wednesday.

The officials said, however, that the Security Council could meet as early as Monday to start work on a resolution imposing the first of a series of sanctions meant to make Iran turn course.

N. Korea Pledges Nuclear Test (WP)

By Anthony Faiola And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Need Cited to Deter Threat From U.S., But No Date Is Set

TOKYO, Oct. 3 -- North Korea declared Tuesday that it would conduct a nuclear test to bolster its defenses against the United States, raising tensions in the region and marking the communist government's first unambiguous pledge to prove it has become a nuclear power.

Though North Korea has previously said it possesses nuclear bombs -- U.S. intelligence officials have estimated it could have as many as 11 -- a test detonation would dramatically change the region's power dynamics. Analysts have said the United States and area neighbors including China, Japan and South Korea would be forced to deal far more harshly with the North Koreans.

A test would be a "very provocative act," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a visit to Cairo. It would create a "qualitatively different situation on the Korean Peninsula" that would spill over into the entire region, she said. Rice declined to predict what the U.S. response might be.

In a statement issued through the official KCNA news service, North Korea's Foreign Ministry said the government would "conduct a nuclear test under conditions where safety is firmly guaranteed." The statement did not say when the test might occur, but added that the North's "nuclear weapons will serve as reliable war deterrent for protecting the supreme interests of the state and the security of the Korean nation from the U.S. threat of aggression."

The declaration follows reports in recent months, based on intelligence agency findings, that the secretive communist state might be preparing a test site in its barren northeast. Observers greeted the reports with some skepticism, partly because North Korea is widely known for brinkmanship.

High-level officials from the United States, Japan, South Korea and China immediately began exchanging calls Tuesday to discuss a response, according to Asian diplomatic sources. These countries have been part of six-party talks attempting to persuade North Korea to give up its nuclear program. Large numbers of intelligence analysts and policymakers who usually split their time among a host of issues, including Iran, were devoted Tuesday exclusively to the North Korean statement.

The reaction was particularly sharp in Japan, which sees itself as a primary target of North Korean aggression. "If they conduct a nuclear test, it will not be forgiven," Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, told reporters Tuesday night. "The international community will deal with the situation firmly."

Before his election last week, Abe suggested that Tokyo should study whether Japan's constitution would allow a preemptive strike on North Korean missile bases.

DOJ_NMG_0074701

Several analysts and diplomats said a test would in effect mean that North Korea's absolute ruler, Kim Jong Il, had played his last card in the standoff over the country's nuclear program. Observers suggested that the threat might be an attempt to force an easing of the economic pressure against the North that has risen dramatically in recent months.

Analysts said the threat might also reflect attempts by Kim to appease the North Korean military, which is still smarting from a failed test of its new intercontinental Taepodong-2 missile in July.

"North Korea's final goal is survival, and a test is their final option," said Ahn Yinhay, professor of international relations at Korea University in Seoul. "Given the current situation -- the enormous pressure from the U.S.'s hard-line policy -- the North Koreans may think they have no other means to try to get out of this deadlock. They may think they have nothing else to lose."

Many observers say there would be a great deal to lose. A nuclear test would make it far more difficult for Pyongyang's chief benefactors -- China and South Korea -- to continue to provide billions of dollars worth of economic aid and trade, money that has helped Kim prop up his government.

Rumors of a nuclear test have surfaced almost every year since 2002, when North Korea began an escalating series of actions regarding its nuclear program -- including kicking out U.N. weapons inspectors and reprocessing spent fuel rods.

A sense of new urgency has been building in diplomatic circles in recent months. Last week, Christopher R. Hill, the Bush administration's special envoy to the stalled six-country talks, publicly warned that a test would be viewed by world powers as a "very serious" escalation.

The last country to conduct a nuclear test was Pakistan, in 1998, when it detonated five bombs underground in response to tests two weeks earlier by India.

Some scientists question whether North Korea has the technology to conduct a test safely -- leaking radiation is a major concern.

Lee Sang Deuk, vice speaker of the South Korean National Assembly, said in an interview in Washington last month that in late August intelligence agencies had detected unusual movements of troops and equipment around a complex of caves believed to contain a nuclear test site. Cables were laid and tents erected. A U.S. official confirmed that there had been signs of an impending test other than Tuesday's statement.

North Korea has frequently provided the world with early warnings of dramatic moves and has often chosen symbolic dates for them. A series of missile tests took place during the July 4 weekend, and Tuesday's statement came as South Korea was marking its national day.

"A decision to test is a political calculation, not a technical one," said one intelligence officer. The officer said analysts believed that the Pyongyang government issued the statement in part to gauge international reaction before making a final decision. "It doesn't mean they won't test, but it gives them a chance to roll back, or be coaxed back if they want to," said the officer, who agreed to discuss some of the classified analysis on condition of anonymity.

A U.S. government official said the North Koreans might also be trying to refocus international attention on their issues at a time when Iran is becoming the administration's main concern.

A major concern among U.S. officials is the potential reaction by Japan. U.S. nuclear analysts have worried for years that a North Korean nuclear test might lead Japan to break with decades of nonproliferation commitments and speed toward its own weapons capability. Japan's nuclear industry is highly advanced, giving the country the ability to make nuclear weapons within months if it chose to do so.

Frederick Jones, spokesman for President Bush's National Security Council, shared White House concerns in prepared comments that said a test "would severely undermine our confidence in North Korea's commitment to denuclearization and to the Six Party Talks and would pose a threat to peace and security in Asia and the world."

North Korea's nuclear capabilities have grown significantly during Bush's tenure. When Bush came into office six years ago, intelligence agencies estimated that North Korea had the capability to make one or two nuclear weapons. Those sources now put the number as high as 11.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack called North Korea's announcement an "unacceptable threat" to peace and stability in Asia and in the wider world. The Bush administration will continue to work with its allies in the six-party talks to discourage "such a reckless action," the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0074702

Linzer reported from New York. Staff writer Robin Wright, traveling with Rice, contributed to this report.

North Korea Deepens Weapons Rift With Plans For Nuclear-Bomb Test (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad, Sebastian Moffett, Gordon Fairclough And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

North Korea said it will test a nuclear bomb, antagonizing its neighbors and the U.S. and deepening the international standoff over the country's weapons program.

A test by North Korea would dramatically alter the balance of power in East Asia, where China is the only confirmed nuclear power. It would also strain relations between the U.S. and China, who view the North Korean threat in very different terms.

The Bush administration argues a nuclear test would increase the threat of attack on Japan and the U.S. "Were they to test and were they to proliferate this technology, we'd be living...in a somewhat different world," U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said. Mr. Rumsfeld declined to speculate on any U.S. military preparations in response to a potential nuclear test.

North Korea's foreign ministry, announcing its plans yesterday in a statement distributed by the country's official news agency, didn't set a date for the test. It said it would be conducted "in a condition where safety is firmly guaranteed." U.S. intelligence sources said in mid-August that they detected activity suggestive of bomb-test preparations at a mountain in northeast North Korea.

For several years, North Korea has said it has nuclear bombs. Amid some doubts as to its true weapons capabilities, a nuclear test would provide the first confirmation. In July, it test-fired seven missiles, including a long-range missile designed to cross the Pacific Ocean that misfired. The launch led the United Nations Security Council to issue sanctions against North Korea.

Pyongyang said in its statement that the threat of nuclear war and sanctions from the U.S. force it to undertake a test. It said that its goal is "to settle hostile relations" between it and the U.S.

Following the announcement, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called the threat of a test "a very provocative act." The White House said in a statement that a test "would pose a threat to peace and security in Asia and the world."

The U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, said the U.S. would bring up North Korea's actions within the Security Council this morning after rebuffing a push by other countries to issue a sharp press statement on the test threat. Mr. Bolton declined to speculate on what action the U.N. might take but said the emphasis was "to develop a coherent strategy to convince" the North Koreans "that it's not in their interest to engage in nuclear testing." The Security Council could move ahead on some sort of measure, but it is unlikely China or Russia would agree to a sharply worded resolution.

The U.S. and its allies have few clear alternatives to U.N. diplomatic action. The U.S. has repeatedly shied away from suggestions it might strike North Korea militarily, a move China and South Korea would strongly oppose. There also are lingering divisions within the Security Council over whether to seek stiffer sanctions on North Korea.

Japan was quick to react to Pyongyang's bomb-test statement. "Japan and the world would definitely not tolerate a nuclear test" by North Korea, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said in Tokyo. "If the test is carried out, I believe the international community would respond harshly."

In Seoul, high-level South Korean officials met yesterday to refine a plan they had developed in recent weeks specifically in response to a possible nuclear test. President Roh Moo Hyun said last month that "if North Korea goes ahead with a nuclear testing, the situation will become a totally different one from what it has been."

There was no immediate response from China, which is Pyongyang's closest ally. But it is likely a North Korean nuclear test would anger Beijing. Chinese leaders worry a successful test by North Korea would lead Japan to build up its military capabilities and perhaps consider developing its own nuclear weapons -- something experts say Tokyo could probably do in less than a year, given its large plutonium stockpiles.

"The security mood in Japan would be affected by a test, and the Chinese understand that," said a senior U.S. official. It is unclear what pressure China might bring to bear on North Korea not to conduct its test or how it might punish leader Kim Jong Il if it does. China remains most concerned about potential chaos in North Korea if the Kim regime should collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0074703

North Korea has pushed to meet with the U.S. in two-way talks. But amid past broken agreements with Pyongyang, the U.S. insists on meeting North Korea's leadership in broader arenas such as the U.N. or six-nation talks that include the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

N. Korea Plans A Nuclear Test (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

TOKYO — World leaders lashed out at North Korea's vow Tuesday to test a nuclear bomb sometime "in the future," but offered no clear plan for dealing with aggravated tensions over the dictatorship's nuclear weapons ambitions.

U.S. intelligence officials said they had been monitoring recent movement of people and vehicles around at least one suspected test site. But because North Korea has never conducted a nuclear test, it is difficult for intelligence agencies to determine how close the regime may be to setting off a bomb.

The North Koreans did not elaborate on when a test would occur or whether it would be conducted below ground, which experts say is most likely, or in the atmosphere.

Showcasing a nuclear capability would almost certainly deepen North Korea's diplomatic and economic isolation, and could escalate the military buildup in northeast Asia, where grievances run deep and suspicions between capitals are high.

North Korea's Foreign Ministry said Tuesday that a test of the nation's nuclear capability was a necessary response to Washington's financial squeeze on the country, which it described as a "de facto declaration of war." In recent months, Washington has accused Kim Jong Il's regime of counterfeiting U.S. currency and using foreign banks to launder drug money, and has increased pressure on banks around the world not to handle transactions with Pyongyang's military and political elite.

"The U.S. extreme threat of nuclear war and sanctions and pressure compel [North Korea] to conduct a nuclear test, an essential process for bolstering [our] nuclear deterrent, as a corresponding measure for defense," the North Korean statement said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, traveling in Egypt, said a test would be "a very provocative act."

In Japan, a country within North Korean missile range and where hostility to Kim's regime is a hallmark of its new hard-line government, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe warned that "Japan and the world would definitely not tolerate a nuclear test."

And the South Korean government, which has been reluctant to take a hard line against its volatile neighbor, expressed concern over the announcement and said President Roh Moo-hyun would visit Beijing on Oct. 13 to discuss it.

But there was no immediate consensus on what measures should be employed to defuse the latest threat.

China, North Korea's neighbor and key economic partner, urged calm and restraint.

In New York, the United Nations Security Council declined to issue a formal admonition, noting that it had passed a tough resolution in July demanding that North Korea end all provocative acts and return to six-party talks aimed at dismantling its nuclear weapons program in return for security guarantees and economic incentives.

That resolution followed North Korea's July test firing of a long-range Taepodong 2 missile and a surprising burst of shorter-range missiles, in defiance of similar warnings.

U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John R. Bolton said the Security Council would meet today on finding a more effective way to discourage Pyongyang from conducting a nuclear test.

The North Korean move adds complexity to nuclear diplomacy as the Security Council seeks ways to dissuade Iran from continuing its nuclear enrichment activities. Pyongyang's defiance underscores the limited power economic sanctions exert over authoritarian governments prepared to let their civilian populations suffer in order to acquire a nuclear capability.

Kurt Campbell, a former deputy assistant secretary of Defense for Asia and the Pacific, called the Korean peninsula "the land of lousy options" and said the U.S. was limited in what it could do to diplomatically or forcibly prevent a test.

"It is a profound and deep failure for the United States and China if North Korea tests a nuclear weapon," he said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, traveling in Nicaragua, suggested that a test by North Korea could lead to the further spread of nuclear technology.

DOJ_NMG_0074704

"They are an active proliferator," Rumsfeld said. "And were they to test and were they then to proliferate those technologies, we'd be living with a proliferator and obviously we'd be living in a somewhat different world."

While the Defense secretary expressed concern that a test would increase the possibility of a bomb falling into rogue hands, others warned that a proven North Korean capability could encourage other countries in the region, such as Japan, to push for a nuclear arsenal of their own.

North Korea is estimated to have sufficient plutonium for as many as 13 weapons. By 2008, Pyongyang could have the capability to develop as many a 17 nuclear weapons, according to the Institute for Science and International Security, a nonpartisan Washington group headed by David Albright, who has worked with the International Atomic Energy Agency on nuclear inspections.

The United States, which has about 30,000 troops stationed in South Korea, is using imagery and heat sensors in trying to track North Korean activity at suspected test sites.

Pentagon officials said they were concerned about the possibility of a nuclear test, and they emphasized that the United States was trying to find diplomatic means of preventing the North Koreans from carrying one out.

"We think there needs to be a diplomatic solution to this," Vice Adm. John Morgan, the Navy's chief of strategy and plans, told reporters Tuesday. "We think the international community is working hard to achieve that."

Although North Korean government rhetoric and activity around the test sites have heated up, intelligence officials do not believe a test is imminent.

"No one can say with certainty whether it will happen — no one, that is, but Kim Jong Il," said a U.S. intelligence official, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing intelligence data. "It could happen with little or no warning. We don't have a wonderful timetable that says they have to do 14 things to prepare for a test and they have done seven of them. There is no precedent for assessing how North Korea does its test preparations."

U.S. officials could not say what type of test the North Koreans might conduct. They believe an underground test is more likely but have not ruled out the possibility that Kim would order an aboveground test, which could produce a large mushroom cloud and spread radioactive dust.

Some observers say North Korea may be bluffing and that the talk of a test is to counter the Bush administration's pursuit of economic sanctions.

Washington says it cannot tolerate what it describes as criminal activities among the Pyongyang regime and foreign banks, and says its global campaign against those transactions is separate from the nuclear weapons issue.

The administration recently sent diplomatic feelers to Pyongyang about restarting the six-party talks. But those overtures have floundered over North Korea's insistence that the U.S. first stop what Pyongyang sees as an attempt to break the regime through an expanding campaign of financial sanctions.

Donald Gregg, president of the Korea Society and a former U.S. ambassador to South Korea, said he thought that Pyongyang's threat was serious, but that a test would be a strategic error.

"They have been working for this for a long time, they have threatened it, and they have said flatly that they have nuclear weapons," he said. "But it will heighten their isolation."

N. Korean Move Comes Amid Bid For Talks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

North Korea's announcement yesterday that it will conduct a nuclear test came just as the United States, along with South Korea, was launching a new effort to persuade the government in Pyongyang to return to long-stalled disarmament talks.

Top aides to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have been shaping the new approach, which began after a summit meeting last month between President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun. Rice has described the next six-week period as crucial, saying she hopes to make a trip to Northeast Asia soon to test her ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0074705

But U.S. officials said yesterday that the government in Pyongyang, which closely monitors U.S. statements, appears to have concluded that there is no benefit in reaching a deal. Some analysts suggested that North Korea is bluffing to force the United States to begin bilateral negotiations, something the Bush administration has rejected as being a reward for bad behavior.

Instead, Pyongyang's gambit could embolden hawks in the administration who advocate confronting North Korea with a stepped-up campaign of isolation and sanctions, perhaps even a naval blockade. Some officials have privately argued that a nuclear test by North Korea would be a clarifying event that would make the problem apparent to the rest of the world.

This is the second time in recent months that Pyongyang has abruptly dismissed peace feelers from the United States. In July, Rice had also been prepared to fly to Asia to launch a new effort to restart the six-nation talks aimed at ending the impasse over North Korea's nuclear weapons.

A senior Chinese official delivered a message to the North Korean government that, if it did not conduct a ballistic-missile test, Rice was prepared to put a lot on the table, including formally ending the Korean War that erupted five decades ago and discussing the military structure on the Korean Peninsula, U.S. officials said.

The initiative was developed after months of debate among Bush's top advisers. It would have sought ways to encourage North Korea to open up its economy -- much as China did in the 1970s under the leadership of Deng Xiaoping -- and would have indicated a U.S. acceptance of Kim Jong Il's rule.

On July 4, Pyongyang gave its answer: It tested a missile. Rice then scrubbed her trip because of the sudden outbreak of war in Lebanon. The U.N. Security Council -- with the surprising support of China, North Korea's main benefactor -- passed a tough resolution condemning the missile test. U.S. officials began preparing to reimpose some sanctions that had been lifted when North Korea agreed to freeze its nuclear program in 1990s -- but held off an announcement at the request of South Korea.

"The North Koreans hate being ignored, and they are tempted to do things to get attention," one senior administration official said recently, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive diplomacy. "We have wondered whether we should try to give the North Koreans another chance, but the North Koreans are not doing anything to show that such a move would meet a promising reply."

Yesterday's North Korean Foreign Ministry statement, issued through the official KCNA news service, put the onus on the United States for the failure of diplomacy. "Nuclear weapons will serve as reliable war deterrent for protecting the supreme interests of the state and the security of the Korean nation from the U.S. threat of aggression," the statement said.

The proximate cause of North Korea's refusal to return to the talks is a Treasury Department action against a bank in Macao called Banco Delta Asia, which the agency had identified as the main conduit for bringing North Korean counterfeit dollar bills into the international system. The Treasury had determined that senior officials at the Macao bank accepted large deposits of cash and agreed to place the bogus money into circulation. Treasury officials also believed that the bank accepted multimillion-dollar wire transfers from North Korean front companies that were deeply involved in criminal activities.

The bank is reputed to hold the private accounts of Kim. the North Korean leader, and his family.

Last year, four days before North Korea reached an agreement with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea on a "statement of principles" to guide the nuclear negotiations, the Treasury formally designated the bank as a "primary money-laundering concern." Banco Delta Asia quickly teetered on the edge of collapse, and banks around the world began to curtail their dealings with North Korea for fear of being similarly tainted.

After the impact of the Treasury action became clear, North Korea refused to return to the six-party talks.

Before North Korea's announcement yesterday, U.S. and South Korean officials had said they were looking at ways to wrap up the Treasury's investigation of the Macao bank as a way to remove that impediment to the negotiations. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill noted last month that the Treasury action concerned only 40 accounts holding about $24 million.

But, now, Pyongyang has dramatically raised the stakes. U.S. officials immediately moved to put North Korea on the agenda of the U.N. Security Council, saying that, for the moment, the time for positive gestures has passed.

Rice Tries To Persuade Sudan On Darfur (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074706

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made a passionate plea to the international community on Tuesday to persuade the government of Sudan to reverse itself and open the bloodied Darfur region to U.N. peacekeepers.

Dispensing with traditional diplomatic understatement, Rice cited U.N. reports that tens of thousands of people, or even hundreds of thousands, perhaps, cannot be reached with food and water.

Women who go out for firewood are regularly raped, she said. Villages are attacked by militia. by rebels and by government forces.

"The international community does have a responsibility to protect the most vulnerable," Rice said at a news conference amid Mideast peacemaking efforts. "What is going on in Darfur now cannot be tolerated."

In fact, the situation in Darfur took up a large part of the discussion Rice had in the Egyptian capital with foreign ministers and other officials from eight Arab countries, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said.

Rice's plea followed one on Monday by President Bush, who sent a message this summer to President Omar al-Bashir urging entry of a U.N. peacekeeping force. Bush was rebuffed.

In August, the U.N. passed a resolution that would give the United Nations authority over peacekeepers in the Western Sudanese province of Darfur. The resolution is meant to give more power and funding to a force, now run by the African Union, that has been unable to stop the humanitarian catastrophe there.

Rice said a U.N. force could be drawn principally from Muslim African countries and from North Africa and possibly Asia.

"We need to work urgently to have the government of Khartoum accept what is now a U.N. Security Council resolution," she said.

At least 200,000 people have died and some 2 million have been displaced since rebels from Darfur's ethnic African population revolted in 2003. The next year, after a long internal debate, the Bush administration accused the government of genocide.

The Arab-dominated Khartoum government is alleged to have unleashed Arab militias, known as the janjaweed, against the ethnic African villagers.

"This is not a challenge to the sovereignty of Sudan," Rice said of the proposed dispatch of U.N. peacekeepers. "This is certainly respected. But we need to deal with the terrible humanitarian situation there."

U.N. Front-runner Vows To Push Reforms (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, October 4, 2006

SEOUL — South Korea's foreign minister, the favorite to be the next U.N. secretary-general, promised Tuesday that if chosen for the job, he will work to reform the world body and to find a peaceful resolution to the international standoff over North Korea's nuclear program.

Ban Ki Moon, 62, cemented his position as Kofi Annan's likely successor after an informal poll Monday of the 15 members of the U.N. Security Council. Fourteen nations, including the five veto-wielding members, voted in favor of Ban. He received one vote of “no opinion.”

Each of the five other candidates received at least one “no” vote from the five permanent members of the council: Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

The 192-nation General Assembly will hold a formal vote on a new secretary-general next week, probably Monday. The assembly traditionally follows the Security Council's recommendation.

If Ban prevails, his selection will have been marked by unprecedented speed, consensus and calm. In years past, the choice of a U.N. chief has often involved rancorous negotiations, numerous ballots and handshake deals. Annan, who steps down Dec. 31, was himself a compromise candidate in 1996. He emerged late in the process after the United States blocked Boutros Boutros-Ghali's bid for a second five-year term.

Ban would be the eighth secretary-general in the United Nations' 60-year history. The secretary-general oversees an organization with 92,000 peacekeepers around the world and a $5 billion annual budget. Among programs that fall under the U.N. leader's purview: fighting hunger, assisting refugees and slowing the spread of HIV/AIDS.

DOJ_NMG_0074707

In Seoul, Ban said that if elected, he will push for critical reforms.

"There have been many changes around the world during the past 60 years … various threats that we have not experienced in the past," Ban said. "So it is true that there have been doubts and criticism over whether the U.N. has responded appropriately and effectively."

He pledged to help resolve the dispute over North Korea's nuclear program by applying his expertise in dealing with the communist nation.

Ban said he would focus on his role as the world's top diplomat and leave day-to-day operations to a deputy.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said he had "a lot of respect" for Ban, though he later told reporters he was disappointed there weren't more contenders for the position. Earlier, Bolton had dropped his opposition to the custom of rotating the secretary-general's job among regions, which put Asia at the front of the line. The last Asian secretary-general was U Thant of Burma, who served 1961-71.

The other candidates were U.N. Undersecretary-General Shashi Tharoor of India; Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga; Surakiart Sathirathai of Thailand, who was deputy prime minister until a military coup last month; former Afghan finance minister Ashraf Ghani; and Jordan's U.N. ambassador, Prince Zeid al-Hussein. Jayantha Dhanapala of Sri Lanka, a former U.N. disarmament chief, withdrew from consideration last week.

South Korean Homecoming At The U.N. (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

BAN KI-MOON WAS BORN in the city of Chungju on June 13, 1944, while Korea was still suffering under occupation by Japan. A year later, the victors of World War II split the land of his birth in half, with the Soviet Union administering the part north of the 38th Parallel and the United States taking control of the southern part, including Chungju. Two weeks after Ban's sixth birthday, a massive North Korean army under communist leader Kim Il Sung invaded the South, providing the United Nations with its first and most trying test as a force in world affairs.

Today, Ban is poised to become secretary-general of the organization that, with U.S. leadership, pushed the North's armies back into their territory and then oversaw reconstruction of the shattered South. There are few nations where the United Nations is as widely respected, or has played as fundamental a role, as South Korea. Which is why it is fitting that a South Korean should lead the organization during what may well be another turning point.

Ban's selection isn't yet official, but after winning a straw-poll vote by the Security Council on Monday, he is almost certain to get the formal nod from the group next week, after which his approval by the full General Assembly should be little more than a formality. The process has been highly unusual both for its speed and lack of rancor — which is either a positive sign or a signal of the U.N.'s approaching demise, depending on one's outlook.

Ban is a soft-spoken, low-profile career diplomat who last year represented South Korea in the six-nation nuclear talks with North Korea and who was probably chosen because he made the fewest waves among the candidates. Being the unanimous pick of countries as divergent as the U.S., China, France and Russia requires an astonishing degree of either diplomatic skill or utter blandness. U.N.-bashers are already accusing Ban of buying votes and of being too bureaucratic to push through the reforms the organization so badly needs. Yet being a consensus-builder, a good listener and a committed multilateralist with an optimistic view of the U.N. aren't bad qualities in a secretary-general. The firebrand approach so favored by the U.N.'s sharpest critics might sound attractive on Op-Ed pages, but it almost never accomplishes anything useful in an international forum.

The U.N. secretary-general, in the words of outgoing officeholder Kofi Annan, is "the world's most impossible job." Ban will have to oversee the herculean task of reforming a body that has been nearly paralyzed by corruption scandals, hard-to-resolve conflicts in such places as Darfur and Lebanon and a growing rift between rich and poor nations. Ban is no Bill Clinton — this page's pick for the job, who was somehow overlooked by the Security Council — but he has the skills and experience to be a success.

Annan's Financial Form To Be Secret (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074708

NEW YORK -- U.N. officials said yesterday that they will not publicly release a financial disclosure form filed by Secretary-General Kofi Annan last month -- 10 months after he ordered all senior U.N. officials to file the forms.

A spokesman said Mr. Annan submitted the questionnaire -- under a policy implemented in response to international outrage over U.N. involvement in the Iraq oil-for-food scandal -- on Sept. 22.

"The secretary-general has filed the forms," Stephane Dujarric confirmed yesterday. But, he said, "We will not be making it public."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, did not return a call asking about that decision, but other critics of the world body argued that the disclosure form should be made public.

"Kofi Annan has not gone far enough. He should make the financial disclosure publicly available for outside scrutiny," said Nile Gardiner, director of the Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom at the Heritage Foundation. "The culture of secrecy remains intact in the upper echelon of the United Nations."

Mr. Annan implemented the disclosure-form policy as one of several moves to reform the institution in the wake of the oil-for-food scandal. Massive fraud was uncovered in a $64 billion program run by the United Nations that allowed Saddam Hussein's Iraq to sell a limited amount of oil.

Mr. Annan was cleared of personal involvement in the scandal, but questions were raised about the conduct of son Kojo, who worked for a company that won a major oil-for-food contract.

Among other reforms, Mr. Annan ordered the creation of an ethics office and established a policy to protect whistleblowers who expose corruption within the organization. The General Assembly agreed to the changes during the 2005 World Summit.

Until this year, U.N. undersecretaries-general were required to submit disclosure forms and declare gifts of $10,000 or more. Mr. Annan then declared that assistant secretaries-general and authorities in the U.N. procurement office also should file the forms, and reduced the gift limit to $250.

Mr. Dujarric told reporters in January that Mr. Annan would be among the first to file the disclosure form.

Asked whether he had filed his form at a press conference last month, Mr. Annan carefully answered: "I honor all my obligations to the U.N., and I think that is as I have always done." But the secretary-general is not technically an employee of the United Nations and, therefore, not legally obliged to do so.

Many Annan advisers were urging him to make good on his promise, but the chief U.N. legal counsel, Nicolas Michel, instructed the secretary-general not to, said a Secretariat official.

"Michel told him he didn't have to do it, that it would set a precedent that future secretaries-general would have to follow," said the official, who spoke on the condition of not being identified. "I don't know why anyone thinks that would be a bad thing."

During the probe into the oil-for-food program, Mr. Annan met with investigators from the Independent Inquiry Committee, led by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, and provided documents from six banks and three credit-card companies from 1998 to 2004.

"He lives within his means and has accumulated a retirement fund through savings," said the committee's report, which noted that his income was based on his U.N. salary and a rental property.

"The secretary-general contributes heavily to charity and to the support of his extended family. ... The records produced do not raise concerns about the secretary-general's financial stability nor do they reveal any payments or transactions that appear suspicious or improper."

The U.N. secretary-general receives $259,097 a year, after taxes. He also lives rent-free in a four-story mansion on Sutton Place, with a grassy back yard that slopes down to the East River. The house, which does not belong to him or to the United Nations, is on loan from a charitable foundation.

In addition, the secretary-general receives an allowance of about $25,000 a year for business entertaining, and he can keep the frequent flier miles he accrues when traveling on commercial airlines.

Rumsfeld Stays Mum On Nicaragua Politics (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074709

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld criticized Venezuela's hostile politics and longtime adversary Cuba during a three-day stay in Central American, but avoided any talk about another old antagonist.

Asked repeatedly about the Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega, who is leading in the presidential polls here, Rumsfeld stayed mum.

"I don't get involved in politics in the United States," Rumsfeld said more than once when questioned by reporters during a gathering of defense ministers from the Western hemisphere. "So you can be certain I don't get involved in politics in Nicaragua."

U.S. officials, however, are watching Nicaragua's upcoming elections very closely, mindful that a win by Ortega could be another destabilizing force in a region where democracy has slowly taken hold.

Ortega, whose socialist government was a major adversary of the United States in the 1980s, led the overthrow of dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979 and fought the U.S.-backed Contra rebels as Nicaragua's president from 1985-1990.

Rumsfeld made a passing reference to Cuba in his formal remarks to the ministers, and on Tuesday he said the island nation would be welcome in the conference when it becomes a "free and democratic country."

And he was blunt about the concerns being raised by Latin American leaders about Venezuela President Hugo Chavez' billion-dollar weapons buildup.

"I don't know of anyone threatening Venezuela, anyone in this hemisphere," Rumsfeld said when asked if he believed the Venezuelans' contention that the arms purchases were strictly for defense.

Chavez grabbed headlines recently when he called Bush "the devil" and slammed U.S. leaders for trying to block his country from taking a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

U.S. officials have long considered Chavez a destabilizing force. And they have suggested that Venezuela would make the Security Council unworkable if the nation were to win its bid against U.S.-backed Guatemala for a rotating council seat.

Rumsfeld met with Central American defense ministers on Tuesday, and later with Nicaraguan President Enrique Bolanos.

He said it is important for the Central American countries to continue to work together on counterterrorism, counter-narcotics, natural disasters and other threats. But he agreed that as one country cracks down on drug trafficking, the problem may migrate to another country.

After his meeting with Bolanos, Rumsfeld said he was pleased with the progress the Nicaraguans have made in their effort to destroy a cache of about 1,000 Soviet-era surface-to-air missiles. However, he noted that the job is not yet complete. U.S. officials have considered the missiles a potential threat to civil aviation.

___

On the Net:

Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

Hijacker Surrenders After Forcing Turkish Airliner To Southern Italy (WP/AP)

By Max Frigione, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

BRINDISI, Italy, Oct. 3 -- A Turkish man hijacked a jetliner carrying 113 people on an Albania-to-Turkey flight Tuesday and forced it to land in southern Italy, where he surrendered and released all the passengers unharmed, officials said.

Two senior Turkish officials said the hijacker was seeking political asylum. An Italian security official said the man had a message for Pope Benedict XVI, but he said he did not know what it was.

Earlier accounts from the plane's operator, Turkish Airlines, said that the Boeing 737-400 had been hijacked by two Turks and that they were protesting the pope's planned visit to Turkey next month.

Turkish Transport Minister Binali Yildirim said the hijacker was seeking to evade military service in his native Turkey. "It has nothing to do with the pope's visit; it was a simple attempt of seeking political asylum under the influence of psychological problems," Yildirim said.

The passengers got off the plane about two hours after it landed in Brindisi, a town on southern Italy's Adriatic coast. The jet was on a darkened tarmac, with a firetruck carrying the airport's chief of security parked nearby.

DOJ_NMG_0074710

The passengers were being questioned one by one by Italian authorities to confirm their identities and rule out any possibility that the hijacker had an accomplice.

The plane was making a routine flight from the Albanian capital, Tirana, to Istanbul when it was seized. A man burst into the cockpit and said, "There's two of us," leading authorities to believe that the man was not acting alone, according to an Italian security official in Brindisi. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the news media.

The captain issued an alert that the plane had been hijacked. The plane's crew later contacted Italian air traffic controllers and asked to land in Brindisi. The plane was escorted to the ground by two Italian military jets, according to the Italian air traffic agency ENAV.

The hijacker was identified as Hakan Ekinci. He had converted to Christianity and was an army deserter and anti-militarist who fled to Albania this year, according to the private Dogan News Agency and NTV television in Turkey.

Ekinci, 28, sent a letter to Benedict on Aug. 30 asking for help to avoid returning to military service in Turkey, Dogan reported.

"I am Hakan Ekinci, I am a Christian and I never want to serve in a Muslim army," he said in the letter, according to Dogan, which said it had obtained the letter from a blog on the Internet. "I am begging you for help as the spiritual leader of us, Christians' world."

Unswayed By West, Russia Continues Georgia Blockade (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

MOSCOW Oct. 3 -- Russia signaled Tuesday that it would not lift a transportation blockade on Georgia despite the release of four Russian officers detained on espionage charges and calls from the European Union and the United States for the two countries to find ways to ease tensions.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Tuesday that his country had "no plans for the time being" to restore postal and transportation links, including commercial flights and train service, that were severed Monday as the four military officers were about to be released.

"One must not feed off Russia and insult it," Lavrov said at a media briefing Tuesday that was marked by harsh language. "The Georgian leadership must understand this."

Relations between the two countries have worsened since Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili came to power in early 2004 on the promise of taking his country into the NATO military alliance and out of Russia's sphere of influence. Tensions are also heightened by two breakaway regions in Georgia -- South Ossetia and Abkhazia -- that receive support from Moscow.

Saakashvili has said he is determined to reassert Georgian sovereignty over the two areas, which are patrolled by Russian peacekeepers.

In Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja of Finland, which holds the rotating E.U. presidency, said Moscow's sanctions seemed disproportionate and warned against "more acute measures." On Monday, the U.S. State Department also called on Russia and Georgia to take steps to "de-escalate tensions in the days and weeks ahead."

"We think that hot rhetoric on either side or sanctions is not a good idea," Daniel Fried, assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, said in a telephone interview. "This is a time for reflection and for both sides to work together. . . . It's too bad Russia is not taking the opportunity to de-escalate."

But Lavrov was not in a charitable mood. "There are attempts by some figures to say that the Russian officers have been released, the situation has calmed down and let's do things as before," he said. "We don't want to do things as before."

The Russian foreign minister accused Georgia of illegally acquiring Soviet- or Russian- made arms in Europe, and he said the sellers, whom he did not identify, were violating a ban on transferring those weapons to third parties.

He said Russia was "seriously worried by total militarization in Georgia," noting a call-up of reservists by the government.

"The Georgian budget is not very big," Lavrov said. "Money is coming via different channels, including illegally from Russia, where this money is largely made by criminal methods. These channels will be blocked, too."

DOJ_NMG_0074711

Lavrov provided no details, but the statement appeared to be a reference to remittances sent back to Georgia by some of the estimated 300,000 Georgian immigrants here; some estimates put the number of Georgians in Russia, many of them here illegally, closer to 1 million. The population of Georgia is 4.6 million.

Russian lawmakers scheduled a debate on a bill that would bar Georgians from transferring money home.

"These measures will not give the desired results and in the end will hurt Russia itself," Georgia's Foreign Ministry said in a statement Tuesday.

Lavrov also noted that Georgia had arrested the Russians after Saakashvili had visited Washington and NATO had agreed to an intensive dialogue with the country on membership.

"We certainly make note of the assurances of our U.S. colleagues that they have constantly tried to keep the Georgian leadership from abrupt moves," Lavrov said. "But the chronology was the way I have just explained -- a visit to Washington, NATO's decision, hostage-taking -- and the charges were laughable and groundless."

Georgian Vineyards Hit By Russian Frost (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

TELAVI, Georgia -- In the shadow of the Caucasus Mountains, the grapes are heavy on the vines and ripe for harvesting. Zurab Ramazashvili, owner of the Telavi Wine Cellar, cradles a bunch in his hand, plucks a single grape and savors its bursting juices.

"I'm very optimistic about our wine this year," he said, adding with a rueful smile, "But where to sell it?"

People have been making wine in this rugged and poor corner of eastern Georgia for millennia, a tradition that survived nationalization in the Soviet Union and the disarray of communism's collapse. But another storm has blown over the mountains from Russia and into Kakheti, Georgia's storied winemaking district.

Earlier this year, Russian health officials banned the import and sale of all wine from Georgia, citing impurities. It was a body blow to Georgia's second-largest export industry, which sold nearly 80 percent of its wine to Russia.

Georgians read the ban as political retribution for the country's increasingly strained relations with the Kremlin, which reached a new pitch of animosity following the detention of four Russian military officers, who were stationed in Georgia, on spying charges. The two countries have been at odds since Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili came to power in early 2004 and immediately adopted pro-Western policies that included a desire to join the NATO military alliance.

"This year the front line in the economic war is here in the vineyards of Kakheti," Saakashvili said in a meeting with ministers in early September.

The impact of the wine ban was immediate -- from the fields where the vines burrow deep into the parched earth to wineries that have invested millions of dollars in new equipment in recent years. Georgia's annual production has plummeted from nearly 50 million bottles in 2005 to a projected 20 million bottles this year, according to Georgian vintners, wiping out jobs and investments.

In 2005, for instance, the Telavi Wine Cellar sold nearly 2.5 million bottles of wine in Russia, about 70 percent of the winery's entire output. This year, with the Russian market lost, Ramazashvili projects that he will sell only 1.7 million bottles. "It hurts," said Ramazashvili, "and breaking into new markets is a time-consuming and costly process."

"You can't get a decent price for the grapes now," said Keto Boglotsishrili, 70, as she and her family harvested Rkatsiteli, a Georgian variety whose seeds were discovered here in clay jugs dating to 3000 B.C. Prices for the white grapes have fallen about 30 percent since last year.

"It's almost not worth being out here," said Boglotsishrili's husband, Shota, as he bent to cut bunches of grapes on a warm fall afternoon.

But the Russian ban could also help diversify an industry that had become too reliant on one market and paid too little attention to the quality of the wine it was producing.

DOJ_NMG_0074712

"It will take a certain amount of time to recover from this slump, maybe some years, but this can be a blessing in disguise," said Zurab Chkhaidze, co-owner of the Askaneli Brothers winery. "We will have to find new markets and make new and better products."

Officials in Moscow said they acted because Georgian wine, as well as wine from Moldova, was laced with pesticides and other impurities. Russia also banned Georgian mineral water and agricultural produce and this week cut off all transportation links between the two countries.

More than 600,000 gallons of wine already in the country were destroyed, and vintners such as Chkhaidze, who had 40,000 bottles inside Russia at the time of the ban, lost hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The Georgian restaurants that dot Moscow were suddenly forced to serve wine from Western Europe and the Americas. "It's not a substitute at all," said Gocha Markelia, manager of Alaverdy restaurant in Moscow. "We grew up -- and I mean both Russians and Georgians -- drinking Georgian wine, and Chilean or French wines are very alien to us. Our clients don't like those wines and don't want them, but there's nothing we can do."

Vintners here agree that some of the wine sold as "Georgian" in Russia was impure. But they stress that it wasn't actually Georgian and that most of it was counterfeited in Russia.

Last year, 150 million bottles of "Georgian" wine, much of it plonk, was sold on the Russian market, although Georgia produced only 50 million bottles in 2005. Cheap Moldovan, Romanian, Hungarian and Bulgarian wine was relabeled as Georgian and sold in Russia, where Georgia's wines, particularly semisweet and semi-dry varieties, have been beloved since the armies of the czar swept in here in the 18th century.

"The Russian market was very easy -- too easy. You could sell anything," said George Margvelashvili, the president of Tbilvino, a winery based on the edge of Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, that produces some of the country's finer vintages. "This crisis is forcing new ideas into the industry -- how to produce better and better wine and how to market it."

Margvelashvili's company and other vintners are now attempting to break into new markets from China to the United States, where he is currently negotiating with wine brokers. But he said it will be at least three more years before his factory is back to 2005 levels of production. Last year, he sold 1.5 million bottles, with 650,000 going to Russia.

"This year we'll be very, very lucky if we sell 800,000 bottles," said Margvelashvili, who has had to lay off 40 of the 125 people who worked at the winery. "Last year we bought 2,600 tons of grapes at harvest time. This year nothing, because we have enough stock to carry us."

To absorb this year's harvest, grapes are being diverted into the manufacture of juices and pure spirit, and Georgian companies have been buying some of the harvest, describing their purchases as a public service. The army is also buying grapes to feed its soldiers.

The Georgian government is also enforcing a quality-control system to root out the persistent problem of counterfeiting. Saakashvili complained at his meeting with ministers that he recently ordered a glass of Mukuzani at a Georgian restaurant in Krakow, Poland, but it bore no relation to the dry, deep red made from grapes grown in Kakheti.

"I tried the wine and it would have been better if I hadn't," said Saakashvili. "It was water with alcohol and dye."

The government has also begun advertising Georgian wine in countries such as Ukraine, where sales are soaring, and officials acknowledge that the standoff with Russia has drawn worldwide attention to the vineyards here.

"Russia has provided us with a lot of free publicity because of its actions," said Mikheil Svimonishvili, the Georgian agriculture minister, who is spending the harvest season from mid-September to mid-October in Kakheti. "We're coping, and I believe this is going to have a positive impact."

In Graft Inquiry, Chinese See A Shake-Up Coming (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 3 — When Shanghai's party boss was detained in an anticorruption probe last week, Chinese were rattled by news of the first purge of a high-ranking Communist Party leader since 1995. But the investigation's scope and its ultimate goals are wider, as the party's two most powerful officials aim to shake up the leadership and wipe out resistance to their policy agenda, party officials and analysts say.

DOJ_NMG_0074713

The investigation, the largest of its kind since China first pursued market-style changes to its economy more than a quarter-century ago, was planned and supervised by Zeng Qinghong, China's vice president and the day-to-day manager of Communist Party affairs, people informed about the operation said.

They said Mr. Zeng had used the investigation to force provincial leaders to heed Beijing's economic directives, sideline officials loyal to the former top leader, Jiang Zemin, and strengthen Mr. Zeng's own hand as well as that of his current master, President Hu Jintao.

Aside from frightening officials who have grown accustomed to increasingly conspicuous corruption in recent years, the crackdown could give Mr. Hu greater leeway to carry out his agenda for broader welfare benefits and stronger pollution controls, which may prove popular in China today.

Some critics fear that it may also consolidate greater power in the hands of a leader who has consistently sought to restrict the news media, censor the Web and punish peaceful political dissent.

The high-level purge began on Sept. 25, when Chen Liangyu, the Shanghai party leader and a Politburo member, was removed from his office on corruption charges. Party security forces had already detained high-ranking officials in Shanghai, Beijing, Tianjin, Fujian and Hunan. Mr. Chen is the most powerful person removed from office since 1995, when the Beijing party leader was purged, also on corruption charges, during a power struggle.

Several party officials and well-informed political observers said they believed that the investigation had not yet reached its climax. They say Mr. Zeng hopes to dismiss two fellow members of the Politburo Standing Committee, Jia Qinglin and Huang Ju, who are under pressure to take "political responsibility" for corruption that has occurred in Beijing and Shanghai, their respective areas of influence.

If he succeeds in removing officials who serve on the nine-member Standing Committee, the party's top leadership, the purge will amount to the biggest political shake-up since 1989, when Deng Xiaoping ousted Zhao Ziyang, then the party's general secretary, after the crackdown on democracy protests in Beijing.

It would also be likely to seal Mr. Zeng's reputation as China's political mastermind, who mixes personal ambition with a nearly legendary ability to deliver results for his superiors. Officially ranked No. 5 in the party hierarchy, he is widely seen as exercising more authority within the party than anyone except Mr. Hu.

Chinese politicking takes place under a heavy veil of secrecy, and speculation about what happens in Zhongnanhai, the Chinese leadership compound, has been intense since Mr. Chen's detention last week.

It is rarely possible to get authoritative confirmation of political maneuvers in China. The people who discussed the situation with a foreign reporter did so on condition of anonymity, citing fears of retribution.

The course of the anticorruption campaign may shift if central leaders face a strong backlash at the party's annual Central Committee meeting, which will be held Oct. 8-11. One well-placed political observer said he doubted that Mr. Huang or Mr. Jia would be forced from office before their expected retirement next year.

Even so, the weakened position of the two men and their patron, Mr. Jiang, whom Mr. Hu and Mr. Zeng pushed from his last post in 2004, could have a significant impact on Chinese policy and leadership decisions.

Mr. Jiang's old loyalists, often referred to as the Shanghai faction, tended to favor fast economic growth, a relatively high degree of provincial autonomy in economic affairs, loose controls on investment and bank lending and close ties between the party and the country's rising class of private businessmen.

Mr. Hu, 63, and Mr. Zeng, 67, have at least for now forged an alliance that dominates party leadership, party officials say. They advocate slower and more stable growth, greater attention to social inequality and pollution, and an expansion of state support for education, medical care and social security.

Most of the officials singled out so far in the anticorruption sweep are seen as closer to Mr. Jiang and as having ignored central directives to tamp down state-led investment. That, party officials say, shows that the continuing legal investigation serves as a cover for a political campaign to change the party's policy direction.

DOJ_NMG_0074714

Mr. Zeng plans to use the Central Committee meeting to elevate Mr. Hu's political slogan, "harmonious society," into an official "theory."

The catch phrase covers a range of policies intended to restore a balance between the country's thriving market economy and its neglected socialist ideology, primarily by paying greater attention to peasants and migrant workers who have benefited much less than the white-collar elite in China's long economic boom.

At the meeting, party leaders will discuss "the theory of building a harmonious socialist society," party officials said. In effect, Mr. Zeng is promoting Mr. Hu's concept into doctrine, to be taught alongside the theories of Mao, Deng and Mr. Jiang.

People informed about Mr. Zeng's planning described that step and others as part of a carefully calculated series of political moves that began last spring.

They said Mr. Zeng had instructed the inspectors responsible for enforcing party discipline to investigate activities in the political strongholds of Beijing, Shanghai and Tianjin, where he suspected that senior party officials were allowing rampant profiteering by relatives and friends, and where the leaders owed their positions mainly to Mr. Jiang.

Those urban enclaves, whose leaders enjoy considerable autonomy, had also defied repeated efforts by Mr. Hu and Wen Jiabao, the prime minister, to rein in bank lending in overheated sectors like real estate.

Anticipating that Mr. Jiang might seek to protect his allies, Mr. Zeng first moved to mollify him by rolling out a tribute: the publication of his collected works. Party units nationwide were instructed to purchase and study the three-volume collection of speeches and essays, a financial and political windfall.

The crackdown initially focused on lower-level officials in the big cities. When investigators gathered evidence to implicate Mr. Chen, the Shanghai party boss, Mr. Zeng summoned him to Beijing, presented him with the pending indictment and pressed him to resign, these people said. He was said to have refused.

Faced with the prospect of a hostile purge, the first of its kind affecting a Politburo member since 1995, Mr. Zeng and Mr. Hu sent Mr. Chen's file to Mr. Jiang, asking for his advice, a person close to Mr. Zeng's office said.

Confronted with evidence of high-level corruption in Shanghai, Mr. Jiang approved removing Mr. Chen, the people said.

Armed with that victory, Mr. Zeng has pushed to create a new standard of "political responsibility," modeled after a code seen by him to prevail in American politics, which holds senior leaders responsible if their underlings disgrace the party, people informed about his thinking said.

That new standard could be used against Mr. Huang, a former Shanghai party boss and a Jiang loyalist, and Mr. Jia, who supervised Beijing.

"The old standard for senior party members was legal guilt," said one person who spoke about Mr. Zeng's thinking. "Under the new standard you could lose your post for mismanagement even if they can't prove you put one cent in your own pocket."

Others raised doubts that the purge would reach people that high up the hierarchy. The ruling party risks undermining its own authority if it acknowledges that corruption extends into the most elite ruling circle, they said.

More generally, Mr. Zeng's prominent role has raised questions about his influence relative to Mr. Hu's, party officials said.

Mr. Hu holds the posts of party general secretary, head of the military and president of China, the country's three most important. Mr. Zeng, though he runs the party's main coordinating office, is outranked in its official hierarchy not only by Mr. Hu but also by three other Standing Committee members.

Moreover, until Mr. Hu and Mr. Zeng unexpectedly joined forces in 2004 to push Mr. Jiang into full retirement, Mr. Zeng was seen as close to Mr. Jiang. The two worked side by side since they served in Shanghai together in the 1980's.

But Mr. Zeng's campaign to remove some Jiang loyalists may end up strengthening his own hand as well as Mr. Hu's, some party officials suggested. The reason is that Mr. Zeng has become the standard-bearer for a wide array of political interests.

The son of one of Mao's first security chiefs, Mr. Zeng maintains close ties to the sons and daughters of Communist China's founding fathers and has relatives in the military. He has supporters among those who favor deeper capitalist-style changes to the economy and financial system.

Some Chinese intellectuals say he has signaled an openness to political change. Mr. Hu, in contrast, is viewed as cautious and doctrinaire.

DOJ_NMG_0074715

Mr. Hu has sought to promote officials he trusts from his days as a provincial official in western China and as the head of the national Communist Youth League in the 1980's. Though he now has broad authority, his traditional base is considered narrower and less influential than that of Mr. Zeng.

The political dance between the men underlines uncertainties about the political succession scheduled to take place in 2007. At that time the party will hold a congress, as it does every five years, to approve a new lineup of officials for the Politburo as well as other top party, government and provincial positions.

Party officials say that while Mr. Hu and Mr. Zeng have worked together to consolidate their own power, they have not agreed on choices for the Standing Committee or some top provincial posts. That suggests that their alliance possibly temporary and that the country's politics could remain volatile.

"I think that at this point neither of them has the power to dictate the future," one party official said. "They need each other, but that does not mean they trust each other."

Lucrative Return Israeli Investors Find Opportunity In Romanian Roots (WSJ)

By Joel Millman

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

BUCHAREST -- In 1993, Moshe Arbel returned to Romania, 45 years after he arrived in Israel with thousands of other children orphaned by the Holocaust. He found his mother's grave, hired caretakers to maintain it for $12 a month, and spotted something else -- opportunity.

Romania was a country stirring to life economically after the fall of communism, he told his employer, Givat Haim, a kibbutz that makes Prigat-brand fruit juice. "I said, 'Back me and I'll make money in Romania.' They said, 'Romania? There's more money in Netanya [a nearby town] than in all of Romania.' Meshuga -- crazy -- they called me," Mr. Arbel recalls.

With a $175,000 loan from the kibbutz, the 63-year-old marketing specialist began bottling Prigat fruit juices in Romania, turning the brand into the country's top seller. This summer, he sold the Romanian unit for about $7 million to PepsiAmericas, a Minneapolis-based bottler.

In a historical twist, the children of the Romanian Holocaust are playing a leading role in modernizing the land of their parents' tragedy. Israeli expatriates have started local businesses in agriculture, retailing, real estate and heavy construction. Branch offices of firms based in Tel Aviv and Haifa handle everything from hotel management to insurance to car leasing. Many of the office parks and shopping malls rising in Bucharest's suburbs are being financed by Israeli hedge funds, while Israeli engineering firms are managing European Union road and water projects in the countryside.

The Israeli presence is so large that Bucharest hotel lobbies and restaurants buzz with Hebrew speakers. On Thursday nights, the two-hour flights between Bucharest and Tel Aviv are packed with Israeli business commuters heading home for family weekends -- and Israeli gamblers bound for Bucharest's casinos, four of which are operated by Israeli entrepreneurs. Israeli licensees in Romania market Kodak film, Pepsi and Cadbury Schweppes soft drinks and Tuborg beer.

Businessmen here estimate that Israelis have invested as much as $2 billion in Romania over the past 15 years, a huge sum given Israel's population of six million. Much of the investment has been routed through third countries, mainly in Western Europe, to take advantage of tax deals. Counting such indirect investment, Romania ranks with the U.S., China, India and Western Europe as a top destination for Israeli capital, says the nation's commercial attaché in Bucharest.

For Israel, whose trade with its Arab neighbors is limited, Romania represents a growth market. Apart from catering to a Romanian market of 22 million, Israeli firms located here can take advantage of regional trade pacts to export duty-free throughout Europe. Starting Jan. 1, when Romania joins the EU, the estimated 30,000 Israelis who also have Romanian citizenship will gain EU citizenship and ultimately be able to work, study and travel freely across Europe.

As a result, thousands more Israelis are queueing up for joint citizenship. "We call them 'born-again Romanians,' " jokes Michael Faint, an animal-feed merchant from the United Kingdom based in Bucharest.

Romania benefits, too, from the Israeli connection. Israelis provide money and technical expertise to a nation that must build its economy to EU standards. Israeli agricultural companies play an especially large role in revamping Romania's farm sector, which was set back by Communist-era mismanagement. "Israeli companies are helping to make a modern Romania," says Jose Iacobescu of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, who says that Israeli firms employ between 150,000 and 200,000 Romanians.

DOJ_NMG_0074716

Tangled History

Israel and Romania have a tangled history. During World War II, Romania was ruled for two years by the fascist Iron Guard, but was one of the few Axis supporters never occupied by German troops. Due to shifting borders, 200,000 Romanian Jews were living in Soviet territory when Hitler's forces invaded, and many died.

Yet 350,000 Romanian Jews survived. Most migrated to Israel, where they so dominated their new society that much of what is considered traditionally Israeli has Romanian origins, including Israel's national folk dance, the hora. Under the Communist regime of Nicolae Ceausescu, Romania was the one Soviet-bloc nation that never broke ties with Israel. The two states even collaborated on intelligence matters.

However, lingering anti-Semitism still makes Romania a tricky place for Jews to do business. Last December, an ultranationalist group, Dacia Nemuritoare ("Immortal Dacia," Romania's Bronze Age name), listed the country's top Jewish entrepreneurs and the law firms and banks they work with. A weekly publication of a right-wing minority party, Greater Romania, published a column last year that claimed that Jews with dual citizenship were planning a stealth "depopulation" of the country by dismantling the public-health system and forcing natives to emigrate for work.

Worried about being targets of prejudice, some religious Israelis doff their yarmulkes upon arrival in Bucharest. Many companies register offshore, which obscures their Israeli roots. Strauss International Ltd., a well-known Israeli chocolate maker, sells Romania's leading brand of roasted coffee, called Elite. Its Romanian operation is part of its Amsterdam-registered subsidiary. "Romanians are completely unaware of the Jewish origin" of these brands, says Stefan Liute, a Romanian who works for Grapefruit, a Bucharest brand consultant.

Indeed, Prigat researchers discovered that many Romanians think the brand name, which means "fruit of the wine press" in Hebrew, dates to Romania's pre-Communist era. But Mr. Arbel, the company's head, says account representatives faced resistance from some Lebanese and Syrian restaurateurs who have flocked to Bucharest.

Romanian-born Israelis began returning in great numbers around 1990. The post-Communist government published lists of about 9,000 properties, including hundreds of factories and hotels, that were seized either by Nazi sympathizers after 1940 or by Communists after 1948. Israelis filed claims for lost holdings, as did ethnic Hungarians, Germans and other groups. So far, more than 200,000 claims have been made, and about 80,000 have been adjudicated. Romania doesn't categorize them by ethnicity.

Successful claimants often flipped Bucharest properties to Israeli developers, who spruced them up for sale to Austrian, German, Greek and Italian businessmen entering the country. Israelis with dual citizenship were also buyers, benefiting from a government policy that encouraged sales to Romanians living abroad, says Jacob Fonea, a dentist from Haifa who today heads the Romanian-Israeli Chamber of Commerce.

Dr. Fonea, who was born in Iasí near the Soviet border, was unable to regain factories once owned by his family. But he remained in Romania and founded the AIE Group, which bought a former state-owned woolens weaver and a bankrupt tableware company, among other firms, and now exports a variety of goods to Europe. He says AIE has annual sales of around $100 million and employs some 7,000 Romanians.

Israelis of Romanian descent created a web of businesses. When Prigat needed a juice bottler, it turned to Amraz Ltd., Israel's largest producer of plastic containers, which set up a local factory. Now Amraz is exporting plastic bottles into Croatia and France.

Similarly, Israeli architects work for Israeli developers who hire Israeli construction firms across the country. Israeli hedge funds are buying farmland to be managed by Israeli agronomists who tap Israeli kibbutz members to run farms. Romanian authorities say there are about 3,500 companies registered in Israel that do business here. There are another 2,000 Romanian businesses owned by Israelis but registered in third countries, according to diplomats and businessmen.

These close commercial ties date back to the collapse of the Ceausescu regime. Israeli contractors reconditioned Soviet-supplied MiG fighters for Romania's air force and later, with U.S. permission, sold surplus U.S. F-16s to Romania.

DOJ_NMG_0074717

At the same time, many Romanians headed to Israel for jobs when their country plummeted into recession during the 1990s, and Palestinian unrest prompted Israel to rely less on Arab laborers and recruit guest workers abroad. Eventually about 200,000 Romanians joined Thais, Chinese and Filipinos working in Israel. Bucharest now bustles with Hebrew-speaking cab drivers who bought their vehicles with cash earned in Israel. Hebrew-speaking Romanians became a ready work force for returning Jews.

With Romania's economy growing at 5.6% a year over the past five years -- twice as fast as Israel's -- the country has become a magnet for ambitious young Israelis who feel stifled at home. "Our country is saturated," complains Moran Morgenshtern, a 32-year-old veterinarian who worked this summer breeding heifers in Romania. "If I ever want to run my own farm, I'll probably do it here."

Ms. Morgenshtern's employer, Tnuva Central Cooperative for the Marketing of Agricultural Produce in Israel Ltd., is Israel's largest food concern. Founded as a dairy cooperative in 1926, Tnuva today has a 70% share of the Israeli market and now looks abroad to expand. Romania has a special lure: Once it joins the EU, it will get immediate access to the huge European dairy market, which Israel has had little luck in cracking, so long as Romanian producers can meet EU sanitary and food-safety standards.

Tnuva says it can meet those standards and help Romanian farms do the same. It also cautions Romanian farmers that if they can't boost their agricultural productivity, they will be swamped with cheaper agricultural imports from more efficient farms in Western Europe. "I warn the Romanian people, 'Follow me or else you will end up slaves of the West,' " says Yoram Israeli, a 55-year-old, former kibbutz member who runs Tnuva Romania, and who is jokingly called "Moses" around his Bucharest office.

Two-Stage Strategy

Mr. Israeli has a two-stage strategy. First, Tnuva is building a yogurt-processing plant in Romania to make and sell Yoplait yogurt with milk produced locally. (Tnuva already licenses and sells Yoplait, a French brand, in Israel.) Afterward, Tnuva hopes to sell Romanian dairy products throughout Europe.

This year, Tnuva bought its first Romanian farm, a former Communist collective near the village of Adunatti Copăceni, and imported a herd of 1,200 dairy cows from Germany. A few weeks before the first cows arrived, workers, many Romanian gypsies, restored concrete barns that had been stripped of metal fixtures, including roofs, by local scavengers. Israelis cleaned the site thoroughly after inspectors discovered leucosis bacteria in pools of stagnant water. That could have infected dairy cows and disqualified their milk for sale.

The Israelis sought local dairymen who can meet EU standards. Next, Tnuva hopes to persuade co-op members to advise local farmers, invest in Romanian dairies and share technical know-how. "It's like playing matchmaker," says Rafi Shaul, the Tnuva executive in charge of hunting for local partners.

Mr. Shaul, a chain-smoker with a thinning gray ponytail, works with Costel Caras, a 48-year-old Bucharest native who began farming in 1994. Mr. Caras turns to Mr. Shaul for advice on everything from how to mix feed to how to qualify for EU farm aid.

Tramping through an overgrown pasture in July, Mr. Shaul praised Mr. Caras's placement of a concrete corral and the cleanliness of his herd's stalls. He winced at the sight of Mr. Caras's creaking water pump. "Some of these farms," Mr. Shaul muttered, "look like Israel 50 years ago."

Later, over a lunch of Romanian cheese and eggplant snacks, Mr. Caras complained that a wholesaler twice neglected to make pickups at his farm, forcing him to dump his product. If that keeps happening, he'll go broke.

Tnuva competes here from France's Groupe Danone SA and the Netherlands' Friesland Foods. Mr. Shaul said he suspects brokers may be punishing Mr. Caras for working with Tnuva. Mr. Shaul advised the farmer to be careful.

"Don't worry about me. I am a free man," the Romanian said. "We need Tnuva. We don't want just one buyer here."

An African Dumping Ground (NYT)

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074718

Globalization brings wealth and opportunity to many people around the world. But to poor slum dwellers in the failing state of Ivory Coast, it has brought horrible sickness and death after hazardous waste, shipped nearly halfway around the world, was stealthily dumped in backyards around Abidjan. This need not and should not have happened.

As reported in Monday's Times by Lydia Polgreen and Marlise Simons, the waste — a fuming mix of petrochemicals and caustic soda — that started out in the Mediterranean and ended up in Africa could have been safely disposed of earlier in its journey. But Trafigura, the Swiss trading company that leased the tanker, balked at paying European prices. Instead, 85,000 people ended up seeking medical treatment, and at least eight have died.

The details and legal responsibilities are still being sorted out. But the lesson is plain. Without strict, and strictly enforced, international rules on waste disposal, dangerous cargos will find the course of least resistance, least cost, and least regulation, scarring the lives of some of the world's poorest, worst governed and most defenseless people.

This story began in July, when a Greek-owned Panamanian-flagged tanker, leased by Trafigura, stopped in Amsterdam and attempted to unload its waste. That fell through when a Dutch company that had contracted to do the job for $15,000 found far more noxious material in the ship's hold than it had been led to believe. Completing safe disposal there would instead cost $300,000, plus perhaps as much again in delays.

That sent Trafigura looking for cheaper alternatives. But for a company that had revenues of $28 billion last year, it was not a prohibitive price — especially considering what happened. The ship moved on to several more ports, ending up in Abidjan, where Trafigura hired a local disposal company that did the nocturnal backyard dumping.

Trafigura says the Ivoirian authorities told it that the local company could do the job safely. If that is true, those officials were recklessly incompetent. In any case, a stronger system of international regulations — backed up by a threat of fines or other penalties — might have forced Trafigura to think twice about whom it was hiring.

Unless such regulations are tightened and reliably enforced, the sick and the dead in Ivory Coast will have suffered for nothing. And the whole story will soon be repeated in some other country where costs are low, rules are slack, and, as an inevitable result, human life is cheap.

DOJ_NMG_0074719

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 4, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

State Dept. Confirms Rice-Tenet Meeting (AP-Y) 5
Dems Write Letter Questioning Rice (HILL) 5
Terror Inmates' Mail Still Goes Unread (AP-Y) 6
Justice Review Of Prisons Calls For Closer Look At Inmate Communications (USAT) 6
Screening Of Mail At Federal Prisons Lags (WP) 7
Report: Security Gaps In Prison (NSDY) 8
Pa. Man Charged With Trying To Help Al-Qaida Blow Up Refineries (NSDY/AP) 8
Wilkes-Barre Man Indicted In Terror Plot (PHI) 9
U.S. Told To Show If Lawyers' Talks With Suspects Tracked (LAW) 10
Justice Department Ordered To Discuss Eavesdropping On Muslims (NYS) 11
Closing Arguments In Trial Of 2 Mosque Members (NSDY/AP) . 11
Trial Of Suspects Caught In Terror Sting Goes To Jury (LAW) .. 12
Pentagon: No Terror Trials Imminent (AP-Y) 13
German Lawmakers Fault Abduction Probe (WP) 14

Patriot Act:

Judge: Patriot Act Challenge Can Proceed (AP) 15
Detroit Judge Says Patriot Act Suit Can Proceed (FREEP) 16
Detroit Judge Allows Patriot Act Lawsuit To Go Forward (DEN). 16

Homeland Response:

Homeland Security Official Resigning (NYT) 17
Law Sought On Explosive Fertilizer (USAT) 17
Extensive Tests Led To New Carry-On Rules, Officials Say (NYT) 18
Detectors Hunt Anthrax 5 Years After Deadly Attack (WT/AP) ... 19

War News:

He Didn't Take The Easy Way (USAT) 20
Denial, Arrogance Led U.S. Into Iraq Trap (USAT) 20
How To Lose A War (WP) 21
If I Had One Wish (NYT) 22
Don't Pass The Salted Peanuts, Henry (NYT) 23
8 G.I.'s Die In Baghdad, Most In A Day Since '05 (NYT) 24
Violence In Iraq Leaves At Least 51 Dead (AP-Y) 24
Termination Set For Iraq Monitor (WT) 26
In Bill's Fine Print, Millions To Celebrate Victory (NYT) 26
Judges Postpone Verdict In Saddam Trial (AP) 27
Judges Postpone Saddam Verdict To Review Evidence (USAT/AP) 28
'Disguise The Fee' (WSJ) 29
Frist Draws Criticism For Comments On Taliban (WP/AP) 29
Democrats Assail Frist's Afghan Comments (AP) 30
Frist Aims To Steer Farmers Away From Taliban (WT) 30
Software Being Developed To Monitor Opinions Of U.S. (NYT) . 31

DOJ:

ICF's Caliber Wins $45M Department Of Justice Contract (WASHBIZ) 32

Corporate Scandals:

HP Security Pro Vowed To Delete Records (FINDLAW/AP) 33
Ousted HP Chairwoman To Begin Chemotherapy For Ovarian Cancer (AP) 34
Shaw Group Reviews Stock-Option Awards (AP-YBIZ) 34
Ex-Comverse CEO Granted Bail In Namibia (FINDLAW/AP) 35
Convicted Tyco Executives Seek Reversals From Appellate Court (WSJ) 36
Why C.E.O.'s Aren't Sitting In The Dugout (NYT) 36

Criminal Law:

Bush Organizing School Violence Summit (AP-Y) 38
Ed. Dept.: School Shootings Defy Answers (AP-Y) 38
Slayings Spur Review Of Security At Schools (WT) 39
Schools Increase Vigilance As They React To Recent Shootings (ABC) 40
Del. Revisits Security After School Incidents (WlmngtnNJ DE)... 41
A Pattern In Rural School Shootings: Girls As Targets (CSM).... 43
Toxic Mix Of Emotions Boiled Within Devoted Dad, Husband (USAT) 44
Death Toll In Attack At Amish School Rises To 5 (WP) 46
School Gunman Revealed Torment (WT/AP) 48
Police Describe Gunman's Plan In School Siege (NYT) 49
Molestation Possible Motive In Amish Shooting (LAT) 50
Police: Gunman At Amish School Told Wife He Molested 2 Little Girls Years 20 Years Ago (FINDLAW/AP) 52
Fifth Amish School Girl Dies; Killer Hints At Motive (Update3) (BLOOM) 54
Strong Faith And Community May Help Amish Cope With Loss (NYT) 55
Attacks Show 'threats … Can Come From Anywhere' (USAT)... 56

On CBS, Columbine Dad Blames Violence On Secularism (WP)56
When Evil Disrupts Tradition (LAT)..... 57
FBI Planning To Widen Its Investigation (SCRIPPS) 58
Gonzales: FBI Delving Into Foley's 'deeply Disturbing' E-mails (AP)..... 58
Foley Lawyer Cites Alcohol, Childhood Abuse (WP)..... 58
FBI's Foley Case Eyes Legal 'Gray Area' (NSDY/AP) 60
Foley Tells Of Being Abused (SPTIMES)..... 61
Foley Was Molested As Child, Lawyer Says (USAT)..... 61
Foley Says He Was Abused By A Clergyman (AP-Y)..... 62
Foley Was Sexually Abused As A Youth, His Lawyer Says (NYT) 63
Attorney: Foley Was Molested As Teen By Clergyman (PALMBEACHP)..... 64
Foley Acquaintances Question Alcoholism (AP-Y)..... 65
New Foley Instant Messages; Had Internet Sex While Awaiting House Vote (ABC) 65
Aide At Center Of The Controversy (LAT)..... 66
Some Say They Felt Uneasy About Representative's Attention (WP)..... 67
Get Congress Out Of The Page Business (NYT)..... 68
Those IMs Aren't As Private As You Think (WSJ)..... 70
Revelations That Cheney's Ex-Aide Wasn't Original Source Of Leak May Hinder Prosecution (WSJ) 71
Feds Will Seek Death In Abduction Case (AP) 72
Alaska Probe Turns From Oil To Fish (SEATIMES) 73
Former Court Clerk Gets Probation For Leak In Newton Case (NSDY)..... 74
Mo. Couple Charged With Another Murder (BVND)..... 75
Congress Deals Poker Fans A Hand They Can't Bet (LVS) 75
Picayune Woman Pleads Guilty To Fraudulent Katrina Claims (AP)..... 76
Money-launderer Gets 10 Years In Prison (PHDN)..... 76
Mobster's Chronic Use Of Cocaine Blamed For Illnesses (PROJO) 77
Prosecutors Argue Against Galante Return To His Businesses (AP)..... 78
Karr Computer Files Reviewed By FBI (FINDLAW/AP) 79
Defense: Evidence Withheld In Karr Case (STPPP)..... 79
US Attorney: Parents Need Computer Savvy To Protect Kids From Perverts (MRT)..... 80
Civic Activist Faces Federal Death-penalty Trial In D.C. (WT).... 80
Killer's Archive Yields More Photos (LAT) 82

Civil Law:

Tobacco Companies' Request Denied (NYT/AP)..... 82
U.S. To Stop Seizing Canadian Medicine (WSJ) 82
U.S. Drops Program To Halt Discount Drugs From Canada (LAT) 83
Memorial Focuses On Religious Freedom (RGJ)..... 84
Wiccans Seek Place In Military Graveyards (ADA)..... 85

Civil Rights:

Gonzales: More Money Going To Fight Human Trafficking (AP) 85
US Boosts Efforts Against Human Trafficking (AFP-Y)..... 85
Utah Getting Money To Fight Forced Labor (KUTV)..... 86
SLC Awarded Crime Funding (SLT)..... 87
La. Gets Grant To Halt Migrant Abuse (NOTP)..... 87
City Wins Grant On Human Trafficking (SPT)..... 88
Grand Jury Indicts 42 In Multistate Drug Network (FWCOM/AP) 89
Feds Indict 42, Arrest 38 - Many Locally (WIFE-TV)..... 89
Feds Allege Father Helped Son In Marijuana Dealings (MUNCSP)..... 89
Jury Selection Begins In Retrial In Smuggling Deaths Case (FINDLAW/AP) 90
Prison Official Accused In Sex Case (HC)..... 90
Man Sues Secret Service Agent Over Arrest After Approaching Cheney And Denouncing War (NYT) 91
Another Of Jewish Group's Buses Vandalized (WP)..... 92
Plan Outlined To Save King/Drew (LAT) 92
South-Central L.A. Hospital In Critical Condition (WP)..... 93
Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Sidley Austin Case (LAW) 94

Antitrust:

Judge Denies Motion To Dismiss DOJ Lawsuit Against NAR (INMAN)..... 94
FTC Approves Lockheed-Boeing Rocket Deal (AP)..... 95
FTC Approves Lockheed-Boeing Rocket Launch Venture (MRKTWTCH) 96
Critics Say Smithfield Merger Would Unfairly Fatten Pork Producer (DEAL) 97
Wright Bill May Take Effect Quickly (DMN) 97
Court Blocks Injunction On U.S. Sales Of EchoStar DVRs (WSJ)98
Intel Could Face EU Antitrust Case (WSJ)..... 98
Europe Is Said To Be Close To Pressing Intel Case (NYT)..... 99
Wisconsin Stem-Cell Patents To Be Reviewed (WSJ/AP)..... 99
Media Ownership Rules Reviewed, And Tense Fight Is Likely Brewing (WSJ)..... 100
Security Software Makers Upset Over Windows Vista (NYT)... 101

Environment:

Hastert Way Ahead Of The Story (WP)..... 102
Long Beach Closes Beaches (LAT)..... 103
Letters (WSJ) 103
Martha Euthanized After Injury (WP) 104
Washington Wire (WSJ)..... 105
Sigourney Weaver Seeks Ban To Destructive Fishing Practice (FINDLAW/AP) 108
A Better Diesel (NYT)..... 108

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Agents Arrest 15 In Raids On Major Marijuana Club (SFC)108
Feds Launch Crackdown Against Area Pot Dispensaries (BCNS)..... 109
Computers, Boxes Labeled `MJ' Seized In S.F. Pot Clinic Raid (BCNS)..... 110
15 Arrested In Bay Area Pot Club Raids (AP) 110
Feds Raid Med Pot Club In S.F. Mission, Elsewhere (KPIX-TV)111
Feds Raid Medical Cannabis Dispensary In SF (KCBS)..... 112
Reason Behind Record Pot Seizures A Mystery (KPIX) 112
Chargers' Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Felony Drug Charges (KGTV)..... 112

DOJ_NMG_0074721

Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges (SDUT) 113
Kiel Back With Team; Drug Hearing Today (SDUT)..... 114
Chargers Safety Terrence Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges (AP) 114
Bonds' Trainer Wants To Withdraw Plea (AP)..... 114
Latinos Debate Forming Regional Force (AP)..... 115

Immigration:

Justices Hear Case On Immigrant Drug Offenders (WP)..... 116
Justices Ponder Conditions For Automatic Deportation (NYT) . 117
Justices Open Term, Hear Case About Drugs, Deportation (USAT) 118
Scalia's Tequila Remark Launches New Term (CNN) 118
Scalia's 'Tequila' Remark Raises Eyebrows During Immigrants' Rights Argument (LAW)..... 119
Border Security, Job Market Leave Farms Short Of Workers (WP)..... 120

Congress-Administration:

Disaffected Republicans May Sit Out Vote Following Foley Scandal (AFP-Y)..... 121
Foley Scandal Is The Nail In The GOP Coffin (HILL) 122
GOP Faces 'Inconvenient Truth' (CHIT) 123
Hastert Faces Intense Pressure As Foley Mess Roils Republicans (WSJ) 124
Foley Case Shakes GOP (LAT)..... 127
Bush In Favor Of Foley Investigation (AP-Y)..... 129
Hastert Fights To Save His Job In Page Scandal (NYT)..... 130
Bush Backs Hastert's Handling Of Sex Scandal (FT) 131
Bush Backs Hastert To Keep Job (WT)..... 132
Hastert Says He's Not Going To Quit (USAT) 133
Gingrich Says Hastert Shouldn't Resign Over Handling Of Page Scandal (AP)..... 133
Hastert Rival Sees Surge In Support (WT)..... 134
Hastert Rejects Calls To Give Up Leadership (WP)..... 135
A Few Conservative Voices Still Speak For The Speaker (WP) 136
Dems Sit Back And Watch The Republican Meltdown (HILL)... 137
Unlucky GOP Candidate Depends On Votes For Foley (HILL) 138
Page Scandal Complicates Race For 'Mr. Clout' (WP) 139
Reynolds Deflects Questions About Top Aide's Role In Foley Storm (AP) 140
Congressman Reynolds Facing Tough Questions On Foley (WIVB-TV)..... 141
Ex-Pages Brought Explicit Messages To Light (WSJ)..... 141
Woulda. Coulda. Shoulda? (NYT) 142
Accountability In The House (WP)..... 143
When The House Could Clean Itself (WP) 143
Dumping Denny Won't Do It (WP) 144
Alito: Threat To Judicial Independence At Historic High (LAW) 145
'Neither Force Nor Will, But Merely Judgment' (WSJ)..... 146
In Wake Of Changes, Seniors Urged To Revisit Medicare Drug Plans (USAT)..... 147
Officials Scale Back Rx-benefit Outreach (HILL)..... 148
Markets And Medicare (WSJ)..... 149
Education Dept. Urged To Recoup $278 Million In Loan Subsidies (NYT)..... 150
Democrats Renew Efforts To Block Lawmakers' Pay Raise (HILL) 151
Senators Ask For Pension Agency Probe (AP-Y) 152
Labor Board Eases Supervisor Rule (WSJ) 153
Board Redefines Rules For Union Exemption (NYT) 154
Some Workers Change Collars (WP)..... 155
U.S. Ruling Could Eliminate Union Eligibility For Millions (LAT) 156
NLRB Decision Angers Unions (WT)..... 157
Fate Of Post Office Overhaul Is Up For Debate (WP)..... 158
OMB Welcomes Help From Anti-Pork Bloggers (WP) 159
Bayer's Duplicity On Drug Safety (NYT)..... 160

Other News:

Dow Climbs From Depths (USAT)..... 160
Dow's New Height Not As Giddy As The Last One (LAT)..... 161
Dow Soars To Record As Oil Price Slides (FT)..... 163
Dow Jones Index Hits A New High, Retracing Losses (NYT) ... 163
Dow Industrials Close At A Record (WSJ)..... 165
The Dow's New Top (WSJ)..... 167
Oil Prices Slip Almost 4%, Go Below $60 A Barrel (USAT) 168
Crude Oil's Drop Is The Largest In More Than A Year (WSJ)... 168
Stepping Up Attacks, Bush Calls Democrats 'Softer' On Terrorists (WP)..... 169
Bush Campaigning Amid GOP Woes (AP-Y)..... 170
Bush Tells Supporters Dems Soft On Terror (USAT)..... 171
Bush Blasts Democrats' 'Softer Side' (WT) 171
U.S. Security At Stake In Upcoming Vote, Bush Says In Stockton (LAT) 172
Expensive Ad Markets Hike Campaign Costs (USAT)..... 173
In New Mexico, One Of The Nation's Hottest Races (CSM)..... 174
Schumer Sweats His Wall Street Ties To Fill War Chest (FT).. 176
Dems, Lobbyists May Expand Partnership (HILL)..... 176
Senate Candidates Sound Familiar Themes In First Debate (AP)178
Steele, Cardin Draw Distinctions (WP) 179
Steele, Cardin Wrangle Over Race In Debate (WT)..... 180
Sen. Clinton Supports Webb In Va. Campaign (WP) 181
Hillary Headlines Webb Event (WT) 182
Allen Adlifts Hopes Of Backers (WT)..... 183
Understanding George Allen's Best Black Friend (WP) 184
Inside Politics (WT) 185
Democrats' Jersey Barrier (WP) 186
Steve Poizner For Insurance Commissioner (LAT)..... 187
The Real Market For Fuel Efficiency (WSJ) 188
Civic Priorities (WT) 189
Arabs Pressure Rice On U.S. Peace Efforts (WP)..... 190
Rice, In Mideast, Meets Skeptics (LAT)..... 191
Rice Calls For Hamas To Work With Abbas (AP) 192
Blockade Of Gaza Could Be Eased By Rice Plans (FT)..... 193
Rice Urges 2 Palestinian Groups To Halt Violence (NYT) 194
Palestinian Rivals On Brink Of Civil War, Abbas Aide Says (WT)194
Hamas PM Vows To Prevent Civil War (AFP)..... 195
Fatah Militia Threatens Hamas Leaders (AP)..... 196
Palestinian Poll Shows Fatah-Hamas Close (AP) 197
Reach Out To The Red Zone (WP) 197
US And UK Warn Of Fresh Iran Sanctions Drive (FT) 198

DOJ_NMG_0074722

U.S. May Back Iran On Nuke Alliance (WT) 199
Iran's Proposal To End Nuclear Standoff Is Rejected By The West (NYT) 200
Can Rice Rally Mideast Against Iran? (CSM) 201
Diplomats: Iran Nuke Stance Hurts Talks (AP) 202
People Hold Promise For Peace (USAT) 203
The Six-Million Person Question (WSJ) 204
Rice: Nuclear Test A 'Provocative Act' (AP) 205
North Koreans Say They Plan A Nuclear Test (NYT) 206
For First Time, N. Korea Announces Plans For Nuke Test (USAT) 207
North Korea To Conduct Nuclear Test (AP-Y) 208
N. Korea Pledges Nuclear Test (WP) 209
North Korea Deepens Weapons Rift With Plans For Nuclear-Bomb Test (WSJ) 211
N. Korea Plans A Nuclear Test (LAT) 212
N. Korean Move Comes Amid Bid For Talks (WP) 213
Rice Tries To Persuade Sudan On Darfur (AP) 214
U.N. Front-runner Vows To Push Reforms (USAT/AP) 215
South Korean Homecoming At The U.N. (LAT) 215
Annan's Financial Form To Be Secret (WT) 216
Rumsfeld Stays Mum On Nicaragua Politics (AP-Y) 217
Hijacker Surrenders After Forcing Turkish Airliner To Southern Italy (WP/AP) 217
Unswayed By West, Russia Continues Georgia Blockade (WP) 218
Georgian Vineyards Hit By Russian Frost (WP) 219
In Graft Inquiry, Chinese See A Shake-Up Coming (NYT) 220
Lucrative Return Israeli Investors Find Opportunity In Romanian Roots (WSJ) 222
An African Dumping Ground (NYT) 225

DOJ_NMG_0074723

TERRORISM NEWS:

State Dept. Confirms Rice-Tenet Meeting (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 3, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice did receive a CIA briefing about terror threats just about two months before the Sept. 11 attacks, but the information was not new, her chief spokesman said.

In doing so, Sean McCormack confirmed a meeting — on July 10, 2001 — that his boss had said repeatedly she could not specifically recall. She had said earlier that there were virtually daily meetings at the time.

A new book by reporter Bob Woodward of Watergate fame describes the White House meeting as an emergency wakeup call that Rice had brushed off. Rice was President Bush's national security adviser at the time and was promoted to the top diplomatic job last year.

Although spokesmen for the State Department and the National Security Council indicated Sunday that such a meeting had taken place, Rice was still saying Monday that she was not sure about it. She said she would have remembered the sort of forceful warning the book claims was conveyed there.

"We can confirm that a meeting took place on or around July 10, 2001," McCormack said late Monday.

"The information presented in this meeting was not new, rather it was a good summary from the threat reporting from the previous several weeks," he added.

Woodward's book "State of Denial" recounts the meeting among then-CIA Director George Tenet, Rice and the CIA's top counterterror officer. The book said the session stood out in the minds of the CIA officials as the "starkest warning they had given the White House" on al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and his network.

McCormack said that after the meting, Rice had asked that the same material be given to Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and then-Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Materials from this meeting were made available to the independent Sept. 11 Commission, and Tenet was asked about the session when interviewed by the commission, McCormack said.

The meeting is not part of the commission report, but was referred to obliquely in a report by the commission's predecessor, a joint congressional panel that investigated the 9/11 attacks. That report said that "senior U.S. government officials were advised by the intelligence community on June 28 and July 10, 2001, that the attacks were expected, among other things, to 'have dramatic consequences on governments or cause major casualties' and that 'attack preparations have been made. Attack will occur with little or no warning.'"

Meanwhile, Ashcroft said Monday that he should have been notified of any such report dealing with a pending attack on the United States. "It just occurred to me how disappointing it was that they didn't come to me with this type of information," he said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"The FBI is responsible for domestic terrorism," Ashcroft said. He said both Tenet and Black should have been aware that he had pressed for a more aggressive policy in going after bin Laden and his followers in the United States and should have briefed him as well. Rice knew of this advocacy, he suggested.

According to the Sept. 11 Commission, Ashcroft was briefed on July 5, 2001, "warning that a significant terrorist attack was imminent." The report noted that the briefing addressed only threats outside the United States.

Dems Write Letter Questioning Rice (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 4, 2006

In the wake of Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward's new book on the White House's handling of the war in Iraq, 11 House Democrats wrote to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday with questions about a controversial meeting she held with two senior intelligence officials in July 2001.

Woodward's book, "State of Denial," reports that then-CIA leader George Tenet and CIA counterterrorism chief Cofer Black met with Rice on July 10, 2001, to warn her in strong terms that al Qaeda was planning an attack on U.S. facilities. Rice has since strongly denied being warned of any possible strike within the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0074724

The Democrats who signed the letter, including Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), Homeland Security Committee ranking member Bennie Thompson (Miss.) and Government Reform Committee ranking member Henry Waxman (Calif.), wrote that Rice's 2004 testimony to the 9-11 Commission "does not appear to match your statement this weekend, and we would appreciate a more specific detailing of the level of information received by your office."

Terror Inmates' Mail Still Goes Unread (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, October 3, 2006

Mail for convicted terrorists and other dangerous federal inmates isn't being fully read by prison authorities, and that is a risk to national security, a Justice Department review concluded Tuesday.

The U.S. Bureau of Prisons is supposed to translate and screen all mail to and from the highest-risk inmates — including terrorists, gang members and spies — for evidence of criminal activity. But that target was not being met consistently at 10 federal prisons and detention centers surveyed by the Justice Department's inspector general.

"The threat remains that terrorist and other high-risk inmates can use mail and verbal communications to conduct terrorist or criminal activities while incarcerated," concluded the report by Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. It urged the Bureau of Prisons to correct quickly the security gap, including putting tracking systems in place to ensure all high-risk inmate mail is read and analyzed.

A Bureau of Prisons spokesman said the agency agrees with the review's recommendations in whole or in part. But it is largely too cash-strapped to afford enough staff to sort through the thousands of letters and other pieces of mail federal prisons receive each week — what Bureau of Prisons Director Harley G. Lappin described to inspectors as searching for "a needle in a haystack."

Experts fear that a new generation of homegrown terrorists is being bred in prison and, after release, they will seek guidance from Islamic extremists still behind bars.

The Justice Department's mail investigation was spurred, in part, after three convicted terrorists at a federal maximum-security prison in Florence, Colo., were found to have written an estimated 90 letters between 2002 and 2004 to Islamic extremists — some with links to the March 11, 2004, attacks on commuter trains in Madrid. Some of the letters later surfaced in the hands of a terror suspect who used them to recruit suicide operatives.

The Madrid attacks killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,700.

Following that discovery, the Bureau of Prisons took steps to limit high-risk inmates' mail and telephone calls, the inspector general found. It also hired more Arabic translators and sought to better analyze mail.

Limited funding, in the face of a growing inmate population, has hindered those efforts, the inspector general's report concluded. About 10 percent of an estimated 191,000 federal inmates, as of July, are considered high risk. The number of high-risk inmates has grown by 60 percent over the last decade; by contrast, federal prisons' staff increased by 14 percent, from an estimated 30,200 to 34,600.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., called the findings "inexcusable."

The Bureau of Prisons "continues to be incompetent when it comes to detecting possible terrorist activity in federal prisons," said Schumer, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee that oversees the agency.

Courts have largely deferred to prison officials seeking to limit inmates' communications or other rights, said David L. Hudson Jr., an attorney with the First Amendment Center in Nashville, Tenn.

"Unfortunately, they essentially have no First Amendment rights — or very few," Hudson said.

The review examined mail monitoring systems at 10 federal prisons and detention centers: in Brooklyn and Manhattan, N.Y., and Sheridan, Ore.; two each in Florence, Colo., and Beaumont, Texas; and three in Allenwood, Pa.

The maximum-security prison in Florence, for example, houses about 400 of the most dangerous and violent inmates in the federal system. Among them are the 1993 World Trade Center bombers, convicted Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, convicted spy Robert Hanssen, and leaders of violent street gangs.

___

On the Net:

Justice Department's Office of Inspector General: http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/index.html

Justice Review Of Prisons Calls For Closer Look At Inmate Communications (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074725

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department issued a damning account of the federal prison system's failure to monitor potentially criminal communications of convicted terrorists and other inmates at some of the nation's most secure government facilities.

In a 100-page report released Tuesday, Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine found that the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) fails to adequately monitor prisoners' mail, telephone calls, visitor communications and cell-block conversations that could be part of criminal enterprises.

The bureau also lacks the staffing and expertise to translate communications conducted in foreign languages or to assess possible threats, the report found.

"The BOP incarcerates international terrorist inmates who require sophisticated monitoring and analyses of their communications and activities," the report concluded. "The BOP's monitoring procedures, intelligence analysis and foreign language capabilities have not evolved to that level."

Fine launched the investigation following news reports last year that three terrorists convicted in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and imprisoned at the government's most secure facility in Florence, Colo., wrote more than 90 letters to Islamic extremists outside the prison.

Justice investigators based their conclusions on reviews of 10 high-security institutions where many of the system's 146 convicted international terrorists are jailed and hundreds of the estimated 19,720 high-risk inmates are detained.

More than 190,000 inmates are held in the federal prison system.

The report also found that the number of high-risk inmates — including gang leaders and international and domestic terrorists — has increased by an estimated 60% in the past 10 years. During that same time period, BOP staff increased by 14%.

BOP spokesman Michael Truman described the Justice assessment as a "very candid report" and that the bureau would deal with its findings.

"The most dangerous and sophisticated inmates are housed in the most restrictive conditions allowed in order to ensure that they cannot influence others or use other inmates to send or receive messages," Truman said. "We are continually reviewing our procedures to ensure that not only are high-risk individuals housed safely and securely but that other inmates, our staff and the public are protected from them."

Screening Of Mail At Federal Prisons Lags (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Three terrorists imprisoned in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing were able to send more than 90 letters to alleged terrorists overseas because U.S. prison officials do not screen all correspondence from the most dangerous inmates as required, according to a report released yesterday.

An investigation by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine found that the U.S. Bureau of Prisons does not have enough translators or intelligence analysts to properly screen incoming and outgoing communications, including mail and telephone calls.

The report also said that the proportion of mail monitored has decreased in recent months amid tightening budgets and staff reductions, despite incidents in recent years when incarcerated terrorists were able to communicate with sympathizers overseas. One of the letters was eventually used as a recruiting tool for suicide bombers in Spain, officials said.

"We found that the BOP has not effectively monitored the mail of terrorist and other high-risk inmates," the report said. ". . . Consequently, the threat remains that terrorist and other high-risk inmates can use mail and verbal communications to conduct terrorist or criminal activities while incarcerated."

The prison bureau said in a statement issued yesterday that it agrees with Fine's recommendations for changes but that implementing improvements "will require significant additional resources, primarily staff."

"The most dangerous and sophisticated inmates are housed in the most restrictive conditions allowed in order to ensure that they cannot influence others or use other inmates to send or receive messages," the statement said.

Fine's investigation was requested by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales in early 2005, after NBC News reported that scores of letters had been sent overseas by three men convicted in the World Trade Center bombing and housed at the Administrative Maximum U.S. Penitentiary, or Admax, in Florence, Colo. The facility is home to some of the most violent and dangerous prisoners in the federal system, including terrorists, drug lords, gang leaders and others.

Fine's report said more than 90 such letters were sent by inmates Mohammed Salameh, Mahmud Abouhalima and Nidal A. Ayyad between 2002 and 2004. The recipients included Mohamed Achraf, alleged leader of a plot to blow up the National Justice Building in Madrid, and others with links to terrorists suspected in the March 11, 2004, attacks on commuter trains there.

DOJ_NMG_0074726

At least 14 letters were exchanged between the Colorado inmates and the Spanish terrorist cell, the report said, and one suspect arrested in Spain used the letters in recruitment efforts. In one letter published by an Arabic newspaper, Salameh wrote: "Osama bin Laden is my hero of this generation."

Fine's investigators found that the prisons bureau "does not have enough proficient translators to translate inmate mail written in foreign languages" and lacks sufficient staff trained to analyze communications for suspicious content. For example, the report said, staff members in Florence failed to notify the FBI about the letters to extremists in Spain because they did not understand the possible ramifications of the correspondence.

The inspector general also found that the problem has worsened: Prison officials read a smaller percentage of mail now than they did a year ago at seven out of 10 facilities surveyed by investigators. During one week in November 2005, the report said, two mailroom staffers at Florence were able to read only 1.8 percent of 2,464 pieces of incoming mail.

The BOP statement said that the bureau had already implemented many of Fine's recommendations.

In response to the report, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) blasted prison officials yesterday as "incompetent when it comes to detecting possible terrorist activity in federal prisons."

"Given past evidence of terrorists communicating with live terror cells from inside prison walls, it is inexcusable that the BOP is not monitoring high risk prisoners more closely," Schumer said in a statement.

Report: Security Gaps In Prison (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg

Newsday, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A terror suspect may be secretly wiretapped by the U.S. government. But once convicted and sent to prison, he has much less to worry about from Big Brother, according to a new Justice Department report.

Federal prison officials do not read all the letters to and from convicted terrorists -- creating a security gap with potentially lethal implications, the report by the Justice Department inspector general found. Nor do officials adequately monitor telephone conversations, cellblock talks or prison visits by family and friends, the report concluded.

"The threat remains that terrorist and other high-risk inmates can use mail and verbal communications to conduct terrorist or criminal activities while incarcerated," it said.

Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn was rated the worst of 10 federal prisons when it came to random monitoring of inmates' mail -- reading 0.3 percent of all mail in one given week last year.

The review by the inspector general comes amid growing concern about prisons incubating terrorism after last year's foiled plot to blow up synagogues and National Guard facilities in California, in a plan devised in a Sacramento prison.

Moreover, media reports last year revealed that three men convicted in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and incarcerated in a federal prison in Florence, Colo., wrote more than 90 letters to Islamic extremists from their prison cells -- including more than a dozen to men linked to the March 11, 2004, attacks on Madrid commuter trains. The Madrid attacks killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,700.

"Today's report confirms our worst fears: The Bureau of Prisons continues to be incompetent when it comes to detecting possible terrorist activity in federal prisons," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), who had asked for the investigation.

"Given past evidence of terrorists communicating with active terror cells from inside prison walls, it is inexcusable that the Bureau of Prisons is not monitoring high-risk prisoners more closely. ... Starting immediately, we need to see much more aggressive ... efforts."

Following reports of the inmates' correspondence with members of the Madrid terror cell, the report said the Bureau of Prisons did take steps to better screen mail and telephone calls, including hiring more Arabic translators.

But funding and manpower shortages hobbled their efforts. In seven out of 10 prisons visited, prison staff described their workload as "overwhelming," and told investigators their monitoring had decreased in the past year as a result of staff reorganizations and downsizing.

At the Metropolitan Correction Center in Manhattan, they also cited inadequate information-sharing, saying that in one case, they discovered from the media that an inmate was a high-ranking member of al-Qaida.

Pa. Man Charged With Trying To Help Al-Qaida Blow Up Refineries (NSDY/AP)

By Ron Todt, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 4, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- A federal grand jury Tuesday indicted a man on charges of offering to help al-Qaida blow up fuel facilities in at least three states.

DOJ_NMG_0074727

The six-count indictment charges Michael Curtis Reynolds, a transient who lived with his elderly mother in Wilkes-Barre, with providing material support for a terrorist organization and seeking to destroy property used in interstate or foreign commerce.

The FBI arrested Reynolds in December after authorities said he tried to meet a purported al-Qaida contact about 25 miles from a motel in Pocatello, Idaho, where he had been staying. Authorities said he expected to receive $40,000 to finance an alleged plot to blow up pipelines and refineries. The purported contact turned out to be a Montana judge who was working for the FBI.

Reynolds wanted to help al-Qaida units attack fuel facilities "to reduce energy reserves, create environmental hazards, increase anxiety, and require substantial expenditure of funds and government personnel, including the military, to protect those locations," the indictment alleges.

Reynolds has been held without bail in the Lackawanna County jail since his arrest on charges of illegally possessing hand grenades, charges that are included in the new indictment filed in U.S. District Court in Scranton.

Defense attorney Joseph O'Brien declined comment on the indictment Tuesday, saying he had just received it and had not been able to discuss it with his client. Reynolds had been scheduled for trial on the explosives charges in November, O'Brien said.

At a December detention hearing, Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Gurganus Jr. said Reynolds had tried to work with al-Qaida to target the Williams natural gas refinery in Opal, Wyo.; the Transcontinental Pipeline, a natural-gas pipeline that runs from the Gulf Coast through Pennsylvania to New York and New Jersey; and a Standard Oil refinery in Perth Amboy, N.J., that no longer exists.

Gurganus said the defendant had told authorities that he was trying to expose terrorist cells, but they did not believe him because he sought a fraudulent passport to leave the country following the attacks in order to avoid possible capture and the death penalty for treason.

Gurganus did not immediately return a telephone message left Tuesday seeking comment.

Reynolds was convicted of arson in 1978 in connection with an attempt to blow up his parents' house in New York state.

Wilkes-Barre Man Indicted In Terror Plot (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 4, 2006

A federal grand jury charged a Wilkes-Barre man yesterday with offering to help al-Qaeda blow up oil pipelines and refineries, a plot he allegedly hatched in a Yahoo chat room bearing Osama Bin Laden's initials.

The terror charges brought against Michael Curtis Reynolds are rare, but a Justice Department spokesman in Washington said statistics were not kept on the number of native-born U.S. citizens who have been charged since 2001 with providing material assistance to terrorists.

"We have what appears to be a lone wolf who aspired to be an al-Qaeda sympathizer," said Brian W. Lynch, the FBI assistant special agent-in-charge for terrorism in Philadelphia. "He was doing things that gave us pause and we had to take him seriously."

Reynolds, 48, was arrested Dec. 5 after he tried to retrieve $40,000 "that he believed constituted payments from al-Qaeda in exchange for his services," the indictment says. He was detained at a rest stop on an interstate highway in southern Idaho.

Since then, he has been held in the Lackawanna County jail on unrelated weapons charges. He was not immediately charged with terrorism because such cases must be reviewed in Washington.

But the terrorism accusations became public in February, when The Inquirer published excerpts of a transcript from a court hearing in which a prosecutor told a judge that Reynolds planned to blow up oil refineries.

Reynolds has denied that he is a terrorist. His lawyer, Joseph A. O'Brien, declined to comment.

Authorities say Reynolds entered a Yahoo chat room called "OBLcrew" last fall, met someone he believed to be an al-Qaeda member, then exchanged e-mail with that person privately.

Four postings from a "Michael Reynolds" were still on the Yahoo OBLcrew public chat room last night.

A message from Oct. 25 said: "It is true America has overstepped its bounds in invading Iraq. Those serious enough to do something about it should e-mail... . Contact soon... . We both want something, let's talk."

The next day, the same person wrote: "Still awaiting someone serious about contact. Would be a pity to lose this idea."

On Nov. 3, someone responded, offering to talk. Further details weren't posted in the chat room, which is available to anyone who registers with Yahoo.

DOJ_NMG_0074728

Although Reynolds believed that he had been communicating online with an al-Qaeda operative, he was, in fact, chatting with Shannen Rossmiller, a 36-year-old municipal judge who lives in Conrad, Mont., and who regularly monitors extremist Muslim Web sites, assisting the FBI. In 2004, she helped win a conviction against a National Guardsman in Tacoma, Wash.

Rossmiller declined to comment yesterday.

Thomas A. Marino, the U.S. attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, declined to comment, a spokeswoman said. Marino issued a news release in which he praised the FBI for stopping Reynolds "from following through" with alleged terror acts.

In private e-mails, Reynolds identified himself as "Fritz Mueller," officials said.

The indictment alleges that Reynolds "offered to assist al-Qaeda in engaging in acts of terrorism within the United States by... identifying targets, planning terrorist attacks, describing bomb-making methods, among other services."

Reynolds sought to enlist "al-Qaeda members to carry out violent attacks against pipeline systems and energy facilities in an effort to reduce energy reserves, create environmental hazards, increase anxiety, and require" federal officials to spend money to protect them, the indictment said.

In addition to being charged with providing material support to al-Qaeda, Reynolds was charged with soliciting explosives to use to destroy natural gas pipeline facilities.

Reynolds also was charged with knowingly distributing, through the Internet, information about the construction and use of explosives, and with possession of hand grenades. One grenade charge is related to an April 23, 2005, case in which police were called to his mother's home in Wilkes-Barre after a relative discovered the hand grenadeDuring a pretrial hearing last year, Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Gurganus Jr. said that Reynolds planned attacks against oil refineries "as a plan to disrupt governmental function, to change the government's actions in foreign countries, and to impact on the national debate about the war."

At the time, Gurganus said said Reynolds' letters, computer drawings and e-mails spelled out his plot to detonate trucks filled with propane along the Alaska pipeline. He also allegedly planned to blow up sections of a transcontinental natural-gas pipeline that runs from the Gulf Coast through Pennsylvania to New Jersey and New York City.

Shortly before his arrest, Reynolds was fired from his job at a semiconductor firm in southern Idaho. He had been living at the Thunderbird Inn in Pocatello, Idaho.

Reynolds, a self-professed computer expert, has filed repeated motions to the court, demanding a trial.

U.S. Told To Show If Lawyers' Talks With Suspects Tracked (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 4, 2006

Citing a "cardinal rule" of litigation, a federal judge in Brooklyn yesterday ordered government attorneys to tell him how much they know about the possible monitoring of conversations between eight former terrorism suspects and their lawyers.

The eight men, all illegal aliens, were men arrested after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and later deported. They are suing the government for abuses while they were detained at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn.

Now that they are no longer in the United States, the men suspect that their conversations with their attorneys have been monitored under a National Security Agency program authorized by President George W. Bush after 9/11.

In May, a federal magistrate judge, Steven Gold, ordered the Justice Department attorneys defending the abuse claims to state whether they, potential witnesses or the defendants, who include former Attorney General John Ashcroft and FBI Director Robert Muller, were privy to any such monitoring.

The magistrate judge also wanted to know whether any information obtained from monitoring would be used to defend the case.

Judge Gleeson affirmed that ruling yesterday in Turkmen v. Ashcroft, 02-CV-2307, with one modification: The government attorneys will now submit the information to Judge Gleeson, ex parte, and he will examine it and report back to the plaintiffs' attorneys.

The decision will be published Tuesday.

"As Judge Gold recognized, it is a cardinal rule of litigation that one side may not eavesdrop on the other's privileged attorney-client communications," Judge Gleeson wrote. "Litigation involving officials of the executive branch of government is no exception."

Judge Gleeson rejected arguments that to confirm or deny whether the plaintiffs' communications were monitored would shed light on the capabilities of the NSA program and disclose valuable intelligence.

"It would not reveal classified information to say that the Department of Justice has been scrupulous in walling off the government officials who are involved in this litigation from exposure to . . . surveillance or knowledge derived from such surveillance," the judge said. "The Department has rightfully espoused that procedure as its policy, and the plaintiffs are entitled to the government's representation that it has made good on it."

One of the government's attorneys, Stephen E. Handler of the Justice Department, previously told Magistrate Judge Gold that he had not been informed that any member of his trial team was aware of intercepted communications. He also agreed to prepare a written response at the behest of the magistrate judge.

But in a subsequent letter to the magistrate judge, Mr. Handler said that the Justice Department, after further examining the issue, could not "confirm or deny whether any communications were intercepted by classified means."

He asked Magistrate Judge Gold to reconsider his decision to ask the government to reveal the information.

Magistrate Judge Gold then issued his May ruling.

Rachel A. Meeropol of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents the plaintiffs, said the ruling "recognizes the importance of judicial scrutiny."

The Department of Justice did not respond to a request for comment.

In a previous ruling in the Turkmen case, Judge Gleeson held that the government did not violate the law when, in response to 9/11 attacks, it arrested aliens of Middle Eastern descent and held them for long periods to investigate possible ties to terrorism (NYLJ June 15, 2006).

- Tom Perrotta can be reached at tperrotta@alm.com.

Justice Department Ordered To Discuss Eavesdropping On Muslims (NYS)

By Joseph Goldstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 4, 2006

A federal judge has ordered senior Justice Department officials to tell him what they know about any secret government eavesdropping on several Muslim men who were deported after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

A former attorney general, John Ashcroft, and the FBI director, Robert Mueller III, are among those who must answer the judge, John Gleeson of U.S. District Court in Brooklyn.His order requires the Justice Department to make the disclosures within two weeks. The Justice Department will submit its answer under seal, though Judge Gleeson indicated he could choose to make the answers public.

The order, released yesterday, applies to two lawsuits brought by less than a dozen Muslims and a Hindu who were rounded up after September 11 and jailed in conditions they claim were brutal. They have since been deported.

Their attorneys, largely from the Manhattan-based civil rights group the Center for Constitutional Rights, have expressed concern that the National Security Agency is listening in on their conversations with their clients.

The order does not require the government to disclose whether the NSA has intercepted such attorney-client conversations. But the Justice Department will have to answer whether the government's lawyers, witnesses, or defendants in the case — including Messrs. Ashcroft and Mueller — have been informed of the content of any such intercepted conversations.

The order replaces an earlier one that had demanded more disclosure from the government. In March, the magistrate-judge handling the case, Steven Gold, told the government to provide answer to a similar question, but did not indicate the government could file those answers under seal.

"In matters this important and sensitive, it seems to me prudent to take small steps," Judge Gleeson wrote.

A spokesman for the Justice Department, Andrew Ames, said the department was reviewing the ruling.

"From our view this is a reasonable way to balance the concerns the judge has expressed," an attorney, Alexander Reinert, who represents one of the plaintiffs, said.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear arguments today in an appeal to an earlier ruling brought by one of the men suing the government. Javaid Iqbal.

Closing Arguments In Trial Of 2 Mosque Members (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Hill, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 4, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- Lawyers for two Muslim men arrested in a money-laundering sting argued Tuesday that the terrorism-related case is based on deceptive evidence presented in a post-Sept. 11 climate of fear.

"This country made some mistakes in the aftermath of 9-11, and this case is one of them," Terence Kindlon, lawyer for Yassin Aref, said in his closing arguments .

Aref, imam at a city mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and mosque member, were arrested in 2004 in an FBI sting built around a fictitious assassination plot. An FBI informant told them he was an arms dealer and asked Hossain to launder money from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile that would be used to kill a Pakistani diplomat in New York City, according to the federal complaint. They are accused in a 30-count indictment of supporting terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0074730

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek told the jury in his closing argument that though their motives were different _ Hossain was interested in money, Aref ideology _ they both understood what the informant was proposing. Pericek told the jury the pair decided to go ahead with the scheme even after the informant said his money came from the sale of ammunition, even after he showed off a surface-to-air missile.

The case against the two men is largely built on tapes of them speaking with the confidential informant. Pericek played back segments Tuesday to demonstrate the informant was explicit about the alleged plot to the men. In one segment Hossain says money could be made from a missile.

Aref, a spiritual leader in the Muslim community, took the stand last week and gave benign explanations for his words and actions. But Pericek said the tapes prove the case.

"What you have here is Mr. Aref saying, 'What are you going to believe, me or your own eyes and ears?'" Pericek said.

Defense lawyers countered that prosecutors were "cherry picking" selected minutes from some 50 hours of tape to make the two men look guilty. Hossain's lawyer, Kevin Luibrand, highlighted different segments of the government's tapes, such as Hossain saying the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center were "bad" and that there is no need for Muslims to kill.

"What they're presenting to you was manipulated and deceptive," Luibrand said of the government case.

Aref merely thought he was acting as a witness to financial transactions according to Muslim custom, Kindlon said. Luibrand said the informant, Shahed Hussain, essentially persuaded his client to take part in the scheme.

Kindlon described the informant, who cooperated with FBI in hopes of reducing his sentence for helping immigrants fraudulently obtain state drivers' licenses, as "a low-life creep."

Aref was characterized by Kindlon as a poet, family man and spiritual leader who grew up in northern Iraq under the tyranny of Saddam Hussein. Luibrand said Hossain was a hardworking business owner who was leading an innocent life until the informant started working on him. Kindlon compared this prosecution to the conviction of a black man for rape in "To Kill a Mockingbird."

"The government went out and decided to snag a couple of Middle Easterners," he said.

Lawyers on both side urged the jury to look over the entire record when they begin deliberating Wednesday.

Trial Of Suspects Caught In Terror Sting Goes To Jury (LAW)

By John Caher, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 4, 2006

ALBANY - Terrorist sympathizer or victim of an overzealous government? Money launderer or victim of government entrapment?

Those are seemingly the bedrock questions today as a federal jury in Albany begins deliberations in the long and controversial case of U.S. v. Aref/U.S. v. Hossain, 04-CR-402.

The case, which at one point generated national attention, centers on two Albany Muslims caught in a government sting more than two years ago.

According to the government, Mohammed Mosharref Hossain, a U.S. citizen who ran a pizza shop, was approached by an informant claiming to be a wealthy importer. The informant, a Pakistani immigrant and con artist looking for leniency, eventually led the suspects to believe that he was an arms dealer. At one point, he displayed to Mr. Hossain a rocket launcher that he said would be used to carry out a terrorist mission in New York City.

The informant asked Mr. Hossain to run $50,000 in cash through his pizza parlor, and return all but $5,000 of it in checks from the business. Mr. Hossain accepted various sums, often returning much of it immediately with checks.

Yassin Muhiddin Aref, an imam, entered the picture in his religious role and was asked to witness and document the transactions, which the defendants describe as a loan, as required under Islamic law. Mr. Aref created a paper trail with multiple copies of those dealings. Officials agree he did not personally profit.

Mr. Aref, a refugee from northern Iraq, is also accused of lying to authorities about his alleged links to Middle Eastern political organizations and individuals the government claims are linked to terrorism.

The case has meandered through Senior U.S. District Judge Thomas J. McAvoy's courtroom in Albany for more than two years, raising myriad issues over defense access to classified documents as well as issues regarding allegedly illegal wiretaps. Yesterday, after two weeks of trial, jurors heard closing arguments.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William C. Pericak, the lead prosecutor, delivered a 90-minute, workman-like summation in which he relied heavily on secretly recorded and incriminating conversations between the informant and the defendants. Mr. Pericak urged the jurors to focus on what the defendants believed and what their intentions were in dealing with a man they had reason to believe was an illegal arms dealer with terrorist sympathies. Both defendants had earlier been approached by an FBI agent and urged to report any suspicious encounters or observations in their Muslim community. Although both had the agent's business card in their wallet when they were arrested, neither contacted the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0074731

"[Mr. Hossain's] motive was money," Mr. Pericak told the jury. "Aref was driven by ideology. Two motives came together to make this work."

Mr. Pericak replayed for the jury several segments of the more than 50 hours of tapes in which the informant records many of his meetings with the defendants. Those segments left the impression that Mr. Hossain was well aware that he was laundering money, and that Mr. Aref was equally aware and also sympathetic to the causes of terrorists.

"You can turn a light on and it is not a crime," Mr. Pericak said. "But if you know that if you turn on the light something will blow up, it is a crime. It comes down to belief and intent."

In the recorded segments played during the prosecution's summation, the jurors were reminded that Mr. Hossain had expressed concern over the legality of the financial relationship and warned the informant to be careful. The jurors also heard Mr. Aref speak of the need to "legal[ize]" the impostor's money, and to warn the informant that if the transactions were discovered he could be accused of supporting terrorism.

Sting Called a 'Mistake'

Terence L. Kindlon, counsel for Mr. Aref, followed the prosecution with a dramatic and impassioned closing where he seemingly took issue with the government's conduct not only in this case, but in many cases apparently inspired by the 9/11 terror attacks.

Mr. Kindlon, of Kindlon & Shanks in Albany, portrayed the prosecution as an over-reaction to 9/11, coupled with the government's unfair use of a professional con artist to ensnare unwitting defendants.

"What happened was 9/11," Mr. Kindlon told the jury. "The world changed for all of us, and it really changed for people from the Middle East, and Yassin [Aref] was one of them. We did a lot of things right and a lot of things wrong. Our government made a lot of mistakes, and one of the mistakes was this sting operation."

Mr. Kindlon described his client as a refugee from Iraq and Saddam Hussein's tyranny, a scholar and cleric who came to this country in pursuit of the American dream, only to fall into the trap of a misguided prosecution generated by a "low-life creep," referring to the informant.

The attorney compared his case to "To Kill a Mockingbird," Harper Lee's masterpiece on the prosecution/persecution of an innocent black man accused and convicted of raping a white girl the Depression-era south.

"He [Tom Robinson] was convicted not because of what he did, but because of prejudice and fear," Mr. Kindlon said. "Don't let that happen here."

Focus on Comments

Mr. Hossain's attorney, Kevin A. Luibrand of Tobin & Dempf in Albany, followed with a systematic and methodical dissection of the government's case, focusing largely on the secret recordings.

Mr. Luibrand repeatedly accused the government of taking comments wildly out of context, neglecting to show the jury entire discussions - especially when the entire conversation was exculpatory - and of being duped by its own witness.

For instance, early in the prosecution the informant brought back to his FBI handler a tape in which he is shown meeting with Mr. Hossain and speaking in Urdu. Mr. Hossain appears to rant and rave, and evidence showed that the informant told authorities that he was railing against America.

It was several months before officials had the tape transcribed and learned that Mr. Hossain was actually espousing his respect for the United States and the American way of life and criticizing the terrorists who had attacked what he described as his country, the United States.

Additionally, the transcripts, which Mr. Luibrand highlighted for the jury, indicate that in addition to somewhat vague comments by the informant about arms dealing there were specific references to a legitimate business and business income. It is not clear from those segments if Mr. Hossain thought he was handling illicit or legal funds - but it is clear that the government's informant assured the target that there was nothing illegal about their dealings.

"The government goes into the life of an innocent man . . . tells him something is legal and then arrests him for doing it," Mr. Luibrand said. "They just can't do that."

- John Caher can be reached at jcaher@alm.com.

Pentagon: No Terror Trials Imminent (AP-Y)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074732

The Pentagon said Tuesday that it will take some time to set up military trials for terror suspects, approved by Congress last week.

No such trials are imminent, said Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman, who declined to say when he thought they might begin.

President Bush is expected to sign into law legislation passed Friday on prisoner interrogations and military trials. The Defense Department has to rewrite rules and redraft charges that were filed against defendants under an old trial system, struck down by the Supreme Court, Whitman said.

"And then there's all the mechanics" of assigning people like judges, lawyers and court reporters — "things that are very mundane but very important," Whitman said. "And that's just to give you a flavor of the many things that we would have to do."

Ten detainees at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had already been selected for trial under a system set up after the Sept. 11 attacks when the Supreme Court ruled the system unconstitutional.

Since then, Bush also has sent to Guantanamo 14 high-level suspects that the CIA had been interrogating and hiding for years in secret prisons around the world.

The group includes Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the suspected mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Asked whether officials might decide to try those new arrivals first, Whitman said it would be up to prosecutors, though more work has been done on the cases of others.

Australian Attorney General Philip Ruddock says he was told by U.S. officials that the only Australian held at Guantanamo — Taliban fighter David Hicks — will be one of the first terror suspects to be tried by the overhauled military commission system. Speaking Sunday, Ruddock said he expected it to be within months.

The bill passed Friday authorizes the Pentagon to set up military commissions, or juries, to hear a defendant's case and establishes rules for prosecution. The bill requires at least five members in each commission and a unanimous vote by at least 12 members if the death penalty is sought. It also requires the military judge follow certain trial procedures, such as requiring each defendant have access to any evidence given to the jury.

___

On the Net:

U.S. Military Commissions at http://www.defenselink.mil/news/commissions.html

German Lawmakers Fault Abduction Probe (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

BERLIN -- More than two years after a German citizen reported being kidnapped in the Balkans by the CIA, several lawmakers here are criticizing prosecutors for not conducting a more aggressive investigation into the bungled counterterrorism operation.

Last month, prosecutors in Munich disclosed that they had obtained a list of about 20 CIA operatives suspected in the abduction of Khaled al-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent who was forcibly taken to Afghanistan in early 2004 and interrogated for four months in a covert prison.

Despite the apparent break in the probe, prosecutors said they were not close to issuing arrest warrants or indictments. They complained of a lack of cooperation from the U.S. government.

Although many of the names appear to be aliases, a German television network identified and tracked down three people allegedly involved in the case, prompting legislators and other critics of U.S. counterterrorism tactics in Europe to question whether German prosecutors are reluctant to dig too deeply into a case involving American spies.

"If the suspects came from other countries, everything would proceed much quicker," said Hans-Christian Stroebele, a member of a German parliamentary committee that is conducting a separate inquiry into what role the German government may have played in the abduction. Prosecutors, he added, should "clear up this case forcefully and with all means." He said an investigation "has to use official channels but follow unconventional ways as well."

The German criminal investigation into the alleged CIA operation stands in contrast to a similar case in Milan, where prosecutors have issued international arrest warrants for 26 American agents charged with kidnapping a radical Islamic cleric and taking him to Cairo in early 2003.

Authorities in both Italy and Germany acknowledged that it was implausible that the U.S. government would ever hand over CIA operatives for trial or that arrests were likely. But Italian prosecutors have pushed ahead regardless, preparing to try the defendants in absentia.

August Stern, a chief public prosecutor in Munich whose office is leading the Masri investigation, said his staff has been hampered by a lack of cooperation from both the U.S. and German governments. The U.S. government has dodged official legal queries, he said, while the German government has kept other material under the protective seal of classification. "We are doing everything in our power," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0074733

Stern said his office recently received the list of about 20 CIA operatives from Spanish judicial authorities, who assembled it from the flight manifest of an airplane that investigators believe was used in the kidnapping.

Aviation records show that the plane, a Boeing 737 registered to a suspected CIA front company, left the Spanish island of Mallorca on Jan. 23, 2004, and arrived a few hours later in Skopje, Macedonia, where Masri said he had been held for a few weeks by Macedonian and U.S. agents. The next morning, the plane left for Kabul, Afghanistan, with a brief stopover in Baghdad, according to the records.

The passengers on board are believed to have used fake passports. But Spanish investigators obtained photographs of several who checked into hotels in Mallorca before they left Spain.

Some of the spies were sloppy in other ways in concealing their trails. According to the German television network ARD, one pilot used his hotel phone to call his father in the United States; others used false last names but kept their real first ones and barely altered their birthdates on their passports. The CIA declined to comment for this report.

German prosecutors acknowledged that Masri's attorney gave them a copy of the flight manifest last December. But they waited four months before they sent a letter to Spanish authorities asking for official confirmation and assistance, according to German media reports.

"I don't want to put pressure on the justice system, but it surprises me that it is moving so slowly and that they are taking so much time to come up with the information," said Cem Ozdemir, a German delegate to the European Parliament and member of another panel that is scrutinizing CIA counterterrorism activity in Europe. "I think they're thinking twice before taking any action."

Many layers of mystery still surround Masri's disappearance. He has testified that he left his home in Ulm, Germany, on Dec. 31, 2003, after a squabble with his wife and decided on a whim to travel to Skopje, where he was detained at the border by Macedonian authorities.

According to his account, he was handed over to the CIA and taken to Kabul, where he spent four months in a dank cell before being flown back to the Balkans and set free on a hillside in Albania, with little explanation and no apology.

The German government has denied any involvement and said U.S. authorities informed it of the abduction only after Masri's release in May 2004.

A German federal police investigator testified last month in Berlin, however, that Masri had been under surveillance for months before his disappearance because of suspicions he had links to a radical Islamic group based in Lebanon. The investigator testified that details of the monitoring may have been passed to U.S. intelligence agencies.

Masri has testified that he was interrogated in Kabul by a German-speaking agent named "Sam," who he assumed was working for the German government. Investigators said they have been unable to confirm that Sam was a German operative. But they are still trying to determine exactly when the German government became aware that Masri had been kidnapped and whether it could have intervened earlier on his behalf.

"It is our task to find out: When did the former German government learn about the abduction?" said Siegfried Kauder, chairman of the parliamentary committee examining the case. "What did the German government know, and when did it find out?"

PATRIOT ACT:

Judge: Patriot Act Challenge Can Proceed (AP)

By Jim Irwin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

DETROIT (AP) -- Nearly three years after hearing arguments in the case, a federal judge has ruled that an American Civil Liberties Union challenge to the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act may proceed.

The ACLU's clients, including Muslim charities, social services organizations and advocacy groups, have shown they have been harmed by the anti-terrorism law adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, U.S. District Judge Denise Page Hood said in a 15-page ruling issued Friday.

The lawsuit was filed in July 2003 on behalf of the Muslim Community Association of Ann Arbor and five other nonprofit groups. The ACLU said its clients had been hurt by the Patriot Act because fear of the law has kept many people from attending religious services and making charitable donations.

It was the first legal challenge to the part of the Patriot Act that let agents obtain such things as library lists and medical information.

DOJ_NMG_0074734

The ACLU contended Section 215 of the Patriot Act, which allows the FBI access to any "tangible things" such as books and documents through an order from a secret court, does not require investigators to show probable cause.

The group wants the judge to declare Section 215 unconstitutional, and block the Justice Department from using that part of the Patriot Act.

Hood's ruling had been awaited since a Dec. 3, 2003, hearing at which the government argued the lawsuit should be dismissed. Federal officials later argued that amendments approved by Congress in March 2006 had corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act. Hood's ruling gave the plaintiffs 30 days to amend their initial complaint in light of those amendments.

Kary Moss, Michigan director of the ACLU, told the Detroit Free Press she would consult with her clients before deciding whether to proceed with the lawsuit.

The government had argued the law does not violate the Fourth Amendment because the protections against unreasonable search and seizure do not apply to information or items that have been given to third parties, even if there is an understanding of confidentiality.

Messages seeking comment were left after business hours Tuesday with the Justice Department in Washington and the U.S. attorney's office in Detroit.

Hood acknowledged it took "an extraordinary amount of time" to issue her ruling, adding, "the issues raised on the complaint and in the government's papers are important to us all."

Detroit Judge Says Patriot Act Suit Can Proceed (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, October 4, 2006

A federal judge in Detroit has rejected the government's request to dismiss an ACLU lawsuit challenging the constitutionally of the controversial USA Patriot Act, an anti-terrorism measure Congress enacted after the 9/11 attacks.

U.S. District Judge Denise Hood issued the decision without fanfare on Friday, nearly three years after promising a speedy decision in the case. Congress has amended the law at least once since the government's request was argued before Hood in December 2003.

Hood said in a 15-page decision that the ACLU's clients - Muslim charities, social services organizations and advocacy groups - established that they have been harmed Section 215 of the law.

Hood said the ACLU's clients can proceed with their lawsuit and gave them 30 days to amend their initial complaint in light of amendments adopted by Congress in March.

The government had argued that this year's amendments had corrected any constitutional deficiencies in the act. The ACLU disagreed.

Michigan ACLU Executive Director Kary Moss said she was pleased with the decision.

“She confirmed what we've said all along, that our clients are suffering concrete harm as a result of the Patriot Act,” Moss said Tuesday. “Even though we think the act fails to comply with the Constitution, we believe our legal challenge and advocacy in Congress has fixed some of the worst problems.”

She said the law now gives any business receiving a request for records of customers an employees the right to consult with a lawyer before turning over records to the government.

Moss said the law still prohibits anyone who receives a records request from divulging it for at least one year, but allows them to challenge the order after the year has run.

She also said the ability of the government to obtain a warrant to seize records without probable cause from the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court in Washington, D.C, still poses a problem.

There was no immediate comment from the Justice Department.

Detroit Judge Allows Patriot Act Lawsuit To Go Forward (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, October 4, 2006

A federal judge in Detroit has ruled that a lawsuit by the Michigan ACLU aimed at striking down the U.S. Patriot Act may proceed.

The 2003 lawsuit brought on behalf of Muslim and Arab groups alleges the anti-terrorist law passed following the September 11 terror attacks is unconstitutional because it allows searches without due process and removes First Amendment rights, among other reasons.

The government argues amendments enacted over the last three years have cured any deficiencies in the Patriot Act, but the ACLU disagrees.

DOJ_NMG_0074735

U.S. District Judge Denise Page Hood said in an order Friday that the plaintiffs in the case, which include the American Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee and the Council on American-Islamic Relations, have shown sufficient evidence of harm to allow the lawsuit to proceed.

"Plaintiffs have alleged that their members are afraid to attend mosque, practice their religion, and express their opinions on religion and political views," Hood said in her order.

She gave the ACLU 30 days to amend its complaint in light of amendments to the act.

The ACLU and government had been awaiting a ruling since a hearing on Dec. 3, 2003 at which the government argued the lawsuit should be dismissed.

You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Homeland Security Official Resigning (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

Tracy Henke, the Department of Homeland Security official who helped supervise the distribution of antiterrorism grants, is resigning in the wake of criticism from members of Congress that the grant process was irrational or at least inexplicable. The criticism surged after big cuts were made in annual anti-terrorism grants to major cities including Washington and New York while a report showed that the department's list of possible terrorism targets included an Indiana popcorn farm and an Alabama petting zoo.

Law Sought On Explosive Fertilizer (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Counterterrorism experts and lawmakers from both parties are demanding that Congress pass a law to restrict the sale of a popular fertilizer that was the key component in the Oklahoma City bombing.

"Time is of the essence," says Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., a member of the House Homeland Security Committee. "This has been a material of choice in terrorist acts."

Timothy McVeigh killed 168 people in 1995 when he blew up Oklahoma City's federal building with a 2.4-ton truck bomb made with ammonium nitrate fertilizer. Four months ago, Canadian authorities arrested 17 terrorism suspects accused of trying to get 3 tons of the compound, used by farmers across the USA and around the world.

Richard Falkenrath, counterterrorism chief for the New York Police Department and a former senior homeland security adviser to President Bush, chastised lawmakers and administration officials last month for not passing a proposed law that would regulate the production, storage and sale of the material.

He told the Senate's homeland security committee that New York City counterterrorism detectives were able to buy 2,450 pounds of ammonium nitrate in Pennsylvania and Upstate New York in 2004, enough to build a 1.3-ton truck bomb. Because no safeguards have been put in place, "it is today … as easy for a terrorist to build a truck bomb as it was for McVeigh and (accomplice Terry) Nichols to do so more than 10 years ago," he said.

New York and at least five other states — California, Nevada, South Carolina, Michigan and Oklahoma — have passed laws regulating the sale of the material.

In New York, where anyone buying ammonium nitrate has to show identification, the law worked in 2004. After the detectives, posing as apple orchard owners, bought the ammonium nitrate and showed ID with city addresses, the seller notified the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. Pennsylvania, where the detectives also bought fertilizer, has no such law. Counterterrorism officials say that's why there needs to be a federal law.

Weldon's bill, co-sponsored by Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, would:

·Require producers and sellers of ammonium nitrate to register with the Homeland Security Department or a state agency, keep sales records for three years and report any unexplained loss or theft within 24 hours.

·Make buyers provide name, address and phone number and show ID.

·Allow sellers to refuse to sell ammonium nitrate to anyone who behaves suspiciously.

DOJ_NMG_0074736

The Farm Bureau, which has 6 million members, has opposed legislation that would require people buying ammonium nitrate to undergo background checks, but it takes no position on the current proposal, spokeswoman Tracy Taylor Grondine says.

Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke said he would not comment on any specific bill in Congress, but he said, "We do have to be sensible and balanced in our security."

Extensive Tests Led To New Carry-On Rules, Officials Say (NYT)

By Eric Lipton And Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — In a canyon in New Mexico, technicians detonated beaker after beaker of liquid explosives. In laboratories in Florida and New Jersey, scientists concocted dangerous brews. In drugstores and supermarkets in the Washington area, government officials shopped for tiny containers of shaving cream, shampoo and toothpaste.

Since a London-based plot to bomb airliners was broken up seven weeks ago, aviation security officials in the United States have pushed to assess how serious that threat was and what safeguards should be taken. The revised checkpoint rules announced last week by American, Canadian and European authorities were the result of that frenzied effort, Transportation Security Administration officials said.

The new rules — which ease a ban on liquids by allowing travelers to carry three-ounce containers of toiletries in a one-quart, zip-top plastic bag — have been largely met with approval by passengers and relief by airlines overburdened with a crush of checked bags. But the changes also provoked some skepticism by the public about the reasoning behind the decision.

Aviation security officials said they were confident they had settled on a sound course. "We looked at it from the chemistry point of view, the physics point of view — which kind of operational tactics one might use, with different scenarios," said Kip Hawley, the assistant secretary for the transportation agency. "The arrangement we came up with does have a good margin of error."

The testing, Mr. Hawley said, confirmed that the risks posed by the London plot were real. "This was a serious, serious, serious threat — chilling is the word," he said in an interview last week. But extensive work by government and university scientists showed that the threat could be largely counteracted by limits on the size of containers, he said.

Mr. Hawley and the deputy homeland security secretary, Michael Jackson, provided new details about the analysis of the London scheme in a joint interview last week, in part because they were aware of the skepticism over the new checkpoint rules. Officials from the F.B.I., the T.S.A., the White House domestic security office and aviation security agencies overseas concurred in the decision, Homeland Security officials said.

There was "remarkable interagency consensus," said Russ Knocke, a Homeland Security spokesman.

Some aviation security and explosive detection experts said the new rules demonstrated that the initial ban on liquids was overkill.

"I think they overreacted," said Penrose Albright, a former assistant secretary at the Science and Technology division of the Department of Homeland Security. "Where they are at now is where they should have been from the beginning."

But others worry that lifting the ban might be premature. Stephen J. McHale, a former deputy T.S.A. administrator, said some security experts in Washington were concerned that with some suspects perhaps still at large, government scientists could not reliably counter unknown formulas terrorists might be developing.

Homeland Security officials said the effort to assess the threat began soon after the arrests of plot suspects by British authorities on Aug. 9. Laboratories lined up by Homeland Security and the Federal Bureau of Investigation immediately began replicating the bomb the British plotters were experimenting with. And scientists tried to build every alternative they could imagine.

Scientists tested the ingredients linked to the London plot in the Rio Grande Valley south of Albuquerque, where the canyons and mountains form a perfect explosives testing range. Based on the materials found in Britain, investigators developed a specific theory of the bomb plot, two officials who have been briefed on the inquiry said.

With the seal on a sports drink called Lucozade intact, the plotters apparently intended to remove the drink with a hypodermic needle and replace it with highly concentrated hydrogen peroxide, a syrupy liquid once used as rocket fuel. Another bottle would be filled with a common household substance, which The New York Times agreed not to disclose at the request of Homeland Security officials. After the two were mixed, a detonator hidden in a hollowed-out AA battery would be used to set off the bomb, according to this theory.

The work did not involve blowing up an airplane. Instead, ingredients were mixed in the beakers and, with the help of a robotic device, detonated while technicians were in a nearby bunker, security officials said. High-speed cameras recorded the explosions, while devices took readings so technicians could calculate the power and duration of the blasts and predict their effect on a plane.

DOJ_NMG_0074737

Neither Van D. Romero, vice president for research at New Mexico Tech, which operates the explosives testing center, nor security officials would describe in detail the strength of the explosions or the quantities of liquids tested. But Mr. Romero said the blasts were of considerable force. “There are liquids that will detonate and can cause a significant amount of damage,” he said.

The critical next question was how much liquid represented a threat. Aviation security officials said there was no way to eliminate risk. Trying to identify and intercept any object that might present a threat, no matter how modest, would cause major checkpoint bottlenecks. The intent, they said, was to prevent anything that could cause catastrophic damage from getting aboard planes.

Taking into account the possibility that terrorists might act as a team and pool ingredients, officials arrived at the limit of one quart-size plastic bag per passenger. That amount of liquid explosives could still cause damage or harm passengers, but it would be unlikely to destroy a plane, officials said.

“It is well within the comfort zone of what we need to protect the public,” Mr. Hawley said.

To decide what could go inside the bag, the transportation agency identified the smallest containers of basic toiletries travelers might need.

“They sent men out to grocery stores and pharmacies, they sent women out, they sent people with kids to look at what kids bring,” Mr. Jackson said.

Mr. Hawley acknowledged that airlines and airport retailers were pressing to ease the liquids ban, but he said the decision to modify it was based purely on a safety analysis.

The airlines were overwhelmed with a 20 to 25 percent increase in checked bags, pushing out profitable cargo and complicating the effort to load planes on time. They were also concerned that business travelers might avoid flying, said John M. Meenan, senior vice president of the Air Transport Association, the trade association of the major airlines.

The transportation agency plans to keep the limit on liquids in place indefinitely, officials said, because equipment is not reliable or efficient enough to detect liquid explosives.

Mr. McHale, the former T.S.A. deputy administrator, said he thought the agency had made a reasonable decision.

“You have to act on the info you know, not fears of what you don’t know,” he said. “People who aren’t faced with the pressures of keeping the aviation system running might prefer to just shut the system down or have everybody fly naked. But obviously, you can’t do that.”

Detectors Hunt Anthrax 5 Years After Deadly Attack (WT/AP)

By Randolph E. Schmid And Michael J. Sniffen, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

More than 1,000 biological detectors are sniffing mail across the country for dangerous contamination as the hunt goes on for whoever put anthrax in letters and killed five persons just after the September 11 attacks.

An anthrax case in Florida, reported five years ago today, brought the first hint of what turned out to be contamination of mail that reached the District, New York, Connecticut and New Jersey and raised fears nationwide.

Last month, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said that agents are still working on the aging anthrax case, and he declared it "will be solved and the person or persons responsible will be brought to justice."

"From the outset, we have been open to any and all theories, and the investigation continues on any and all theories," Mr. Mueller said.

The U.S. Postal Service has taken action to prevent a repeat.

"We have fully deployed the fleet of bio-detection systems" on canceling machines at 271 mail-processing locations, Postal Vice President Tom Day said.

A modified version for larger, flat mail items will be put into service next year, he said.

Installation of the current system cost $800 million, provided by Congress, and the post office is spending about $70 million to operate it. That annual cost is expected to climb to $120 million.

The detectors check for anthrax and two other biological hazards, which Mr. Day declined to identify.

Among those killed in 2001 were two postal workers at the District's Brentwood mail processing facility.

Mr. Day said that workers now are trained to look for suspicious packages and call in postal inspectors if they detect something unusual.

Last week, the FBI denied it had overestimated the potency of the anthrax spores used in the killings.

Shortly after the attacks, reports said the spores contained additives and had been subjected to sophisticated milling -- both techniques used in anthrax-based weapons -- to make them more lethal.

DOJ_NMG_0074738

But bureau officials now say that the early reports of weapons-grade anthrax were misconceptions.

If the anthrax used was less sophisticated than originally thought, that opens a wider field of potential suspects.

Investigators are looking at a small number of people in the United States and abroad because they fit some criterion, such as access to anthrax, said one official who declined to be identified because authorities are reluctant to discuss the details of ongoing investigations.

Neither that official nor any others involved with the case would discuss the status of Steven Hatfill, the former Army scientist once described by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft as a "person of interest" in the case.

Mr. Hatfill has sued the government, saying that leaked statements about him damaged his career.

There are 17 FBI agents and 10 postal inspectors assigned to the case. Investigators have conducted more than 9,100 interviews, issued more than 6,000 grand jury subpoenas and completed 67 searches.

Despite the installation of the detectors, many postal workers contend not enough has been done, said William Burrus, president of the American Postal Workers Union.

The units that have been installed are effective, Mr. Burrus said, but not all mail is processed in postal facilities. He said some is prepared by large business mailers and dropped off for delivery.

The detectors have conducted more than 3 million tests, screening about 60 billion pieces of mail with no false alarms. Postal contractors and the Defense Department worked together to devise the system.

WAR NEWS:

He Didn't Take The Easy Way (USAT)

By Stephen J. Hadley

USA Today, October 4, 2006

After our nation was attacked on 9/11, President Bush made clear that America had a choice — to root out the terrorists, or wait to be attacked again. He decided that to protect the American people, our nation must go on the offense and destroy the terror networks.

The president has chosen a difficult path, and he has been honest with the American people about the challenges. He has said the enemy we face is determined and ruthless. He has been blunt about intelligence failures and stains on our national honor such as the Abu Ghraib facility in Iraq. He has highlighted the courage of our men and women in uniform who have served — and sacrificed — for freedom. He has called this war a long struggle, and a generational conflict.

The president is fully engaged in leading this long war. He is well aware of both the good news and the bad. He reviews intelligence reports. He reads stories in the news media. He meets with families of the fallen.

Our strategy is far from “stay the course.” The president continually challenges all of us to learn from experience, adapt to change and improve our performance. In Iraq, we have modified our approach to training the Iraqi army so Iraqi soldiers can be more effective in defeating terrorists and insurgents. We have redoubled our efforts to train Iraqi police so that they can earn the confidence of all the Iraqi people. We have sought new approaches to reconstruction and economic development.

Yet our objective has not changed. We will fight alongside the Iraqi people to win this war. We will refuse to surrender to the terrorists who view Iraq as the central front in their war against their fellow Muslims and the entire free world. We are determined to deny them a platform from which to launch attacks on America and our allies.

The president has said this war will not be dictated by domestic politics. A drawdown of our troops in Iraq right before U.S. elections in November would be the politically expedient thing to do. But our military commanders believe it would be the wrong thing to do. Based on their advice, we have actually increased our troops in Iraq.

The president will continue to speak directly and candidly to the American people — about this war, about the enemy we face, and about why we can and must see this war through to victory.

Stephen J. Hadley is the National Security adviser.

Denial, Arrogance Led U.S. Into Iraq Trap (USAT)

USA Today, October 4, 2006

If there's a lesson from Bob Woodward's latest book, State of Denial, it's that the calamity that has unfolded over the past three years in Iraq was born of a ruinous mix of arrogance and naiveté from President Bush and his key deputies. Convinced that the war would be a walkover, they simply closed their ears to the many voices who warned of the impending dangers.

DOJ_NMG_0074739

Although others have detailed the Bush administration's incompetence and head-in-the-sand attitude as the Iraqi insurgency took root, State of Denial provides fresh details about the myriad ways administration officials, particularly Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, bungled the Iraq war:

·Unrealistic plans. Rumsfeld's Pentagon accomplished the initial military campaign but botched the aftermath. It rejected recommendations that it would take about 450,000 troops to secure Iraq and sent one-third that number. It ignored a State Department blueprint that could have tamped down the looting, including of arms depots by future insurgents. Woodward relates disturbing anecdotes about administration pettiness on a level with high school. Rumsfeld cut others out of Iraq decisions and planning; for a time, he would not return the phone calls of then-National Security adviser Condoleezza Rice until ordered to do so.

·Refusing to shift course. Expert advice that could have made a difference was ignored. Woodward cites the first Iraq administrator, Jay Garner, telling Rumsfeld that three terrible — but reversible — mistakes had been made: banning Baath Party members from any new government; disbanding the Iraqi army; and rebuffing an interim leadership that could have put an Iraqi face on the nation's new government. None of those decisions was reversed, leaving thousands of well-armed fighters with little option other than rebellion. Woodward also recounts that former secretary of State Henry Kissinger privately criticized Bush for rarely even considering alternative courses of action.

·Misleading the public. Woodward's book is packed with details about the gulf between the information the administration had and the picture it presented in public. In May 2005, for example, Vice President Cheney told Larry King on CNN that the insurgency was in “the last throes” when Bush knew it was, in fact, worsening.

Hovering in the background is the role of father-son psychology. Woodward touches lightly on it: He relays how Bush saw his pick for Defense secretary as a chance to prove his father wrong about Rumsfeld, whom the first President Bush believed to be arrogant and Machiavellian. And the current president once blurted out that a reason for removing Saddam Hussein was that Saddam had tried to kill his father.

Though Freudian analysis is fraught and ultimately unprovable territory, this much is for sure: The senior President Bush understood the potential pitfalls in Iraq. In a 1998 book he co-authored, he wrote of his decision after the 1991 Gulf War not to invade Iraq after repelling it from Kuwait. “Trying to eliminate Saddam … would have incurred incalculable human and political costs. … We would have been forced to occupy Baghdad and, in effect, rule Iraq … there was no viable ‘exit strategy' we could see.”

When they elected George W. Bush in 2000, many voters assumed he would carry on his father's pragmatic foreign policy. Instead, he embraced the neoconservatives' risky strategy to reorder the Middle East. As the present quagmire shows, when it came to Iraq, father knew best. Bush presumably knows that by now, but it may be too late.

How To Lose A War (WP)

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

IT MAY BE that much of the trouble the United States now faces in Iraq was the inevitable result of the decision to crack open a complex society that had been repressed and brutalized for three decades by Saddam Hussein. The fierce unwillingness of many Sunnis to accept minority status; the uncompromising drive of Shiites and Kurds for power so long denied them; the relative absence of competent or inspiring leaders: All this and more meant that the reconstruction of Iraq could not have been simple, short or entirely peaceful.

It nevertheless seems clear that U.S. chances for success would have been far better than they are today were it not for the overwhelming and shocking incompetence with which the administration has managed the war. From the failure to produce a coherent postwar plan to the disastrous performance by the occupation authority that was belatedly installed, the Bush team turned a difficult mission into a near-impossible one. President Bush and his most senior aides meanwhile stubbornly refused to listen to advisers who warned of the consequences of their policies.

In-depth accounts by journalists are beginning to provide a detailed picture of what has gone wrong in Iraq and why. Most recently, The Post's Bob Woodward reports in the book "State of Denial" how Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld monopolized administration planning for Iraq, repeatedly misjudged the tactics and resources needed for success, and ignored reports from his own top aides about how the war was going wrong.

In "Fiasco," The Post's Thomas E. Ricks recounts how Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon excluded the State Department from reconstruction planning, then failed to produce any plan of its own. When L. Paul Bremer was abruptly handed a mandate to rebuild the country from the ground up, still more fateful mistakes were made. As former Post Baghdad bureau chief Rajiv Chandrasekaran details in the book "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," staff members for Mr. Bremer's authority too often were picked on the basis of Republican political affiliation, rather than experience or competence -- with the result that people in their twenties were handed control over matters such as the Iraqi government budget.

DOJ_NMG_0074740

Mistakes are inevitable in any war. But the common theme of these accounts is the triumph of ideology and arrogance over the pragmatism that is needed to recover from errors or adjust to changing conditions. Having dispatched too few troops to Iraq at the beginning of the war, Mr. Rumsfeld has perpetuated this signal failing for 3 1/2 years. Having ignored reconstruction in prewar planning, the administration then excluded the professionals who might have made the occupation authority successful.

Mr. Bush himself refused to take one of the essential steps needed to remedy the resulting mess -- replacing Mr. Rumsfeld -- despite repeatedly being advised to do so by his own chief of staff, among others. The result, as Mr. Woodward describes it, is a defense secretary who has lost the confidence of the military he directs. Even more disturbing is the portrait of a president who, with two years left in his term, seems unable to come to terms with the damaging and dangerous situation he has helped to create -- much less imagine a way out of it.

We continue to agree with Mr. Bush that it would be wrong and dangerous for U.S. troops simply to withdraw. But it is also dangerous when leaders such as Mr. Bush, Vice President Cheney and Mr. Rumsfeld continue to resist reality.

If I Had One Wish (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

There are now so many books out on the Bush policy in Iraq with variations of the word "fiasco" in the title or the text that bookstores are surely going to have to be redesigned to create shelf space for this war: "Welcome to Barnes & Noble: We have fiction and nonfiction on the main floor, poetry and mystery in the corner, children's books upstairs and the 'Bush Fiasco' section across the entire basement."

And the war isn't even over yet.

If there is a theme common to all these books it is the word "incompetence." Reading Bob Woodward's "State of Denial," about the completely dysfunctional manner in which the Bush national security team has conducted the Iraq war — the president reportedly had to order Don Rumsfeld to return Condi Rice's phone calls — leaves you disgusted.

Which brings me to this November's elections. New York Times columnists are not allowed to endorse candidates, but I checked the rulebook the other day, and there's no rule against rooting for a general outcome. So here is my fervent wish: For the sake of the country, I really hope the Republicans lose the House and the Senate to the Democrats — by one seat in each chamber.

It is so important that the Republicans lose, because if the Bush-Cheney-Rumsfeld-Rice team can get away with the grotesque incompetence they have exhibited in Iraq — a war that was not preordained to fail, but was never given a proper chance to succeed — it makes this country look like a banana republic.

If on the morning after the election these people come out smirking that their efforts to scare the public into voting again for their candidates worked, and therefore they can just stay the present course in Iraq — which is not working — it will send a terrible message about our democracy. It will tell us that the country is so divided, and so many districts gerrymandered in favor of Republicans, that performance does not matter any longer. Unless you are caught sending e-mail to a Congressional page soliciting sex, your seat is safe.

If we have any chance of salvaging Iraq and solving some of our real problems at home, it will only be as a result of some electoral shock treatment delivered to a Republican Party that has failed to demand even the most minimal competence and planning from its leaders.

But the reason I want the Democrats to win by only one seat in both the House and the Senate is because I want them to have such a slim margin that they will have to govern from the center — to look for bipartisan fixes to the country's major issues, which is the only way they can be addressed.

"We're not just in a 'state of denial' about Iraq," remarked Michael Mandelbaum, the author of "The Case for Goliath." We're also in a state of denial about the deficit, health care, energy and Social Security."

Maybe the deficit can wait. But there is something immoral about kicking Iraq down the road for someone else to deal with it. Because the burden of Iraq falls — unfairly and harshly — on one small segment of our population: U.S. military troops and their families.

Yes, Mr. Bush's original vision of a unified democratic Iraq was compelling and important. But it's not happening. It's become the "second choice" of too many Iraqis. Too many Kurds just want their own state; too many Shiites just want their own pro-Iranian zone in the south; too many Sunnis want the old order. Real democracy is too many Iraqis' second choice. If that doesn't change, we can't go on having our first-choice kids dying for Iraqis' second choice. Our top military people know things aren't working. But they also know the Bush team won't order a Plan B, because it would be construed as an admission of failure and used in domestic politics. So we are staying a failing course.

DOJ_NMG_0074741

You know how they say that after a while people start to look like their pets? Well, we're starting to look like Iraq — a bunch of warring political tribes incapable of acting in common for the greater good.

So here's hoping the Republicans lose the House and the Senate and realize that if they don't start acting responsibly they'll suffer an even worse defeat in '08. And here's hoping the Democrats win by just enough to love being back in power, but by such a slim margin they know that if they don't produce something by '08, they'll get defeated again.

Without restoring a legislative center that can tackle hard issues and demand sacrifices, we're just going to keep kicking problems down the road — from Iraq to Social Security — until the road reaches a cliff and we plunge over the side.

Don't Pass The Salted Peanuts, Henry (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

Tom Lehrer said that political satire was rendered obsolete when Henry Kissinger won a Nobel Peace Prize for prolonging the Vietnam War.

But even the inventive Lehrer could never have imagined that Dr. Strangelove would get a second chance to contribute to misleading the public about a military catastrophe in a misunderstood land — a do-over in scarring the American psyche and reputation in profound ways.

Yet, as Bob Woodward reveals in "State of Denial," the sequel to "Bush is a Genius," Mr. Kissinger has been one of the few trusted outside advisers that W. has listened to on Iraq. The administration has shaped its policy to hew to the 83-year-old Unwise Man's belief that the only way to beat an insurgency is to stick it out, no matter how many American kids and foreign civilians die.

Especially if elections are coming up. As the historian Robert Dallek, who is writing a book on Nixon and Kissinger, notes, "Kissinger was complicit in using foreign policy to try to save Nixon during Watergate."

Bob Haldeman wrote in his diary on Dec. 15, 1970, using "K" for Kissinger and "P" for President Nixon: "K came in and the discussion covered some of the general thinking about Vietnam and the P's big peace plan for next year, which K later told me he does not favor. He thinks that any pullout next year would be a serious mistake because the adverse reaction to it could set in well before the '72 elections. He favors, instead, a continued winding down and then a pullout right at the fall of '72 so that if any bad results follow they will be too late to affect the election. It seems to make sense."

Thirty-five years later, Mr. Kissinger, the consummate fawner, was once more able to sway a president with faux deference. Dr. K encouraged W. to play the tough guy on the war, even though he'd never gone to war himself.

In September 2005, Mr. Woodward writes, W.'s head speechwriter, Mike Gerson, visited Mr. Kissinger and received a lecture declaring that the only exit strategy for Iraq was victory and a copy of the diplomat's "salted peanut memo" from 1969, warning against resisting pressure to withdraw troops from Vietnam: "Withdrawal of U.S. troops will become like salted peanuts to the American public; the more U.S. troops come home, the more will be demanded."

It's the kind of logic that makes Dr. K such a valuable counselor to a president who has already declared privately that his midterm election strategy is to tar the Democrats this way: "Surrender and taxes."

The shrink-wrapped president did not consult his own father before going to war against the same dictator. And, moving from Dr. Strangelove to Dr. Freud, two of W.'s top war counselors — Rummy and Henry the K — are men who did not bother to conceal their contempt for Bush senior as a naïve lightweight.

As Mr. Woodward notes, part of Rummy's allure for W. was the fact that Poppy Bush considered him an arrogant, Machiavellian sort who could get you in deep doo-doo. "It was a chance," Mr. Woodward says, "to prove his father wrong." Or right.

It's been clear for years that Dick Cheney and Rummy have been using the Bush presidency like an elaborate vanity production to replay Watergate and Vietnam, and to try to reverse things that bothered them during prior stints in the Nixon and Ford administrations.

As Mr. Cheney told his pal Rummy when W. gave him a second crack — a quarter-century later — at the defense chief job: "Get it right this time."

The vice president has been diabolically successful in exploiting 9/11 to restore the Imperial Presidency to where it was before Congress and the public became such Nosy Parkers after Watergate. Mr. Cheney and Rummy have been less successful in their attempt to exorcise the post-Vietnam American skittishness about using force; their abysmal misadventure in Iraq has only reinforced it.

Mr. Kissinger's reasoning for favoring war in Iraq had none of the idealistic gloss about democracy that the president came up with later. Like Mr. Cheney, he thought it was a good idea to invade Iraq not because it was strong, but because it was weak.

DOJ_NMG_0074742

"We need to humiliate" radical Islam, he told Mr. Gerson, and send the message that "we're not going to live in this world that they want for us."

Half a century of foreign affairs experience, and he still doesn't understand that humiliating young Arab men — and occupying Muslim land — just radicalizes them? We're expanding terror at a cost of about $6 billion a month.

8 G.I.'s Die In Baghdad, Most In A Day Since '05 (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 3 — Eight United States soldiers were killed Monday in Baghdad, the United States military said, the most in the capital in a day since July 2005.

Four of the soldiers died in a roadside bomb attack; the four others were killed by small-arms fire in separate incidents.

Monday's loss also represented one of the highest nationwide death tolls for American troops in the past year. In late August, nine soldiers and a marine were killed in a day. But before that, the last time eight or more soldiers were killed in hostile action was last November.

"Obviously this was a tragic day, with eight killed in 24 hours," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman.

The deadly day set back efforts by American and Iraqi troops to tame the sectarian violence that continues to besiege the capital. Since August, the military has made securing Baghdad a priority, pouring in additional troops and conducting neighborhood sweeps.

But the violence has continued, spiking over the last week with the start of the holy month of Ramadan. Military officials said last week that suicide bombings in Baghdad were at a record. At least 17 soldiers and marines have been killed since Saturday, most in Baghdad or Anbar Province, where fierce fighting continues between marines and Sunni insurgents.

According to the Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent group that compiles figures based on information from the American military, 74 soldiers and marines were killed in Iraq in September, the highest number since April, when 76 died.

The violence also claimed 51 civilians across the country on Tuesday, The Associated Press reported.

In the capital, an explosion at a fish market in Saidiya, in the southwest, just before 7 a.m. killed two people and wounded 10, an Interior Ministry official said. Just 15 minutes later, a mortar attack in Dora, a neighborhood in southern Baghdad that American and Iraqi troops have been trying to secure, killed two civilians and wounded five others, the official said.

Later in the day, four Iraqis were kidnapped as they left the Green Zone, which is home to the Iraqi government and American officials and workers. They were seized by gunmen who then sped off in three Toyota Land Cruisers, the official said.

On orders from Jawad Bolani, the interior minister, a high-ranking police commander was suspended Tuesday and taken into custody pending an investigation into a brazen kidnapping of 26 food-processing workers on Sunday in Amel, in western Baghdad. The bodies of at least 10 of them were found shortly afterward.

The commander, who was not identified, is being investigated because of what Brig. Abdul Kareem Khalaf, a ministry spokesman, described as the colonel's slow response to the kidnapping.

"The regiment's commander had enough force to interfere, but the ministry is investigating why he didn't do it," he said.

A spokesman for the Iraqi High Tribunal said Tuesday that it would reconvene on Oct. 16 for Saddam Hussein's trial but that it would not issue a verdict, as had been expected. Mr. Hussein and seven other former officials are accused of crimes against humanity for their roles in the killing of Shiites in Dujail in 1982, after an assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein, a Sunni.

A radical Sunni group, Ansar al-Sunnah, claimed responsibility on Tuesday for the shooting death of a cousin of the radical Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr. The cousin, Dr. Namat al-Yassin, was shot to death last week near her home in Al Jamiah, in western Baghdad, said Fuad al-Turfi, an aide to Mr. Sadr. The claim of responsibility, posted on a militant Islamic Web site, could not be immediately verified.

A government organization responsible for overseeing Shiite mosques issued a report on Tuesday that offered another window into the sectarian violence that has plagued Iraq since the destruction of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February.

In the two and a half years before then, going back to August 2003, there were only 80 attacks on Shiite mosques, the report said. In the eight months since the Samarra bombing, there have been 69. More than 1,700 people have been killed in such attacks since 2003.

Violence In Iraq Leaves At Least 51 Dead (AP-Y)

By Lee Keath

AP, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074743

A suicide bomber unleashed a blast in a Baghdad fish market Tuesday and two Shiite families were found slain north of the capital as violence across Iraq claimed at least 51 lives.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the deaths of nine soldiers and two Marines in what has been a deadly period for American forces in Iraq. The announcement brought to at least 15 the number of servicemembers killed in fighting since Saturday.

Sunni politicians expressed worries over a new government plan to stop sectarian violence. The plan, announced a day earlier by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, won some praise in parliament Tuesday, but Shiite and Sunni leaders delayed potentially contentious talks to work out its details.

The four-point plan calls for creating neighborhood Shiite-Sunni committees to monitor efforts against sectarian violence. The aim is to overcome the deep mistrust between Sunnis and Shiites.

Many Sunnis remain skeptical that Shiite leaders will allow security forces to crack down more strongly on Shiite militias blamed for killing Sunnis — including some linked to parties in the government.

"I haven't seen any real desire in the other side. There are militias supported by the government," said Sunni lawmaker Khalaf al-Alayan.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said that under the plan, parties that have militias have agreed to take "responsibility for what their groups or people under them are doing, ... committing themselves to ending the sectarian violence."

Still, "there are forces that are not under their control," Khalilzad said in an interview with National Public Radio. "But if they implement what they've agreed to, there should be a significant decrease in the level of violence in Baghdad."

Another lawmaker, Izzat Shabandar, from the secular Iraqi Bloc, cautioned "we have to be realistic."

"Those who signed this blessed agreement have to confess, at least to themselves, they are the basis of the problem and they are part of it," he said.

Al-Maliki's government has been under intense pressure to put an end to Shiite-Sunni violence that has killed thousands of people this year and raised fears of civil war. This week, gunmen carried out two mass kidnappings in as many days, abducting 38 people from workplaces in Baghdad — attacks that Sunnis said were carried out by Shiite militias.

Some 400 Sunnis marched Tuesday at the site of one of the kidnappings — a frozen meat factory in Baghdad's Amil district — demanding the government put a stop to the violence. Some carried banners reading "get police troops out of our area" — reflecting the widespread suspicion that Shiite-led security forces have been infiltrated by militias.

Gunmen took 24 workers from the factory on Sunday and the bodies of seven were later found dumped in the capital. The fate of the others is not known.

The Interior Ministry said the police commander for the Amil district had been discharged and arrested for investigation in the kidnapping — a possible response to Sunni complaints that Shiite-led security forces allow militias to operate freely.

Earlier Tuesday, a suicide bomber detonated a belt rigged with explosives in an outdoor fish market in the primarily Sunni area of Sadiyah in southwestern Baghdad, killing three people and wounding 19, police said.

Hours later, four mortars hit homes in another Sunni district, killing seven people and wounding 25.

The mixed city of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, saw a string of deadly attacks. Gunmen opened fire on a Shiite family trying to flee the city, killing five of them. Later, the bodies of a woman and two men lay on the street near the family truck, billowing smoke.

In addition, eight people were killed in another shooting in Baqouba, and two others died in a roadside bombing.

Attacks elsewhere in Baghdad and around the country killed 16 other people.

Ten more bodies also were found, the apparent victims of sectarian slayings. They included seven bodies in an area north of Baqouba, identified as a father, three sons and three other relatives from a Shiite family.

In the mainly Shiite south, the bodies of two women — one beheaded, the other burned — were found in Kut, while a former army officer was discovered dead and handcuffed in Amarah.

Talks on creating joint security committees to end the violence must tackle a range of issues — including how many members will be on the panels, the proportion of Shiites and Sunnis and which areas of Baghdad they will cover.

The intent is that each committee will oversee the effort against violence in its district — with a central body overseeing them and working with security forces. But it still must be decided what powers the committees will have and how decisions will be reached. Every month, the parties will meet to review progress.

Sunnis hope the committees will give them a voice to ensure that security forces go after Shiite militias. But it remains unclear whether the new system will lead to tougher action. Shiite leaders insist the main problem is attacks by Sunni insurgents.

Al-Alayan, the Sunni lawmaker, said the two sides made progress in talks over the weekend and agreed on banning weapons and militias. But when a representative of Muqtada al-Sadr, a radical Shiite cleric who holds a place in the government and heads a powerful militia, joined talks Monday, "everything was overturned" and the ban was put aside.

DOJ_NMG_0074744

Still, al-Sadr's party signed onto the new security plan.

Termination Set For Iraq Monitor (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Congress has set a 2007 termination date for the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction at the behest of the Bush administration, removing the source of a series of audit reports that have emboldened critics of the president's war polices.

The just-completed Pentagon authorization bill ends SIGIR, as the post is called, on Oct. 1, 2007. The bill, which has yet to be signed by President Bush, calls for the work to be transferred to inspectors general for the Pentagon, the U.S. Agency for International Development and the State Department. State runs reconstruction in Iraq.

Stuart W. Bowen Jr., a former Bush aide whom the president appointed as special inspector general in January 2004, has issued a series of reports and audits on a reconstruction effort dogged by incessant insurgent attacks and mismanagement.

His critical reports generally pleased Democrats, whose 2006 campaign theme is that the White House has mismanaged all aspects of the Iraq war. But the audits rankle some in the military and at State, who say they glossed over progress made in the face of daily threats of violence.

Mr. Bowen's tenure became a hot topic in the Senate-House conference this summer to reconcile the authorization bill's two versions. Senate Democrats backed an amendment that gave Mr. Bowen authority over about $6 billion in new funds for Iraq. That language would keep SIGIR in operation past next fall, perhaps for several years.

House conferees agreed to the new authority, but then won approval of language shutting down SIGIR next Oct. 1. An administration source said the date was added at the behest of the State Department.

Mr. Bowen's basic mission is to monitor about $21 billion in special money called the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund.

A State Department official, who asked not to be named, said yesterday that the department always has supported SIGIR's work and endorsed the Senate proposal to expand its authority to new funds.

But, the official said, the department thinks that "at a certain point, when you are no longer spending special money, it is important to return to normal IG supervision, as has always been the case in the past and as is already ongoing in many parts of Iraq now. We are strong supporters of SIGIR, but when the special funds for Iraq have been expended, it is appropriate the office would close, as was originally envisioned."

The original legislation creating SIGIR set up a formula under which it would go out of existence when the vast majority of all special funds were spent, likely sometime next year.

James P. Mitchell, Mr. Bowen's spokesman, said, "Of course, whatever Congress wants us to do we will do."

There is a loophole. The authorization bill states that if the U.S. obligates "a major new commitment of U.S. funds," Congress may revisit the issue and extend the termination date. Another factor: If Democrats retake control of Congress, SIGIR's supporters would be in a better position to extend its life.

In his last report to Congress in July, Mr. Bowen said his office had initiated 236 investigations and issued 65 reports that produced savings of more than $10 million. He warned of growing corruption in Iraq that threatened to sap rebuilding efforts at the rate of $4 billion a year in Iraqi funds.

In Bill's Fine Print, Millions To Celebrate Victory (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — Even as the Bush administration urges Americans to stay the course in Iraq, Republicans in Congress have put down a quiet marker in the apparent hope that V-I Day might be only months away.

Tucked away in fine print in the military spending bill for this past year was a lump sum of $20 million to pay for a celebration in the nation's capital "for commemoration of success" in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Not surprisingly, the money was not spent.

Now Congressional Republicans are saying, in effect, maybe next year. A paragraph written into spending legislation and approved by the Senate and House allows the $20 million to be rolled over into 2007.

The original legislation empowered the president to designate "a day of celebration" to commemorate the success of the armed forces in Afghanistan and Iraq, and to "issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate ceremonies and activities."

The celebration would honor the soldiers, sailors, air crews and marines who served in Iraq and Afghanistan, and it would be held in Washington, with the $20 million to cover the costs of military participation.

DOJ_NMG_0074745

Democrats called attention to the measure, an act that Republicans are likely to portray as an effort to embarrass them five weeks before the midterm election. The Democrats said both the original language and the extension were pushed by Senate Republicans. A spokesman for the Republican-controlled Senate Armed Services Committee said it was protocol not to identify sponsors of such specific legislation.

The overall legislation was approved in the Senate by unanimous consent and overwhelmingly in the House after a short debate.

Democrats nevertheless said they were not pleased.

"If the Bush administration had spent more time planning for the postwar occupation of Iraq, and less time planning 'mission accomplished' victory celebrations, America would be closer to finishing the job in Iraq," said Rebecca M. Kirszner, communications director for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

Lt. Col. Brian Maka, a Pentagon spokesman, said late Tuesday that the event was envisioned as an opportunity for "honoring returning U.S. forces at the conclusion" of operations in Afghanistan and Iraq. "As the funds were not used in F.Y. 2006," the official said, using the initials for fiscal year, "the authorization was rolled over into F.Y. 2007."

Judges Postpone Verdict In Saddam Trial (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra

AP, October 3, 2006

Judges postponed their verdict in Saddam Hussein's trial Tuesday, a long-awaited decision that once held out the hope of healing Iraq's wounds but now threatens to spark even more sectarian violence.

The verdict had been expected on Oct. 16 but was delayed until at least the end of the month while judges take extra time to review the evidence and make sure their case is airtight.

But no matter how well crafted, the verdict could worsen violence that is already claiming dozens of lives daily. A death sentence for the former leader could enrage his Sunni Muslim supporters, while anything less is sure to infuriate Shiites who were oppressed under Saddam's regime.

That dilemma is a far cry from the hopes of many U.S. and Iraqi officials when the war crimes trial began nearly a year ago. They touted the tribunal as a way to help heal Iraq's divisions by exposing atrocities during Saddam's regime, establishing justice and opening the door for reconciliation.

"I think it would be a positive, not a negative," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday when asked about the prospect of a verdict, which had been expected on Oct. 16. "It would just bring closure to a chapter that was an unhappy and unpleasant and particularly vicious regime."

In the past year, however, Shiite-Sunni divisions have grown, with thousands killed by Sunni insurgents and death squads from both Islamic sects.

After nine months of often stormy court sessions, many Sunnis — who are a minority in Iraq but were dominant under Saddam — still see the tribunal as a show trial by the new Shiite leadership to take revenge on the ousted president.

"There is sympathy with Saddam, especially because what we see now makes many nostalgic for him," said Khalaf al-Alayan, a Sunni parliament member, referring to the violence in Iraq since Saddam's ouster by U.S.-led forces in April 2003. "So there could be a reaction if there is a death sentence."

Meanwhile, Shiites have made clear they will only accept execution for the leader whose regime persecuted their majority community and the Kurds.

"Anything less than a death sentence will be a neglect of justice," Hassan al-Suneid, a Shiite lawmaker. "I think it could be a disaster."

Saddam and seven co-defendants face possible execution by hanging if found guilty on charges of crimes against humanity over a crackdown on Shiites in the town of Dujail launched in 1982. A five-judge panel will decide the ruling by a majority vote.

The judges adjourned July 27 to consider their ruling, and had been expected to announce it Oct. 16.

Court spokesman Raid Juhi told the Associated Press a session will be held Oct. 16, but it "will not be for the verdict. It's for the judges' review of the evidence." He did not say when the verdict would be issued.

A court official, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not allowed to release the information, said the verdict could be put off until late October or early November.

Juhi did not link the delay to worries over tensions in Iraq. He said the judges have been reviewing the evidence and testimony from the trial to determine "whether it is complete or is lacking." He said the judges will decide whether they need more information.

DOJ_NMG_0074746

The intense review of the evidence aimed to ensure that the verdict — which will be accompanied by a report explaining the court's reasoning — is airtight and can be fully justified in the face of criticism from either side, the court official said.

A guilty verdict for Saddam is widely expected — but the official suggested there were differences over what sentence to impose and that the judges were aware that violence was possible either way.

"The verdict mustn't be weakly supported, it has to be accepted and not raise doubts," al-Suneid said.

The Dujail trial, which began Oct. 19, is the first for Saddam. A second trial of the former Iraqi leader and six other co-defendants began Aug. 21 on genocide charges for their alleged roles in a 1987-1988 crackdown against Kurdish rebels.

The genocide trial was adjourned last week until Monday after a stormy session during which the chief judge expelled all the defendants amid a boycott of the trial by the defense lawyers.

Saddam and his co-defendants can appeal any verdict, but if a sentence is upheld Iraqi law says it must be carried out within 30 days after appeals are finished.

The Dujail trial heard extensive testimony from Shiite survivors of the crackdown, recounting torture while in prison and the deaths of loved ones. The crackdown was sparked by a 1982 assassination attempt on Saddam.

Hundreds of Dujail residents were arrested, some tortured to death, and 148 Shiites were sentenced to death for involvement in the attempt to kill Saddam. The prosecution argued they were executed after a fake trial and that the crackdown aimed to punish the entire town.

The key evidence against Saddam was a series of documents signed by him — the order for the 148 to be put on trial, the approval of their death sentences and an approval of rewards for several intelligence officers.

The defense argued the crackdown was justified in response to the assassination attempt, a feeling shared by many Sunnis.

"If a police car passes and gets shot at, what does it do? Doesn't it shoot back? So how can a president respond when there's an attempt to kill him?" Sunni lawmaker al-Alayan said.

Saddam's defenders also maintain the documents don't constitute a crime against humanity since he was performing his constitutional role in ordering suspects put on trial, then signing off on the verdict.

Simone Monasebian, a former prosecutor in the U.N. war crimes tribunal for Rwanda, said the judges may hope for a change in the law to enable a stay of execution on the first verdict until the second trial's verdict is delivered.

"Politically, (the judges) are not ready (to rule) because of their fear of the insurgency. Procedurally they are not ready because they might have to execute him before the next trial is completed," said Monasebian, an international law professor at New Jersey's Seton Hall University. "And thirdly they are not ready (because) they haven't reviewed the evidence."

Judges Postpone Saddam Verdict To Review Evidence (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, October 4, 2006

BAGHDAD — Judges have postponed the verdict in the first war crimes trial of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein to review the evidence, the court said Tuesday.

The delay came amid concern that any ruling will further inflame Iraq's Sunni-Shiite tensions.

“There is sympathy with Saddam, especially because what we see now makes many nostalgic for him,” said Khalaf al-Alayan, a Sunni parliament member. “So there could be a reaction if there is a death sentence.”

Sunni Arabs were favored under Saddam's regime. Many Shiites have made clear they will accept only execution for the former dictator, whose regime persecuted their majority community and the Kurds.

“Anything less than a death sentence will be a neglect of justice,” said Hassan al-Suneid, a lawmaker from the Shiite Dawa Party. “I think it could be a disaster.”

Saddam and seven co-defendants face possible execution by hanging if found guilty on charges of crimes against humanity stemming from a crackdown on Shiites in the town of Dujail in the 1980s.

The five-judge panel had been expected to announce its verdict Oct. 16, when it reconvenes for the first time since adjourning July 27. Court spokesman Raid Juhi said the Oct. 16 session will be held but “will not be for the verdict. It's for the judges' review of the evidence.” He did not say when the verdict would be issued.

A second trial of the former Iraqi leader and six co-defendants began Aug. 21 on genocide charges for their alleged roles in a bloody 1987-88 crackdown against Kurdish rebels. It was adjourned last week until Oct. 9.

U.S. and Iraqi officials say the tribunals are part of a healing process between Iraq's divided communities that has exposed the truth about atrocities by Saddam's regime, established justice and opened the door for reconciliation.

“I think it would be a positive, not a negative,” Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Monday about a verdict. “It would just bring closure to a chapter that was an unhappy and unpleasant and particularly vicious regime.”

DOJ_NMG_0074747

In the year since the tribunal began, however, violence between Shiites and Sunnis has increased.

On Tuesday, a suicide bomber detonated a belt rigged with explosives in a fish market in the primarily Sunni area of Sadiyah in southwestern Baghdad. Police Lt. Maitham Abdul Razzaq said three people were killed and 19 were wounded. In Baqouba, 22 people were killed, police said. At least 27 other people were killed across Iraq.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the deaths of nine soldiers and two Marines, bringing to at least 15 the number of servicemembers killed since Saturday.

Sunni politicians expressed worries over a new government plan to stop sectarian violence. The plan, announced a day earlier by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, won some praise in parliament Tuesday, but Shiite and Sunni leaders delayed potentially contentious talks to work out its details.

In an interview with National Public Radio, U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad said that under the plan, parties that have militias have agreed to take "responsibility for what their groups or people under them are doing."

'Disguise The Fee' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

Most of the world would like to forget about the United Nations Oil for Food swindle -- who remembers Saddam Hussein anyway? -- so it's worth cheering that at least someone is still on the case. In eight months of hearings, lead Australian investigator Terence Cole has been busy unveiling how this corruption worked.

For readers who haven't followed the proceedings, the Cole Commission followed the scent left by Paul Volcker. Last year, the former Fed Chairman's Oil for Food probe fingered AWB Ltd., formerly the Australian Wheat Board, for funneling $221.7 million in foreign currency to Iraq through third-party payoffs disguised as shipping fees.

AWB was Iraq's largest supplier of wheat. Its contract with Iraq's grain board required the shipment of wheat only to the Iraqi border. But in 1999, Baghdad demanded that AWB transport the grain into Iraq. That would have violated U.N. sanctions unless payment went through a U.N. escrow account. So AWB paid a Jordan-based shipping company, Alia Transportation, among others, to do the work. Alia -- surprise, surprise -- was partially owned by Saddam's Ministry of Transportation.

AWB's largesse made it one of the single-largest contributors to Mr. Hussein's purse, and so Prime Minister John Howard commissioned Mr. Cole to investigate. The retired judge and his staff trawled through documents and emails, cross-examined AWB's management, its shipping and transportation partners, and assorted Australian ministers. All this was done in the public eye.

Much of the media attention has focused on the political figures, but no clear link surfaced between Canberra and the goings-on at AWB. The far more interesting story rested with AWB's management -- especially managing director Andrew Lindberg, who had told the Volcker Commission he knew nothing about the illegal payments.

Yet AWB sued to have documents withheld from the inquiry, and its executives claimed they didn't remember hearing about illegal payments. It wasn't until a few days before the hearings closed last week that volumes of documents suddenly turned up. And on Thursday, the Cole Commission read a remarkable email sent from AWB's internal sales manager, Mark Emons, to British-based shipping firm Ronly Holdings on March 7, 2000. Mr. Emons outlined how AWB could circumvent U.N. sanctions.

After explaining that under U.N. and Australian policy, "no payment can be made directly to Iraq," Mr. Emons discusses why AWB might want to pay its kickbacks through Ronly: "It would be ideal from our point of view if we have a third party that handles the freight and trucking as an item. This not only saves us time but does disguise the fee."

In another email, AWB executive Darryl Borlase indicated that he believed the Iraqis planned to use the foreign currency to pay for hiding the bodies of dead Kurds: "The bunkers will have cement walls and floors so they are actually designed for burying the Kurds -- under the cement?" Asked about the email on cross-examination, Mr. Lindberg, the managing director, said, "I hope that wasn't said in a serious way." AWB executives have cause for worry. Under a 2002 Australian law, a person who "provides or collects funds" for terrorists, or "is reckless as to whether the funds will be used to facilitate or engage in a terrorist act," can get up to life in prison.

We're looking forward to Mr. Cole's final report, due November 24. Like Mr. Volcker's enlightening tome, it should demonstrate how Saddam's regime systematically bled money out of willing patrons, and all under the unwatchful sponsorship of the U.N. Secretary General.

Frist Draws Criticism For Comments On Taliban (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074748

Democrats criticized Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) yesterday for saying that the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and for favoring bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government.

Frist, who was traveling in Afghanistan, said Monday that Taliban fighters are too numerous and too popular to be defeated. "You need to bring them into a more transparent type of government," he said. "And if that's accomplished, we'll be successful."

Democrats accused Frist of trying to "cut and run" in Afghanistan, something Republicans have been accusing Democrats of seeking to do in Iraq.

"Senator Frist now suggests that the best way forward in Afghanistan is to coddle the Taliban by welcoming Taliban members into a coalition government, as if 9/11 had never happened," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said yesterday in a statement.

Democrats Assail Frist's Afghan Comments (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

The Associated Press, October 3, 2006

Democrats accused Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of waving a white flag of surrender for saying the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and favoring bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government.

Frist, who was traveling in Afghanistan, said Monday that Taliban fighters were too numerous and too popular to be defeated. "You need to bring them into a more transparent type of government," he said. "And if that's accomplished, we'll be successful."

The comments from the Tennessee Republican, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, come as President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney have accused Democrats of being weak on national security and adhering to a policy of retreat.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the United States went to war in Afghanistan to defeat the Taliban for its role with al-Qaida.

"Senator Frist now suggests that the best way forward in Afghanistan is to coddle the Taliban by welcoming Taliban members into a coalition government, as if 9/11 had never happened," Pelosi said Tuesday in a statement.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., in responding to Bush's criticism of Democrats, said: "His Republican leader in the Senate thinks America should empower the Taliban terrorists who aided and abetted Osama bin Laden."

Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said, "Doctors are supposed to wear the white coat, not wave the white flag. Dr. Frist's proposal to surrender to the Taliban ignores the fact that they enabled the 9/11 hijackers, give safe haven to al-Qaida and remain hell-bent on destroying Western civilization."

Frist is a heart surgeon.

In Afghanistan, Frist also said: "Approaching counterinsurgency by winning hearts and minds will ultimately be the answer. Military versus insurgency one-to-one doesn't sound like it can be won. It sounds to me ... that the Taliban is everywhere."

Amy Call, a spokeswoman for the senator, on Tuesday sought to clarify Frist's comments.

"While touring Afghanistan, Senator Frist made the observation that Afghan tribesman should be brought into the government or risk losing them to the Taliban," she said in a statement. "Giving the native tribes, often targeted by Taliban recruitment, a voice in the government will promote peace and prosperity in the region. Sen. Frist does not believe Taliban fighters — often foreign fighters who come to Afghanistan to further conflict — should be brought into the reconciliation process."

Democrats said that amounted to backpedaling and accused Frist of trying to "cut-and-run" in Afghanistan, something Republicans have been accusing Democrats of seeking to do in Iraq.

Stephen Hess, a George Washington University professor of media and public affairs, said Frist's comments could hurt Republicans in the upcoming midterm elections and would hurt Frist's own presidential ambitions.

"It is so far out of keeping with what Republicans are saying, and will need so much massaging by his press operatives, that it really casts in a new light the seriousness of him as a future Republican nominee for president," Hess said.

Afghanistan is suffering its heaviest insurgent attacks since a U.S.-led military force toppled the Taliban in late 2001 for harboring al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

Bush recently acknowledged setbacks in the training of Afghan police to fight against the Taliban resurgence but predicted eventual victory.

Frist Aims To Steer Farmers Away From Taliban (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074749

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said yesterday after visiting Afghanistan that the war there cannot be won without a political solution that draws in farmers who are being recruited by the Taliban.

But regional analysts and local Afghans said that for any deal to work the Taliban would have to be given a role in the government -- a chancy proposal given their ruthless devotion to Shariah, the Islamic law.

"We have to do a better job -- the Afghan government, the United States and the world community -- in capturing the hearts and minds of the Afghan people," Mr. Frist, Tennessee Republican, told CNN from Iraq after his daylong visit to Afghanistan.

Mr. Frist and Sen. Mel Martinez, Florida Republican, visited Kabul and Qalat, where they met with President Hamid Karzai, greeted U.S. troops and received briefings from military personnel.

Mr. Frist said the Taliban was actively recruiting in the rural areas of southern Afghanistan and more had to be done to bring Afghan tribesmen into the government.

"By day they are farmers, and by night they take up arms and are Taliban," he said. "If we reach out to them, and we are doing that aggressively, they won't be Taliban, but assimilated in the society there."

A statement released by Mr. Frist's office said the majority leader did not think Taliban fighters should be brought into the reconciliation process.

Shortly after the senators left, two gunbattles erupted in eastern Afghanistan, killing four Afghans and two U.S. troops, the Associated Press reported. A suicide bomber on a motorbike attacked a Canadian convoy in the southern city of Kandahar, but no troops were injured, a NATO spokesman said.

Afghanistan analysts say it will take more than persuading rural workers to defeat the Taliban insurgency.

"I think a future attempt to include the Taliban is probably going to have to go further than an amnesty," said Christopher Langton, the head of defense analysis at the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies.

"It might have to involve parties as far afield as Pakistan, and there is going to have to be a considerable measure of benefit to the Taliban," he said.

Although the Afghan government and its international allies understand the need for a political solution, it is not clear how it would work or whether the Taliban would be allowed to practice Shariah on a limited or regional basis.

"They have to gauge very carefully what the message is if they make the offer," Mr. Langton said.

One young Afghan businesswoman visiting Washington said many people still feared and resented the Taliban after their 1996-2001 rule, and warned that promoting the ethnic Pashtun Taliban could create dangerous ethnic divides.

A federal solution now is not the right path for Afghanistan, said the businesswoman, who asked that her name not be used out of fear of retribution in Kabul.

"We are not strong enough for a federal solution," she said.

If the Pashtuns have more powers to govern their own areas, Afghanistan's neighbors could take advantage of it, she said.

"We are not strong enough [to resist] the influence of our neighbors Pakistan and Iran."

Software Being Developed To Monitor Opinions Of U.S. (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — A consortium of major universities, using Homeland Security Department money, is developing software that would let the government monitor negative opinions of the United States or its leaders in newspapers and other publications overseas.

Such a “sentiment analysis” is intended to identify potential threats to the nation, security officials said.

Researchers at institutions including Cornell, the University of Pittsburgh and the University of Utah intend to test the system on hundreds of articles published in 2001 and 2002 on topics like President Bush’s use of the term “axis of evil,” the handling of detainees at Guantánamo Bay, the debate over global warming and the coup attempt against President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela.

A $2.4 million grant will finance the research over three years.

American officials have long relied on newspapers and other news sources to track events and opinions here and abroad, a goal that has included the routine translation of articles from many foreign publications and news services.

The new software would allow much more rapid and comprehensive monitoring of the global news media, as the Homeland Security Department and, perhaps, intelligence agencies look “to identify common patterns from numerous sources of information which might be indicative of potential threats to the nation,” a statement by the department said.

It could take several years for such a monitoring system to be in place, said Joe Kielman, coordinator of the research effort. The monitoring would not extend to United States news, Mr. Kielman said.

DOJ_NMG_0074750

"We want to understand the rhetoric that is being published and how intense it is, such as the difference between dislike and excoriate," he said.

Even the basic research has raised concern among journalism advocates and privacy groups, as well as representatives of the foreign news media.

"It is just creepy and Orwellian," said Lucy Dalglish, a lawyer and former editor who is executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

Andrei Sitov, Washington bureau chief of the Itar-Tass news agency of Russia, said he hoped that the objective did not go beyond simply identifying threats to efforts to stifle criticism about an American president or administration.

"This is what makes your country great, the open society where people can criticize their own government," Mr. Sitov said.

The researchers, using an grant provided by a research group once affiliated with the Central Intelligence Agency, have complied a database of hundreds of articles that it is being used to train a computer to recognize, rank and interpret statements.

The software would need to be able to distinguish between statements like "this spaghetti is good" and "this spaghetti is not very good — it's excellent," said Claire T. Cardie, a professor of computer science at Cornell.

Professor Cardie ranked the second statement as a more intense positive opinion than the first.

The articles in the database include work from many American newspapers and news wire services, including The Miami Herald and The New York Times, as well as foreign sources like Agence France-Presse and The Dawn, a newspaper in Pakistan.

One article discusses how a rabid fox bit a grazing cow in Romania, hardly a threat to the United States. Another item, an editorial in response to Mr. Bush's use in 2002 of "axis of evil" to describe Iraq, Iran and North Korea, said: "The U.S. is the first nation to have developed nuclear weapons. Moreover, the U.S. is the first and only nation ever to deploy such weapons."

The approach, called natural language processing, has been under development for decades. It is widely used to summarize basic facts in a text or to create abridged versions of articles.

But interpreting and rating expressions of opinion, without making too many errors, has been much more challenging, said Professor Cardie and Janyce M. Wiebe, an associate professor of computer science at the University of Pittsburgh. Their system would include a confidence rating for each "opinion" that it evaluates and would allow an official to refer quickly to the actual text that the computer indicates contains an intense anti-American statement.

Ultimately, the government could in a semiautomated way track a statement by specific individuals abroad or track reports by particular foreign news outlets or journalists, rating comments about American policies or officials.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington, said the effort recalled the aborted 2002 push by a Defense Department agency to develop a tracking system called Total Information Awareness that was intended to detect terrorists by analyzing troves of information.

"That is really chilling," Mr. Rotenberg said. "And it seems far afield from the mission of homeland security."

Federal law prohibits the Homeland Security Department or other intelligence agencies from building such a database on American citizens, and no effort would be made to do that, a spokesman for the department, Christopher Kelly, said. But there would be no such restrictions on using foreign news media, Mr. Kelly said.

Mr. Kielman, the project coordinator, said questions on using the software were premature because the department was just now financing the basic research necessary to set up an operating system.

Professors Cardie and Wiebe said they understood that there were legitimate questions about the ultimate use of their software.

"There has to be guidelines and restrictions on the use of this kind of technology by the government," Professor Wiebe said. "But it doesn't mean it is not useful. It can just as easily help the government understand what is going on in places around the world."

DOJ:

ICF's Caliber Wins $45M Department Of Justice Contract (WASHBIZ)

Washington Business Journal, October 4, 2006

Caliber, a research and consulting company that is part of ICF International, has been awarded a five-year contract worth $45 million to provide training and technical support for offices within the Department of Justice.

Fairfax-based Caliber will support the Office for Victims of Crime, Training and Technical Assistance Center and the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, National Training and Technical Assistance Center.

DOJ_NMG_0074751

Caliber will support a range of Justice Department tasks, including needs assessments, evaluations and education, marketing, and outreach to professionals working in related fields to assist the department in responding to emerging justice system issues.

Caliber was acquired by a year ago by Fairfax-based ICF, which recently raised $56 million in its IPO.

ICF (NASDAQ: ICFI) has more than 1,800 employees working from the company's headquarters and a handful of regional offices throughout the United States and abroad. The company was founded in 1969.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

HP Security Pro Vowed To Delete Records (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, Calif.-A Hewlett-Packard Co. security expert instructed an investigator to make "make absolutely sure" he deleted private phone records of non-HP employees obtained in the company's ill-fated effort to root out the source of boardroom leaks, a series of internal e-mails show.

Fred Adler, a former FBI agent working in HP's IT security investigations department, vowed in the Feb. 9 e-mail to investigator Arthur Molineaux that he would also delete records that were not the property of the computer and printer maker, according to congressional documents provided Monday to the Associated Press and other news outlets.

"As for the non-HP owned records you obtained and sent to me in an unsolicited, good faith attempt, please make absolutely sure you delete them as you stated you would," wrote Adler, who has previously been praised with another member of the security detail for sounding the alarms that HP's tactics might land it in legal trouble. "I will do the same."

An HP spokesman reached late Monday night declined to comment on the e-mail.

The e-mail was included in hundreds of pages of documents provided to the media by the congressional panel investigating HP's possibly criminal probe that has prompted the departure of three board members and three top employees.

To unmask the person who leaked private boardroom discussions to the media, HP investigators and third-party detectives combed through detailed phone logs of directors, journalists and former and current HP employees, and rummaged through trash, trailed targets when they went out of town.

Federal and state authorities are investigating whether HP insiders or contractors violated the law by obtaining the phone records through a shady practice known as "pretexting," in which the investigators impersonated their targets to trick the phone companies into coughing up private records.

In other revelations from the congressional documents, a private investigator hired by HP apparently contracted with a former reporter to develop a strategy for duping journalist Dawn Kawamoto of CNET's News.com into revealing her secret company source who divulged details of private boardroom discussions.

Kawamoto wrote a story based on an anonymous source, later identified as then-board member George Keyworth II, that detailed a private board retreat at a posh resort and prompted HP to renew a previously unsuccessful probe into boardroom leaks.

In an e-mail dated Feb. 6, Ronald DeLia of Security Outsourcing Solutions wrote to the HP team spearheading the probe, including then-ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker, Adler and others, that a former reporter named "Diane" suggested to him several strategies for tricking Kawamoto.

One recommended tactic to build trust was to send Kawamoto a tip with a piece of unannounced news set to break in the following days.

However, the investigators, who were planning to plant tracking software on the e-mail attachment to identify anyone it was forwarded to, were instructed to send the document at least 2 days before it is made public instead of just one, because "information obtained 2 days prior to its release has more of an 'insider feel,'" DeLia wrote.

"The reporter has to feel comfortable or have a sense the source is someone who has accurate information and is in a position to know," he wrote.

Also, HP investigators apparently coordinated with the company's media relations department to bait that e-mail with a juicy bit of unannounced real news in an attempt to "gain some major credibility" with Kawamoto, according to one e-mail from Hunsaker.

The investigators tried to lure the reporter with a piece of upcoming news concerning the appointment of a new leader for HP's handheld business unit, a plan that was cleared by then-Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, then-General Counsel Ann Baskins and Chief Executive Mark Hurd.

DOJ_NMG_0074752

In e-mails between HP security team members on Feb. 8 and 9, the investigators detail plans for Bob Sherbin, HP's head of public relations, to send the press release to Hunsaker at least two days before the public announcement.

The security squad would then install the tracer technology and send the message to Kawamoto.

Reached late Monday, Sherbin said he didn't know about the tracer technology and believed the press release would be used properly.

"I was acting under instruction from senior management, and I had every reason to believe that the material would be used properly," Sherbin said.

But the investigators first needed approval from Dunn and Hurd, which came in a Feb. 9 e-mail from Dunn to Hunsaker and Baskins: "I spoke with Mark and he is on board with the plan to use the info on new handheld leader," Dunn wrote.

Hurd later testified that he approved the plan but said he didn't recall authorizing the use of the tracer technology, which is not generally considered illegal.

The rigged e-mail was launched later that day, and one member of the security detail, Anthony Gentilucci had trouble containing his excitement.

"This is like waiting for the Apollo 13 spacecraft to emerge from the dark side of the moon," said Gentilucci, who has since resigned from HP.

The company said later that the tracer trick was unsuccessful, possibly because the software failed or Kawamoto didn't open the attachment.

Four days later, on Feb. 13, HP officially announced the news contained in the message that it was making its handheld business a separate unit within its Personal Systems Group division, and that former Sun Microsystems executive Dave Rothschild would lead the unit.

Ousted HP Chairwoman To Begin Chemotherapy For Ovarian Cancer (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, AP Business Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Ousted Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, who survived breast cancer and melanoma, was told by her doctors Tuesday she would need to begin chemotherapy treatments for advanced ovarian cancer, according to a person close to Dunn.

Dunn, 53, is scheduled to start her treatments Friday at the University of California at San Francisco for the recurrent cancer, the person, who asked to remain anonymous because a formal announcement wasn't planned, said late Tuesday.

Dunn, who orchestrated the HP boardroom spying probe that spawned criminal and congressional investigations, was diagnosed with the ovarian cancer in 2004, and had surgery in August on a metastasized tumor, family members have said.

She stepped down from the HP board last month amid an uproar over the spying campaign on directors and reporters that prompted the resignation of two other board members and the departure of three top HP employees.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to charge people in the probe, and the FBI and a congressional panel are also investigating.

Dunn testified last week before the panel, saying she didn't know about any potentially illegal tactics used in the investigation and wasn't responsible for the probe.

Dunn had beaten cancer twice before, stepping down in 2002 as CEO of fund management giant Barclays Global Investors to battle breast cancer and melanoma.

Shaw Group Reviews Stock-Option Awards (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 4, 2006

Stock-Option Awards Being Reviewed by Shaw Group After SEC Guidance on Measurement Date

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) -- Engineering and construction company The Shaw Group Inc. said Tuesday it's started a review of stock-option awards for its 2000 fiscal year to make sure they comply with federal guidelines issued after a scandal involving options grants.

Shaw Group, which has become a major contractor in post-Hurricane Katrina reconstruction efforts on the Gulf Coast, said its audit committee and management concluded Aug. 16 that neither the company nor any employees had engaged in illegal "backdating" activity dealing with past-option grants.

But the additional review began after the Securities and Exchange Commission provided more guidance on the measurement date for option grants, the company said.

The SEC and the Justice Department launched more than 80 investigations into companies nationwide over the possible manipulation and illegal reporting of stock option grants.

Many of those companies have revealed that they backdated grants, a practice in which options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price. The maneuver increases the potential windfall for the award recipient and could exaggerate a company's profit if not properly disclosed and recorded.

Options allow employees to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set "strike price" -- typically the price on the day the option is issued. If that exercise price is equal to the price on the grant date, the options have no initial value. By backdating the grant, the exercise price can be set at the lower level, giving the options instant value.

Shaw said the awards under review totaled about 1 million shares at a strike price of $42 per share or $21 per share split-adjusted and were in connection with the company's acquisition of Stone & Webster Inc.

The SEC has suggested the proper date for the awards may be the date upon which the list of recipients was finalized, rather than the date a company's board approved the award, Shaw said.

Depending upon the outcome of the review, Shaw said, it could recognize additional compensation expenses for 2001 through 2004. Should an additional non-cash expense have to be recorded, Shaw said it would determine whether the cost is material and whether earnings restatements would be required.

Shaw Group planned a conference call Wednesday morning to discuss its full year earnings guidance and other business matters.

Ex-Comverse CEO Granted Bail In Namibia (FINDLAW/AP)

By Celean Jacobson, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

(AP) - JOHANNESBURG, South Africa-The fugitive former CEO of software company Comverse Technology Inc. was granted bail by a Namibian court Tuesday while he awaits extradition to the United States to face charges for allegedly manipulating stock options.

Jacob "Kobi" Alexander was granted bail of about $1.3 million, his lawyer Richard Metcalfe said, on condition that he hands in his passport, is not allowed to leave the district of Namibia's capital Windhoek and has to report twice a week to an Interpol inspector.

"We are extremely pleased," Metcalfe said.

Alexander was arrested Sept. 26 in Windhoek at the request of the FBI after a two-month manhunt.

The Namibian government opposed bail at the request of the United States, arguing he could flee the country before a U.S. extradition request reached Namibian authorities.

However, Metcalfe said: "Magistrate Uatjo Uanivi found that the evidence presented for denying him bail were not convincing at all.

"There was no reason to believe he would not be willing to stay in Namibia pending extradition."

The U.S. has 30 days to lodge an extradition request from the date of Alexander's arrest. Only then will a formal hearing be held. U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said last week she would seek Alexander's swift extradition to face charges in federal court in the Brooklyn borough of New York.

Alexander only briefly referred to "the highly technical charges" against him during the first day of his bail hearing Monday and said he intends to plead not guilty.

In his affidavit filed with the court, Alexander, 54, an Israeli citizen, said he had been living in the desert country with his wife and three children since July and had transferred almost $16 million from Israel to Namibian commercial banks.

He said he entered the country legally, used his own name and did not try to hide his whereabouts from anyone.

Alexander, who has a two-year permit to live and work in Namibia, purchased a $500,000 house on the Windhoek Country Club Estate. His children attend the city's international school.

According to his statement, he has invested a further $1.5 million in various business ventures in Namibia with local partners.

Authorities began hunting for Alexander in late July shortly before a criminal complaint was unsealed accusing him and two other former top executives of fraud.

Before he disappeared, Alexander allegedly transferred $57 million to Israel.

It is alleged that from 1991 through 2005, Alexander earned about $6.4 million by backdating stock options.

Two other defendants, former finance chief David Kreinberg and former senior general counsel William Sorin, surrendered in August and were released on $1 million bond each.

The complaint unsealed in federal court accuses the three men of making stock options more lucrative by backdating their exercise price to a low point in the stock's value. Usually, a stock option's exercise price coincides with the market value at the time of a grant to give the recipient an incentive to drive the price higher.

DOJ_NMG_0074754

Prosecutors allege Kreinberg and Sorin earned about $1 million each on backdated options.

Several companies are under scrutiny by the Securities and Exchange Commission or the Department of Justice for possibly backdating stock option grants. Many other companies have launched internal probes of their stock option accounting practices.

Comverse also allegedly awarded thousands of stock options to fictional employees, then secretly transferred the awards to an internal account under the name I.M. Fanton, which stood for "phantom," court papers said. The scheme allowed Alexander to award those options to real "favored employees" and to himself without approval from Comverse's board of directors, the papers added.

Comverse Technology is headquartered in Woodbury, New York, giving Brooklyn prosecutors jurisdiction over the case.

Convicted Tyco Executives Seek Reversals From Appellate Court (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

Former Tyco International Ltd. executives L. Dennis Kozlowski and Mark H. Swartz asked a New York state appellate court to throw out their convictions almost 16 months after they were found guilty of charges that they systematically looted the Bermuda conglomerate.

In a brief filed with New York State Supreme Court's Appellate Division, lawyers for Mr. Kozlowski, Tyco's former chief executive, and Mr. Swartz, Tyco's former chief financial officer, said their convictions should be reversed and the indictment dismissed, arguing in part that neither man took anything to which they weren't entitled under the company's executive-compensation plan. They also argued that their sentences were excessive.

"In the post-Enron era in which this case was tried it was disappointing but, perhaps, not surprising, that a jury would not look kindly on corporate executives who received enormous compensation and extraordinary perks," Mr. Kozlowski's lawyers said in their brief. "We urge this court to disregard the tenor of the times and to focus on the overarching question raised on this appeal: Did Dennis Kozlowski take money from Tyco that he knew he was not entitled to receive and did he deliberately falsify Tyco's records? A careful review of the record provides the answer: No."

As they did at trial, Mr. Swartz's lawyers also argued that prosecutors provided "scant" evidence that he intended to commit a crime.

"The people failed to introduce legally sufficient evidence to meet their burden of proving that the bonuses were actually stolen," Mr. Swartz's lawyers argued in their brief. Lawyers for Messrs. Swartz and Kozlowski declined to comment further on the briefs.

In June 2005, a jury convicted Mr. Kozlowski, 59 years old, and Mr. Swartz, 46, of 22 of 23 counts each, including grand larceny, conspiracy and securities fraud, in connection with giant bonuses and other improper compensation they received while working as Tyco's top executives. They were each acquitted of one charge of falsifying documents. Their convictions followed a mistrial in the case in 2004.

In September 2005, each man was sentenced to 8 1/3 years to 25 years in prison, and they were ordered to pay a total of $240 million in fines and restitution.

In a 182-page brief, lawyers for Mr. Kozlowski argued in part that he was entitled to bonuses, a number paid as loan forgiveness, under the company's executive compensation plan, calling it "a classic case of crime by hindsight."

Why C.E.O.'s Aren't Sitting In The Dugout (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

Just over a year ago, the man who held the purse strings at a private company outside San Francisco began negotiating a new employment contract with the executive who ran the day-to-day operations.

The company had recently turned around, thanks in part to the executive, and the company, understandably, wanted to keep him. It offered him a salary of almost $1 million a year, which it considered in line with the market.

The executive asked for almost $1.4 million. But the company wouldn’t budge. Its message was simple: We like you and we want you to stay, but that doesn’t mean you can name your salary.

“Anytime you’re running a business, you have to set a value on employees relative to your business,” the part-owner in charge of the negotiations told me a couple of weeks ago. “And before any negotiation starts, you have to consider your alternatives.”

DOJ_NMG_0074755

So the executive and the company parted ways. It started interviewing other candidates, and he began interviewing for similar jobs elsewhere. Until the situation took an unexpected turn — and more on that later — an otherwise good relationship looked as if it was going to be ruined by money.

We know these details because the company in question was not an ordinary private company. It was the Oakland A's. The part-owner was Billy Beane, perhaps the best-known general manager in baseball. The executive was the team's on-field manager, Ken Macha.

One of the many baseball fans following this story last October was a retired banker named Robert L. Joss, who had become the dean of Stanford Business School after having been a vice chairman of Wells Fargo and the chief executive of an Australian bank. As he read the local newspaper accounts of the breakup between Mr. Beane and Mr. Macha, Mr. Joss was struck by a thought:

You'd never see this in corporate America.

It's difficult, in fact, to come up with a single example of a company and its chief executive splitting up over pay. Chief executives retire and are fired. But as long as they remain on the job, they evidently don't end up disagreeing with their boards about how valuable they are. The negotiation over a chief executive's pay is one that never seems to fail, which, of course, means that it isn't much of a negotiation at all. It's more like a friendly conversation.

There are all kinds of structural reasons for this lack of market discipline. Under the current voting rules for public companies, shareholders have scant power over executive pay. And board members are often chief executives themselves, with pay packages that are influenced by the going rate for other executives.

But the Ken Macha story is a wonderful allegory because it highlights a more subtly human problem with pay. When directors at a big company think they have found the right person for the job, they persuade themselves that no one else on earth could do it as well. They basically fall in love. Once that happens, almost no price seems too high.

The Oakland A's, however, can't afford to fall in love. Their modest budget allowed them to spend just $62 million on players this season, compared with the Yankees' $200 million payroll. As Michael Lewis explained in the 2003 best seller "Moneyball" — which made Mr. Beane semifamous — the A's need to exploit inefficiencies in baseball's talent market, finding undervalued players, to have any hope of winning.

The contrast between this hard-headed approach and corporate America's cult of personality was especially clear to Lewis Wolff, the A's 70-year-old managing partner who was both Mr. Beane's and Mr. Macha's boss. Before buying the A's last year, Mr. Wolff ran 20th Century Fox's real estate division for a time, and he now sits on the boards of two New York Stock Exchange companies.

"At my advanced age," Mr. Wolff said, laughing, "I'm learning from Billy."

Billy — as Mr. Beane is almost universally known — understood that Mr. Macha had real value as a manager. He helped the A's overcome a dreadful start in 2005 and go on a late-summer run that nearly won them another division title. But Mr. Beane also understood that the additional $400,000 a year his manager wanted was $400,000 the team wouldn't be able to spend on a player who could make the difference between second place and first.

So the team held firm, and one year ago this week, after the 2005 regular season ended, Mr. Macha returned home to the Pittsburgh suburb of Export, where he began looking for a manager's job with another team. On the plus side, the teams with openings generally gave their manager more of a say than Mr. Beane's carefully proscribed system did. But these other teams also weren't very good, and there was no guarantee that Mr. Macha would get one of the jobs anyway.

A week later, Mr. Macha received a handwritten note from Mr. Wolff. "You'll be successful at anything you do," it said, according to Mr. Macha. "Thanks for a great season."

The letter caused Mr. Macha to reconsider. That night, he called Mr. Beane, and they had a conciliatory conversation that ended with Mr. Beane saying, "What can I do to help you?" Within a few days, they signed a deal very similar to the one the A's had originally offered.

This season, despite a rash of injuries, the team built by Mr. Beane and run by Mr. Macha won its division again. While the Boston Red Sox (payroll: $120 million), Los Angeles Angels ($103 million) and San Francisco Giants ($91 million) have all been eliminated, the A's beat the Minnesota Twins, 3-2, in the first game of the American League playoffs yesterday. The two teams play again this afternoon.

As Mr. Joss, the Stanford dean, sees it, there is more than one lesson to the story. Certainly, board members should realize that no employee is irreplaceable. But they should also remember that they have great leverage in pay negotiations, because being a chief executive — like being a big-league manager — is an enormously appealing job.

"Not only is it good economically, but it's meaningful work: The executive is doing something he loves, and he is part of something," Mr. Joss said. "You wonder how many C.E.O.'s would really leave these jobs."

Here's one guess: very, very few.

DOJ_NMG_0074756

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Organizing School Violence Summit (AP-Y)

AP, October 3, 2006

President Bush said Tuesday he was "saddened and deeply concerned" about the recent string of violence in schools, including the deadly shooting in an Amish schoolhouse that killed five girls.

He said Americans have a responsibility to protect their children.

"Our school children should never fear their safety when they enter into a classroom," Bush said.

"Laura and I were saddened and deeply concerned, like a lot of citizens around the country, about the school shootings that took place in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Wisconsin. We grieve with the parents and we share the concerns of those who worry about safety in schools," Bush said.

The president spoke in a courtyard of the George W. Bush Elementary School. Inside, he visited young children practicing their reading in the school library named after his wife, Laura. The school has 858 students in grades kindergarten through seventh grade.

The Bush administration plans to bring education and law enforcement experts together for a conference on coming to grips with the problem and discuss federal action that can help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino told reporters.

Three schools have been hit by deadly attacks in the past week. A gunman killed himself and five girls Monday at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania; on Friday a 15-year-old Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal; and last Wednesday a man took six girls hostage in Colorado, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

"The president is deeply saddened and troubled by the recent school violence and shootings that have taken place in different communities across America," Perino said. "It breaks America's collective heart when innocent children who are at school to learn are violently taken hostage and cut down in their own schools."

Perino said the conference was still in the planning stages, so a specific date, location and other details were not ready to be announced. It was not clear whether President Bush would attend.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Bush's domestic policy adviser, Karl Zinsmeister, met Monday at the White House to discuss the conference. They met while the president was on a cross-country flight to begin a three-day fundraising trip for Republican candidates in the midterm election.

Perino said participants on the education side would include groups like the National Parent Teacher Association, school principals and teachers' unions. The Federal Bureau of Investigations would be among those representing law enforcement, she said.

Ed. Dept.: School Shootings Defy Answers (AP-Y)

By Ben Feller

AP, October 3, 2006

This is not what parents want to hear: Another school shooting is likely. There is no guarantee it won't happen in your town. And there's no sure way to stop it.

With the three deadly shootings in a week and the nation again searching for answers, school violence experts say there are solutions — just none that safeguard everyone.

"We'll probably never be in a place where we can assure everybody, without exception, that nothing will happen in our schools," said Bill Modzeleski, who oversees federal school safety for the Education Department. "Our schools are a reflection of our communities."

That's reality, experts say, in a nation of 50 million students and 100,000 schools. Yet from the Columbine massacre to an Amish schoolhouse, people ask: Why does it keep happening?

"I've been asked that question 1,000 times, and I have no answer," said Bill Bond, a former principal who counsels schools on coping with violence. "I don't think about anything else, and I still have no answer. When you have a shooting, it seems to breed others."

Schools have already been ramping up safety measures. Requiring visitors to sign in, hiring security guards, locking entrances, installing metal detectors — all are on the rise.

Yet there has been little evidence to prove those things work. Some research suggests they may even hurt by alienating students without boosting protection. In the shooting at Red Lake High School in Minnesota last year, the shooter blasted right past a metal detector.

DOJ_NMG_0074757

What does work, experts say, is changing the school culture. It's harder than it sounds.

It means building trust among children and adults, so that students are willing to pass on their concerns and adults are sensitive to signs of trouble. It also means having an emergency plan for different crises, one that people take seriously and practice.

"Students don't feel like they can turn to this system to protect them," said Judith Browne-Dianis, co-director of Advancement Project, a civil rights group. "They think the adults who are around them are there to crack down on them, instead of to help them."

The matter has become a presidential concern. President Bush has ordered a conference of education and law enforcement officials next week to help prevent shootings at schools. "Our schoolchildren should never fear their safety," Bush said in a visit Tuesday to a school named after him in Stockton, Calif.

Yet this is not new ground. In 2002 the Secret Service and the Education Department studied school shootings and found clear patterns.

School attacks are rarely done on impulse. They are planned, and other students often hear about them in advance. Schools should take those leaks seriously, no matter how veiled or goofy, said Mary Ellen O'Toole, an FBI agent who specializes in behavior analysis.

"In the past, schools and parents have been more inclined to let it just kind of blow off," she said.

Also, there is no accurate profile of students who engage in school violence — underscoring that incidents can happen seemingly at random. The same appears true for adults.

On Monday in Pennsylvania, a gunman took a girls hostage in an Amish schoolhouse, killing five, including two who died the next day. The shooter killed himself. He had apparently been motivated by a grudge unrelated to the school, and his wife called him a loving father.

Last week at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colo., a man singled out several girls as hostages in a school classroom and then killed one of them and himself.

On Friday, a school principal was shot to death in Cazenovia, Wis., and a 15-year-old student was charged with murder.

Kenneth Trump, a safety consultant, said schools have learned lessons since Columbine. But some still have a lax atmosphere about safety. They don't prepare for what could happen.

Until that changes, he said, "We're never going to get closer to solving this problem."

The deadly shootings in Colorado, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania may prompt more spending on metal detectors, said James Alan Fox, a professor of criminal justice at Northeastern University. But the money would be better spent on teachers and counselors who can watch for warning signs, he said.

Overall, schools remain safe places.

Violent crime at school fell from 1992 to 2002, according to the most recent federal data. During that time, students were over 70 times more likely to be murdered away from school than at school.

Yet as long as schools have kids, they will be targets.

Bond was the principal at Heath High School in Kentucky when a student shot eight students, killing three. He has since visited nine other schools recovering from shootings.

"I always think this is the last one I'll ever go to," he said, "but it just keeps happening."

__

On The Net:

Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools:

http://www.ed.gov/about/offices/list/osdfs/index.html?srcoc

Advancement Project:

http://www.advancementproject.org/

Slayings Spur Review Of Security At Schools (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Local school system officials say they have begun reviewing their emergency plans since a gunman killed five girls in a one-room schoolhouse in Pennsylvania's Amish country and then killed himself Monday.

"Whenever an event occurs like this, our people always take a look at it and see if there's anything that can be learned from it," said Paul Regnier, a spokesman for Fairfax County public schools, which has more than 160,000 students.

Mr. Regnier said that the school system has a widely disseminated security plan and that each school has its own plan that is reviewed annually by security officials.

DOJ_NMG_0074758

"We also are asking schools to review their own individual security plans," he said.

The school systems' review of security measures is proceeding after three school shootings nationwide in the past week.

Authorities in Pennsylvania said that Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, a milk-truck driver and father of three who lived in Lancaster County where the schoolhouse was located, stormed the building Monday morning and gunned down 10 girls.

Five girls remained hospitalized, four in critical condition.

Police said that Roberts had told his wife he had molested young children decades ago and left a note saying he had "dreams of molesting again."

On Friday, a teenage student at a school in Cazenovia, Wis., fatally shot his principal, authorities said. Eric Hainstock, 15, had been warned by the principal a day earlier about having tobacco on school grounds, police said.

Last Wednesday, a gunman took six girls hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colo. Duane Morrison, 53, sexually assaulted the girls and held them as human shields for hours before fatally shooting one girl and then himself.

Officials for Montgomery County public schools, which has more than 135,000 students, said they would study the incidents, which they said appear to be isolated and do not indicate that officials need to make immediate changes.

"We have a comprehensive security plan in place," schools spokesman Brian Edwards said. "We practice Code Red and Code Blue drills all the time."

The school system publishes a brochure to familiarize parents with the different alert levels, the responses associated with them and the procedures for reuniting parents with children.

John White, a spokesman for Prince George's County public schools, said that every principal in the school system receives crisis training annually. That training includes ensuring that school officials know best how to cooperate with first responders.

"Part of our training is teaching principals what they can do to allow police to respond even faster," said Mr. White, whose school system has more than 130,000 students. "The faster police can respond to an incident like that, the faster emergency personnel can treat any victims."

Schools Increase Vigilance As They React To Recent Shootings (ABC)

By Dan Harris

ABC News, October 4, 2006

Wraught Nerves and Lost Sleep Beset Students and School Administrators

Before class this morning at the Bromwell Elementary School in Denver, Colo., principal Jonathan Wolfer conducted his safety checks with extra vigilance.

"I have lost sleep in the last few days unfortunately, just thinking about what could happen," Wolfer said.

As students and administrators across the country react to the recent rash of school shootings, including this week's violence in an Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania, students at Passaic High School in New Jersey said they were nervous.

"Wow, imagine if that happens here? Imagine if that happens to me," said Luis Del Toro, a student at Passaic High School.

Education officials in Texas and Atlanta sent principals e-mail and text message reminders to be "particularly vigilant" right now.

The Texas note warned of copycat acts, saying, "As the similarities between the incidents in Bailey, Colo., and Paradise, Pa., demonstrate, acts of violence such as these have the potential to induce others to commit similar acts. We must never let our guard down when it comes to the safety of our students, and we must be particularly vigilant during the times surrounding such incidents, when the potential for copycat acts is at its highest."

Has Security Slipped?

At Passaic High School, principal Carlist Creech also passed that message along to his students and staff, reminding them to be on-guard. Experts on school violence worry that today's heightened alert will die down as the recent attacks fade into memory.

After the Columbine massacre, schools across the country drafted emergency response plans. But now, experts said, many schools devote limited time and resources to improving standardized test scores, which are often how schools are measured.

"That has become the No. 1 priority, and I'm afraid that school security has slipped," said Del Elliot at the University of Colorado at Boulder.

School violence experts also said government funding for surveillance cameras and emergency drills have been cut.

In 2002, the Justice Department's cops-in-schools program had a budget of $180 million. It's now at zero. Even schools where safety is a high priority said there's only so much they can or should do.

DOJ_NMG_0074759

"I want to create a safe learning environment, and I don't know if a safe environment includes barbed wires and metal detectors," said Wolfer.

Del. Revisits Security After School Incidents (WlmngtnNJ DE)

By EDWARD L. KENNEY And JENNIFER BROOKS, The News Journal

Wilmington News Journal (DE), October 4, 2006

Despite precautions, schools cannot be made immune to violence

Pencader Charter High School Principal Dave Jones asked the school's security company to check all the locks Tuesday.

With the spate of school shootings -- including Monday's massacre at an Amish school in Lancaster County, Pa. -- Jones wanted to make sure intruders wouldn't be able to get into the school near New Castle, which was once an office building.

Side doors feature magnetic locks that can be opened only with staff security cards, and visitors have to be buzzed inside.

"It's just a frightening commentary on American society when you have these kinds of things happening at schools," Jones said.

The gravity of the situation -- the nation's third school shooting in a week -- reached the Oval Office, with President Bush calling for a national conference on school violence.

"Our schoolchildren should never fear [for] their safety when they enter into a classroom," Bush said during a visit to the George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton, Calif. "Laura and I were saddened and deeply concerned, like a lot of citizens around the country, about the school shootings that took place in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Wisconsin. We grieve with the parents and we share the concerns of those who worry about safety in schools."

The president instructed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings to call a meeting to talk about how to prevent school violence and help communities deal with the aftermath.

The conference will be held next Tuesday.

But Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., says the administration has undercut programs to protect students -- programs like COPS, which came from the crime-prevention bill Biden sponsored in 1994.

The program provided millions to communities to hire extra police, including 6,424 officers to work in schools. Delaware hired 13 officers through the program.

The budget for the COPS in Schools program has been eliminated for the past two years, Biden said. Another $10 million to help law enforcement improve its emergency communications also has been eliminated.

If he were in the room during next week's summit, Biden said, he would push for restored funding for school police and new funds to help local law enforcement prepare for the unthinkable.

But some Delaware parents said only so much can be done to keep schools safe.

"There are strange people everywhere, and you can run into them wherever you may be," said Pam Tompkins, whose child is a senior at Charter School of Wilmington. "It can happen in a store and it can happen in an office. You can't let fear run your life. It doesn't mean you don't go shopping or don't go to work."

Pat Heffernan is co-president of the Brandywine Special Needs PTA, and he has two children in Brandywine schools and one at a private school.

"If you try to be rational about it, it's not very likely," he said of the chances of a shooting. "You're more likely to be killed driving to the airport, and you're more likely to get killed driving to school than you are at the school.

"In the grand scheme of things, it's still pretty safe," he said. "It's these headline-grabbing things that people start to notice. Everyone's concerned, and everyone who drops their kid off at school wants them to be safe. I'm not one to say we should be doing less than we're doing. But we can't have armed guards outside of every class."

Lora Fulton's daughters attend schools in the Red Clay Consolidated School District.

"If a community like the Amish community has that kind of thing going on to the kids, then the city is that much more unsafe, in my opinion," she said. "Schools have open doors. You can walk in and walk out at any time."

While one daughter attends Stanton Middle School, Fulton said she feels better about safety at Baltz Elementary in Christiana Hundred, where school uniforms are required. "If anybody comes in without a uniform, they're stopped," she said.

At Newark's McVey Elementary School, teacher Paul Sedacca "heard at the staff meeting that one woman kept her kid home," because of the Lancaster shooting.

But several school principals contacted Tuesday said no parents had called to discuss safety concerns.

"No calls at all," said Ted Boyer, principal at A.I. du Pont Middle School near Greenville.

Middletown High Principal Donna Mitchell hasn't had any, either. But her school continues to take precautions.

"We've instituted the ID badges for students this school year, and they have to wear them at all times," she said. "We created a lobby in order to funnel all the public through so they can't get to the students. It's a computerized system."

DOJ_NMG_0074760

The staff has talked about the violence, though.

"Anytime something happens, it increases the awareness," Mitchell said. "Teachers are absolutely aware of it, and we have a heightened sense of who's where and why."

The school psychologist, five counselors, two nurses and other staff members are among members of the school's safety team. Mitchell said they have been instructed to pay "acute attention to students' reactions, fears, anxiety, depression ... because events such as these trigger all kinds of emotions."

Like other schools, Middletown High holds lockdown drills, mimicking what would happen if an intruder got inside the school. The most recent drill was only a week and a half ago.

Jones also hasn't fielded any calls of concern from parents.

But he said he has had "very serious and frank discussions" with school board members about security. "We're investigating the possibility of metal detectors at the front door," he said. Contact Edward L. Kenney at 324-2891 or ekenney@delawareonline.com. Contact Jennifer Brooks at (202) 906-8117 or jabrooks@gns.gannett.com

SOME FATAL SHOOTINGS THAT TOOK PLACE AT U.S. SCHOOLS IN RECENT YEARS

Some fatal shootings at U.S. schools in recent years:

2006

· Oct. 2: A gunman took a group of girls hostage at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania's Lancaster County, killing five, including two who died the next day. The shooter, Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, killed himself.

· Sept. 29: Fifteen-year-old Eric Hainstock brought two guns to a school in rural Cazenovia, Wis., and fatally shot the principal, a day after the principal gave him a disciplinary warning for having tobacco on school grounds, police said.

· Sept. 27: Duane Morrison, 53, took six girls hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colo. Morrison sexually assaulted them and used them as human shields for hours before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

· Aug. 24: Christopher Williams, 27, went to an elementary school in Essex, Vt., looking for his ex-girlfriend, a teacher. He couldn't find her and fatally shot one teacher and wounded another, police said. Williams also killed his ex-girlfriend's mother, according to authorities. He shot himself twice in the head after the rampage and was arrested.

2005

· March 21: Sixteen-year-old Jeff Weise shot and killed five schoolmates, a teacher and an unarmed guard at a high school on the Red Lake Indian Reservation in Minnesota before taking his own life. Weise had earlier killed his grandfather and his grandfather's companion.

2004

· Nov. 22: Sixteen-year-old Desmond Keels is accused of fatally shooting one student and wounding three others outside Strawberry Mansion High in Philadelphia. The attack apparently was over a $50 debt in a rap contest. Keels faces a murder trial this month.

2003

· April 24: Fourteen-year-old James Sheets shot and killed the principal in the crowded cafeteria of a junior high school in the south-central Pennsylvania town of Red Lion, before killing himself.

2000

· May 26: Thirteen-year-old Nathaniel Brazill killed his English teacher on the last day of classes in Lake Worth, Fla., after the teacher refused to let him talk with two girls in his classroom. He was convicted of second-degree murder and is serving a 28-year sentence.

1999

· April 20: Students Eric Harris, 18, and Dylan Klebold, 17, killed 12 students and a teacher and wounded 23 before killing themselves at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo.

1998

· May 21: Two teenagers were killed and more than 20 people hurt when a teenage boy opened fire at a high school in Springfield, Ore., after killing his parents. Kip Kinkel, 17, was sentenced to nearly 112 years in prison.

· May 19: Three days before his graduation, an honor student opened fire at a high school in Fayetteville, Tenn., killing a classmate who was dating his ex-girlfriend. Jacob Davis, 18, was sentenced to life in prison.

· March 24: Two boys, ages 11 and 13, fired on their Jonesboro, Ark., middle school from nearby woods, killing four girls and a teacher and wounding 10 others. Both boys were later convicted of murder and can be held until age 21.

1997

· Dec. 1: Three students were killed and five wounded at a high school in West Paducah, Ky. Michael Carneal, then 14, later pleaded guilty but mentally ill to murder and is serving life in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0074761

· Oct. 1: Sixteen-year-old Luke Woodham of Pearl, Miss., fatally shot two students and wounded seven others after stabbing his mother to death. He was sentenced the following year to three life sentences.

-- Associated Press

A Pattern In Rural School Shootings: Girls As Targets (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock And Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, October 4, 2006

NICKEL MINES, PA., AND BOSTON

The scene Monday at the buff-colored, one-room schoolhouse in the gentle heart of Amish country was wrenching, but also distressingly familiar.

One of four fatal school shootings to beset rural America in just over a month, the rampage that killed five young girls raises anew a host of old concerns - about campus security in countryside settings, access to guns by unstable individuals, and "copycat" violence advanced by media attention.

They are startling incidents against the backdrop of declining numbers of school fatalities. But this premeditated attack, like another one five days earlier in which a drifter corraled teenage girls, killing one, at the high school in Bailey, Colo., have an unusual and disturbing feature: girls as targets.

"The predominant pattern in school shootings of the past three decades is that girls are the victims," says Katherine Newman, a Princeton University sociologist whose recent book examines the roots of "rampage" shootings in rural schools.

Dr. Newman has researched 21 school shootings since the 1970s. Though it's impossible to know whether girls were randomly victimized in those cases, she says, "in every case in the US since the early 1970s we do note this pattern" of girls being the majority of victims.

The two cases are reminiscent of a 1989 shooting in Canada, when a jobless hospital worker killed 14 female engineering students at the University of Montreal, accusing them of stealing jobs from men, says Martin Schwartz, an Ohio University sociologist and an expert on violence against women. He sees such incidents as related to a culture of violence against women, "a mutation - something beyond."

In Bailey, an armed drifter walked into Platte Canyon High School last Wednesday, ordering men out and sexually assaulting some of the six girls he held hostage, shooting one before killing himself. In this week's tragedy in Pennsylvania's bucolic Lancaster County, the gunman ordered boys and adults to leave, bound the 10 girls, and shot them, then himself. Small towns are no safeguard

Another similarity between the Pennsylvania and Colorado cases - as well as two other recent school shootings in Vermont and Wisconsin - is their rural settings. It is rare for mass school shootings to occur in cities, Newman says. Despite their safe image, rural communities can be an especially fertile breeding ground for revenge, she and others agree.

"People think small towns are safer, but in a small community grievances can fester," says Cheryl Meyer, a professor of psychology at Wright State University in Dayton, Ohio, who has researched similarities of school shootings in rural and small towns. "It's so often about revenge. Even if something happened 20 years ago, it doesn't mean it is gone. People talk about it and everybody remembers. It just trails after you."

Such a motive may have factored into Monday's shootings in the tiny hamlet of Nickel Mines, Pa., police say.

Flanked by corn fields and a few white oaks, the Amish schoolhouse could have been lifted out of the 19th century. With no guards, chain-link fence, or "drug-free zone" signs - or even a telephone - it seemed a world apart.

The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts, lived just down the road with his family in a double-wide trailer. He hauled milk from Amish farms at night, usually before the next day's milking began about 4 a.m. A co-worker says he might never have met the farmers he serviced. Then, he would take his children to school.

On Monday, however, he left suicide notes for his family, then drove his pickup truck to a school he no doubt passed many times on late-night milk routes. He brought to the school a semi-automatic pistol, hundreds of rounds of ammunition, a 12-gauge shotgun, and a rifle - along with restraints, lumber to block the doors, and a change of clothing.

In a scene that seemed to echo the Bailey shooting, the gunman ordered boys and school aides out, then bound 10 girls ages 6 to 13. He called his wife on his cellphone.

Police arrived after a teacher ran for help to a nearby farm. They called him on his cellphone, but no answer. Then the gunman opened fire, and police stormed the barricaded building, breaking through windows.

Five of the girls died at the scene or at hospitals. At press time, officials said five remained in critical condition.

Law-enforcement officials, working to unearth Roberts's motive, said Tuesday that sexual assault seemed the most likely one. In a suicide note, they said, Roberts recalled an incident 20 years ago when he, a pre-teen at the time, molested younger children. The note indicated he had been haunted by dreams about molesting young girls, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0074762

"I don't think it was an attack on the Amish community, but a target of opportunity," Col. Jeffrey Miller, commissioner of the Pennsylvania State Police, said Monday. "It was almost impenetrable," he said of the barricaded school. "His goal was to be in there for an extended period of time. He was hunkering down for a hostage-related siege." 'Copycat' concerns

The apparent similarities between the Bailey and Nickel Mines shootings - and their close proximity in time - raise experts' concerns about "copycat" attacks.

News media bear some responsibility for this phenomenon, says James Fox, a criminologist at Northeastern University in Boston. This is especially the case when attackers' personalities and grudges are exposed to high-profile public analysis - as when two teenage attackers in the Columbine attack were featured on the cover of a news magazine, he says.

"We've seen with school shootings and postal shootings that the shooters can become role models for others," Dr. Fox says. "While most sympathize with the victims, others empathize with the shooters. It's the publicity they get that turns the shooter into a celebrity that spawns more of them."

Some see in the latest school shootings echoes of the 1980s, when there was a spate of carefully planned attacks on students by adults from outside the schools.

Between 1988 to 1989, there were nine premeditated attacks by adults targeting schoolchildren, says Fox. In those cases, however, there was no pattern of girls being targets - a new wrinkle. To him, that year stands out for its "contagion of adults who got even with society by killing its most beloved members - schoolchildren."

While national crime statistics show a steady drop in the murder rate, including violent school fatalities, there seems to be fewer incidents but "more spectacular stuff going on," Dr. Schwartz says. "Splashy violence is what's going up, even though crime as a whole going down. The only thing not going down is fear engendered by these types of high-profile events." A community banding together

In Nickel Mines, the news media showed up almost as promptly as police - within minutes jamming the narrow streets and nearby fields with satellite trucks, television crews, and crane-high lights.

For grieving Amish families, driving past the crime scene late into the night or talking quietly in small groups nearby, the fierce media glare came as a shock to a community that resolutely avoids the spotlight.

"I was irate when I first heard about the school, then the hurt started," says an Amish fireman, who helped maintain a security perimeter around the school late Monday night. He says local firemen and policemen had expected a crush of news media, because of the intense public interest in school shootings. But, he adds, "we never expected to have to deal with it here."

"It's unbelievable. We never expected that anything like this would happen," says Ruth, a Mennonite neighbor who wanted to give only her first name.

"I don't understand it, but it's not from God," says Fannie Beiler, another Mennonite. "He wants us to love one another."

There are scores of such schools in the quiet farming communities around Lancaster County, a center for the Old Order Amish in the United States. An estimated 28,000 Amish live in the area - of about 200,000 nationwide.

Amish families live simply - no cars, electricity, cellphones, or iPods - and grieve quietly. A keystone of their faith is pacifism. When a young Amish boy in the next town of Bart was killed on his way to help a neighbor with the milking by a hit-and-run driver two weeks ago, there was no talk of lawsuits. Nor did Amish families join their "English" neighbors in calling for a new sign cautioning drivers to slow down.

In Bart, Paula Flinn set up a hand-painted sign on her front lawn for their Amish neighbors, who drove past the house in closed, black buggies at a rate of 50 an hour, some late into the night, after the shooting. Her sign reads: "Our prayers and thoughts are with you."

Toxic Mix Of Emotions Boiled Within Devoted Dad, Husband (USAT)

By Mimi Hall And Rick Hampson

USA Today, October 4, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa. — Under his placid surface smoldered a volcano of emotion: sorrow over the death of a newborn; anger at God for allowing it; self-hatred for supposedly molesting young relatives long ago; compulsion, which invaded his dreams, to molest again.

Charles Carl Roberts IV hid it all behind a seemingly solid veneer of fatherhood, a stable marriage to a religious woman, and a respectable job as a milk truck driver. But finally, he erupted, turning a one-room Amish schoolhouse into a slaughterhouse.

Working from a checklist, he prepared for six days to assemble the tools of siege and sexual assault. He loaded them into his pickup Monday and backed up to the schoolhouse next to a cornfield. Inside, he bound and shot 10 girls, five fatally. Then he killed himself.

Two of the five girls died of their wounds early Tuesday, a day on which state police revealed that Roberts:

DOJ_NMG_0074763

·Told his wife in a final telephone call from the school that he had sexually molested relatives aged 3 and 5 about 20 years ago, and that he recently had dreams of doing the same again. Police, however, say they have found no evidence he molested anyone, and family members said they knew nothing about the claim. None of the Amish children was sexually assaulted.

·Went to the school with two tubes of K-Y Brand Jelly, a personal lubricant that Roberts may have planned to use as "potential sexual-assault aid," according to state police Commissioner Jeffrey Miller. He also brought materials to tie his victims to the wall.

·Wrote in a suicide note that the death of the Robertses' infant daughter Elise in 1997, just 20 minutes after birth, "changed my life forever" and left him "filled with so much hate" toward himself and God.

The shootings — the third fatal attack on a U.S. school in six days — prompted President Bush to call for an immediate conference on possible federal action to prevent and cope with violence at schools.

No one appears to have seen the latest explosion coming.

Not Roberts' wife Marie, who in a statement called her husband "loving, supportive and thoughtful … an exceptional father (who) took the kids to soccer practice and games, played ball in the backyard and took our 7-year-old daughter shopping. He never said no when I asked him to change a diaper."

Not his Bart Township neighbor Mary Miller, who saw a dutiful father who trooped around with his kids every Halloween for trick or treat.

Not his neighbor Betty March, who said, "You'd see him put his kids on the (school) bus and pick them up … It's shocking. They were like the all-American family."

Not his mother, Teresa, who told the Lancaster, Pa., Intelligencer Journal that he was "an excellent family man. I had no idea anything like this was going to happen."

Only a few claimed to have glimpsed anything amiss.

"He didn't look you in the eye," complained Morgan Erb, a girl who babysat for Roberts' children.

And co-workers told police that in recent weeks Roberts had become tense and withdrawn, only to suddenly turn jovial the weekend before the attack.

"He may have made a decision to do this within the last few days, and seemed to be relieved of some of the pressures that he was exhibiting," said Miller, the state police commissioner.

The ranks of those who thought well of Roberts probably included his victims, who neighbors said almost certainly knew him as a milk tank truck driver — a person who is one of the dairy-farming Amish's main contacts to wider society, and who, under normal circumstances, might even have helped spread Monday's bad news.

Steve Sipos, who lives across the street from the Roberts family, said Charles' route ran through the school's neighborhood. He said Amish kids love it when the trucks come to pick up their milk.

"The drivers always joke around with the kids. They bring them lollipops," Sipos said. "I'm sure he knew the girls."

Roberts, 32, was a cop's son, home schooled, who lived in a modular home with his wife of nine years and the three children on whom he seemingly doted. He was not Amish and did not appear to have anything against the Amish, Miller said. He said Roberts was bent on killing girls and apparently chose the Amish schoolhouse simply for convenience.

On Monday, while his wife was at church attending a prayer group, Roberts drove to the school, which had about 25 students and none of the trappings of modern security — no metal detectors or locked doors, not even a phone.

He brought with him the following: three guns, a stun gun, two knives, a pile of wood (for barricading the doors), a bag with 600 rounds of ammunition, flexible plastic ties and eyebolts. He also had a change of clothing and toilet paper, indicating plans for a long siege, police said. At the bottom of a box, he had the two tubes of lubricant.

Roberts had left a note for his wife, the first page of which was released by the police:

"I don't know how you put up with me all those years. I am not worthy of you, you are the perfect wife you deserve so much better. We had so many good memories together as well as the tragedy with Elise. It changed my life forever. I haven't been the same since it affected me in a way I never felt possible. I am filled with so much hate, hate toward myself hate towards God and unimaginable emptyness it seems like everytime we do something fun I think about how Elise wasn't here to share it with us and I go right back to anger."

Roberts also left three other notes at home, one for each of his children, who range in age from 1 to 7.

The school's 20-year-old Amish teacher, Emma Mae Zook, told the Lancaster New Era on Tuesday that Roberts walked into the school carrying "a piece of iron" that she did not immediately recognize as a gun. He asked if any of the children had ever seen anything like it. None had.

One student, Aaron Esh, 13, told the Intelligencer Journal that Roberts didn't seem that frightening.

"He said, 'No one's gonna get hurt.' He sounded very calm. He didn't sound all that mean."

DOJ_NMG_0074764

But Zook says that when she realized what was happening, she panicked. When Roberts looked the other way, “I saw this was my chance to run, so I ran for help.” She called for help from a nearby farm.

Roberts released about 15 boys and several adult women before barring the doors with desks and wood secured with nails and bolts. One girl whom he had wanted to stay slipped out with her brother and escaped, police said.

Then he bound the girls together in a line at the blackboard.

A two-by-four piece of lumber found in the school had 10 large eyebolts spaced about 10 inches apart, suggesting that Roberts may have planned to truss up the girls and sexually assault them, Miller said: “It's important to note that we had 10 victims at that time that were in the school.”

The girls were shot at close range shortly after police arrived outside the school. “We're quite certain, based on what we know, that he had no intention of coming out of there alive,” Miller said.

“It's very possible that he intended to victimize these children in many ways prior to executing them and killing himself,” he said.

But Roberts “became disorganized when we arrived,” and shot himself in the head.

The dead were identified as Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7; Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12; Marian Fisher, 13; Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lena Miller, 7. Three other girls were in critical condition Tuesday, and two were in serious condition. They range in age from 6 to 13.

The shootings shocked Lancaster County's bucolic Pennsylvania Dutch country, where the Old Order Amish live a peaceful, 18th-century existence and restrict their exposure to “the English,” which is what they call other Americans. They make do without automobiles, motorized farming equipment and electrical appliances. Laundry flaps on the line; horse-drawn carriages clip-clop along major thoroughfares.

What turned a milkman in this paradise into a monster remained unclear. But behavioral experts said that the picture that emerged was not of a guilt-ridden mind, but a twisted one.

Fred Berlin, associate professor of psychiatry at Johns Hopkins University, said Roberts could have focused his anger with himself on his victims.

“It's possible in a twisted way he's blaming young girls for the attraction he's feeling,” he said.

Naftali Berrill, director of the New York Center for Neuropsychology and Forensic Behavioral Science in New York City, said the shootings could be linked to Roberts' loss of his daughter.

“Maybe in his twisted mind, the death of his child is some sort of retribution or payback for him having molested,” he said.

“He's been sitting on a whole bunch of confusing ideas about how to make things right with the world and how to address his own impulse to touch children.”

Berrill also said the Amish lifestyle and beliefs might have further enraged Roberts.

“The religiousness, … simplicity and devoutness. Maybe that's part of this as well. All this displaced rage against people who maybe made him feel ashamed himself.”

Georgetown Methodist Church is just up the street from the Robertses' home here. On Tuesday a sign outside read, “Open for Prayer.” Inside, a dozen pale pink roses tied with a pale pink bow sat on the altar, along with a note from Melissa and George Lopez: “We want to pay our respects to all the families who had to endure this tragedy.”

Outside, in back of the church cemetery, was a heart-shaped gravestone. It bore this inscription:

Elise Victoria
Pledged to God daughter of
Charles & Marie
Born & died
Nov. 14, 1997

Death Toll In Attack At Amish School Rises To 5 (WP)

By Tamara Jones And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa., Oct. 3 -- Haunted by an ugly secret he claimed to have kept since childhood and recurring dreams of molesting young girls, Charles C. Roberts IV clearly "planned to dig in for the long siege" and torment his young victims in an Amish schoolhouse before executing them and killing himself, investigators said Tuesday.

Five suicide notes the 32-year-old gunman left behind also describe his anguish over the loss of a premature baby nine years ago, police said, and a checklist found in his milk truck offered a sordid blueprint for the mayhem that left five girls dead and five more fighting for life after Roberts stormed into their classroom Monday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0074765

Neighbors watched tearfully Tuesday as horse-drawn buggies filled with Amish mourners began to converge on the houses where simple funerals were expected to be held in the coming days for the girls killed in a barrage of bullets that left the county coroner too shaken to keep counting the wounds.

Roberts called his wife, Marie, after barricading himself inside the school with the terrified children, and said that he had molested two young, female relatives when he was 12 and that he had been dreaming about doing it again, Pennsylvania State Police Col. Jeffrey Miller said at a news conference.

Miller said that police were still interviewing members of Roberts's extended family and that they had not been able to determine what happened 20 years ago or to find the alleged victims, who would have been preschoolers at the time.

There is "no evidence" that the girls held hostage Monday were sexually assaulted, Miller said, but the boxes of evidence police carted away from the Nickel Mines school included sexual lubricant and restraint devices.

"It is very possible he intended to victimize these children in many ways prior to executing them," said Miller, who added that Roberts "planned to dig in for the long siege."

Miller identified the victims as Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7; Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12; Marian Fisher, 13; Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lina Miller, 7. Four of the other victims, including a younger Stoltzfus sister, remained in critical condition; the oldest victim, a 13-year-old, was reported in serious condition but conscious and able to communicate by blinking her eyes.

Although the Amish restrict the use of modern technology, hospital spokesmen said no religious restrictions interfered with treatment of the children.

Police and coroner accounts of the children's wounds differed dramatically. Miller said Roberts shot his victims in the head at close range, with 17 or 18 shots fired in all, including the one he used to take his own life as police stormed into the school through the windows. But Janice Ballenger, deputy coroner in Lancaster County, Pa., told The Washington Post in an interview that she counted at least two dozen bullet wounds in one child alone before asking a colleague to continue for her.

Inside the school, Ballenger said, "there was not one desk, not one chair, in the whole schoolroom that was not splattered with either blood or glass. There were bullet holes everywhere, everywhere."

A state police spokeswoman said Tuesday night that she could not immediately explain the discrepancy.

Discussing the tragedy at the local post office with another neighbor, their voices falling silent when an elderly Amish woman walked in, Marie Pelliccio described her conversation with a young survivor. He was among the 15 boys Roberts ordered out of the school after lining up the girls in white bonnets and long pinafores against the chalkboard and binding their feet with plastic ties.

Pelliccio said the teenage boy is a neighbor who works as a hired hand at her horse farm. When she stopped by to check on the family Tuesday afternoon, Pelliccio said, the boy told her the gunman had burst into the school and yelled at everyone to line up, then pointed to the boys: "You, you and you and you, get out of here!"

When the teacher fled as well, the boy told his neighbor, the gunman ordered another boy to chase after her, warning, "You go get her, or I'll start shooting!"

Pelliccio's eyes welled as she recalled the boy's quiet account of the horror: "I saw him tying my sister up," he told her.

The 8-year-old girl was shot in the jaw and shoulder and remained hospitalized in critical condition.

Several of the families whose children were shot were on Roberts's milk run, Pelliccio said. "He knew them."

Police found Roberts's truck where he customarily parked it after his shift ended at 3 a.m.: in a lot across from the intersection the Amish children crossed each day on their way to school.

"We believe this had nothing to do with the Amish," Miller said. "The school was a target of opportunity. It was close by his home. He felt comfortable."

After finishing his milk run, police said, Roberts went home and helped his two older children get ready for school, dropping them off at their bus stop about 8:45 a.m.

Marie Roberts told police she had "absolutely no" clue that anything was troubling her husband when she left at 9 a.m. for the prayer group she leads at a nearby church. The first emergency call about a hostage situation at the school came about 10:36 a.m., from the teacher who had escaped.

Charles Roberts had carried boxes of tools, hardware and lumber with him, Miller said, and he barricaded the front door with a piece of wood, bolted it and piled desks in front of it. A side door was barricaded with a foosball table, a 2-by-4 piece of wood and plastic ties.

At 10:50 a.m., Miller told reporters, Roberts called his wife from a cellphone to say, "I am not coming home. Police are here." He said Roberts then claimed to have molested two family members 20 years ago, when the girls were "3 or 4."

Roberts told his wife where the suicide notes were in their home, one for her and each of their three small children. She began reading them, then called her mother and 911, Miller said.

Miller said Roberts didn't answer when police negotiators attempted to contact him.

DOJ_NMG_0074766

His letters describe how he was filled with "hatred for God and hatred for" himself. They refer to an unrelenting grief over the loss of his firstborn child, a daughter named Elise, who lived for just 20 minutes before dying nine years ago.

"He said he had been having dreams about doing what he did 20 years ago and wants to do it again," Miller said. The dreams of molesting girls had been tormenting Roberts for two or three years, according to the suicide notes.

In addition to another suicide note found in his truck, police discovered a checklist of 16 items that "matches evidence" seized at the crime scene, Miller said. Among the items Roberts had listed: bullets, gun, binoculars, candle, earplugs, wrenches, nails, eye bolts and KY Jelly. Two tubes of the sexual lubricant were recovered at the school, Miller added, along with items that made up "a restraint system or kit."

Roberts had planned the attack meticulously, Miller said, and was "extremely organized." He began purchasing items on his checklist at a local Amish-run hardware store six days earlier, then spent a "normal, relaxed weekend with his family, playing with his kids."

The supplies he took into the school included a change of clothes, toilet paper and a bucket, additional indicators that he possibly planned to hold his victims hostage for "a number of hours" but then panicked and became "disorganized" when police arrived, Miller said.

Fred S. Berlin, a Johns Hopkins University psychiatrist and expert on sexual disorders, said it would be a mistake to accept Roberts's statement about molesting children years ago as an explanation for what happened Monday. At most, Berlin said, the molestation, if it occurred, is just one piece of a complicated psychiatric puzzle.

"People can develop a major depression and, in the midst of that, begin to feel very guilty and troubled about perceived bad acts in a way that had not been a problem for them in the absence of depression," Berlin said. "I'm speculating here, but it's possible he became depressed and then began to be preoccupied and ruminative and guilt-ridden about these events that occurred so many years ago."

If Roberts did molest two young relatives 20 years ago, when he was 12, it would not necessarily mean he was bound to repeat the behavior as an adult, Berlin said.

Although many adult pedophiles begin their misconduct as young people, "there's good evidence that a majority of adolescent sexual offenders -- if indeed he was that -- do not go on to be adult offenders," Berlin said. "People assume otherwise, but there's some pretty compelling data suggesting that there are lots of kids who do things of a sexual nature during childhood that they ought not do, and they don't do it again."

If Roberts was suffering from depression and became fixated on his long-ago sexual misconduct, fearing that he would repeat the behavior, that could explain suicide, Berlin said.

"That still leaves a tremendous gap in our understanding of how he got from being troubled and guilty about doing that years ago to, in the end, murdering a number of innocent children," Berlin said. "I mean, there's a tremendous leap there that we would need to transcend in order to have a better understanding of why he did what he did."

School Gunman Revealed Torment (WT/AP)

By Mark Scolforo, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

QUARRYVILLE, Pa. -- The gunman who killed five girls in an Amish schoolroom confided to his wife during the siege that he molested two relatives 20 years ago when he was boy and was tormented by dreams of doing it again, authorities said yesterday.

Investigators also said that Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, plotted his takeover of the school for nearly a week and that the items he brought -- including flexible plastic ties, eye bolts and sexual aids -- suggest he may have been planning to violate the Amish girls before police closed in.

"It's very possible that he intended to victimize these children in many ways prior to executing them and killing himself," said Col. Jeffrey B. Miller, the state police commissioner. But Roberts "became disorganized when we arrived," and shot himself in the head.

Holding up a copy of the gunman's suicide note at a packed press conference, Col. Miller also suggested that Roberts was haunted by the death of his prematurely born daughter in 1997. The baby, Elise, died 20 minutes after being delivered, Col. Miller said.

Elise's death "changed my life forever," the milk truck driver and father of three wrote to his wife. "I haven't been the same since it affected me in a way I never felt possible. I am filled with so much hate, hate toward myself hate towards God and unimaginable emptyness it seems like everytime we do something fun I think about how Elise wasn't here to share it with us and I go right back to anger."

DOJ_NMG_0074767

The state police commissioner identified the demons in Roberts' head a day after the shooting rampage shattered the sense of calm in Lancaster County's bucolic Pennsylvania Dutch Country, where the Amish live a peaceful, turn-the-other-cheek existence in an 18th-century world with no automobiles and no electrical appliances.

"He certainly was very troubled psychologically deep down and was dealing with things that nobody else knew he was dealing with," Col. Miller said.

The death toll rose to six -- including the gunman -- when two more girls died of their wounds in a hospital, authorities said yesterday.

The victims were identified as Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7; Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12; Marian Fisher, 13; Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lena Miller, 7. Anna Mae's sister was among the wounded.

Four other girls were in critical condition, and one was in serious condition. They ranged in age from 6 to 13.

During the standoff, Roberts called his wife on his cell phone from the one-room schoolhouse and told her that he molested two female relatives when they were 3 to 5 years old, Col. Miller said. Roberts would have been about 11 or 12 at the time. In a suicide note left for his family, he said he "had dreams about doing what he did 20 years ago again," Col. Miller said.

Police could not confirm Roberts' claim that he molested two relatives. Family members knew nothing of molestation in his past, Col. Miller said. Police located the two relatives and were hoping to interview them.

Roberts had planned the attack for nearly a week, buying plastic ties from a hardware store on Sept. 26 and several other items less than an hour before entering the school, Col. Miller said. The girls left in the room were shot at close range shortly after police arrived, he said.

"We're quite certain, based on what we know, that he had no intention of coming out of there alive," Col. Miller said.

At the time Roberts' wife received the phone call, she was attending a meeting of a prayer group she led. The group prayed for the community's schoolchildren.

Church members visited with the victims' families yesterday, preparing meals and doing household chores, while Amish elders planned the funerals. An Amish woman who helped comfort family members said they were being sustained by prayer.

"It's a tragedy we've never seen before," said the woman, whose father was a church bishop. Like many Amish, she declined to give her name. "They said it was a happy school. The children were happy; the teachers were happy."

Police Describe Gunman's Plan In School Siege (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski And Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa., Oct. 3 — As the Amish in this rural farm community turned inward to cope with the magnitude of the deadly school shooting on Monday, police investigators pieced together the gunman's elaborate preparations for an extended siege that, they said, was intended to include the sexual assault of his young hostages.

When the gunman, Charles C. Roberts IV, 32, arrived at West Nickel Mines Amish School, he brought an assortment of weapons, hardware and lubricant that indicated he may have been planning to torture and molest the female students, the police said.

Speaking to his wife by cellphone after he had bound his hostages with wire and plastic ties, Mr. Roberts told her — for the first time — that he had molested two younger relatives, when he was 12 and had recently dreamed of sexually abusing young girls again, the police said. He also said his life had been warped by anger and grief since the death of their newborn daughter nine years ago.

But he "became confused" and started shooting when the police arrived, said Col. Jeffrey B. Miller, commissioner of the Pennsylvania State Police, killing five girls, seriously injuring five others, then killing himself without carrying out any sexual assault.

As the details were disclosed and the death count rose to five, police officers, firefighters and residents in horse-drawn buggies gathered outside the homes of the some of the slain girls' relatives to fend off news reporters and satellite trucks. At least 150 members of the Amish community met at a home prayer meeting about 200 yards from the schoolhouse. And community members also started a charity fund to help the victims' families and Mr. Roberts's widow and three young children.

With their traditional garb and religious dictum that forbids the use of technological advances like electricity and motor vehicles, the Amish try to insulate their lives from the bedlam and violence of modern life.

But the bloody attack by Mr. Roberts, who was raised in the area but was not Amish, had breached that insularity, leaving residents of a community known for its stoicism angry, saddened and shaken.

Emma Mae Zook, the young teacher who called the police after fleeing the school as Mr. Roberts barricaded its doors, spent part of the day trying to offer solace to families of her students, according to relatives.

DOJ_NMG_0074768

"She's trying to comfort the families even as she struggles herself," said Ms. Zook's second cousin, a woman in her 50's who did not want her name used.

The police on Tuesday released the names of the children who died. They are Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7; Anna Mae Stolzfus, 12; Marian Fisher, 13; Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lena Miller, 7. Gov. Edward G. Rendell said flags would fly at half staff in the capital, Harrisburg, and in Lancaster County until after the funerals for the children.

Mr. Roberts had no criminal record or history of psychiatric illness, the authorities said. Although he was scheduled to take a random drug test at his job, there was no indication that he had a substance abuse problem or was worried about the screening, Colonel Miller said.

The police were also investigating Mr. Roberts's assertion that he had molested relatives when he was 12, but had been unable to corroborate it. Moments before he opened fire, Mr. Roberts told his wife, Marie, who was leading a prayer meeting at a church, of the sexual assaults. He then told her that he had left four suicide notes at home, Colonel Miller said, one of which described the lingering wounds he had felt since the death of their daughter Elise, who was born prematurely in 1997 and lived only 20 minutes.

"It changed my life forever, I haven't been the same since," he wrote in a note the police released on Tuesday. "It affected me in a way I never felt possible. I am filled with so much hate, hate towards myself, hate towards God and unimaginable emptiness. It seems like every time we do something fun, I think abut how Elise wasn't here to share it with us and I got right back to anger."

Relatives and neighbors said there was no sign of that anguish in the hours before his rampage began.

But Paula Derby, 31, said that it was unusual to see him drop off his children at the bus stop on Monday morning. Ms. Derby, who is also a parent, said that as Mr. Roberts's two oldest children began to board the bus, Marie Roberts said to them: "Hey kids, come back here, Dad wants to give you a hug."

Mr. Roberts then hugged and kissed his children, saying, "Remember, Daddy loves you."

After telling his wife that he was heading to his drug test, Mr. Roberts instead went to a hardware store, where he made a purchase at 9:14 a.m. and another at 9:16 a.m., the authorities said.

When Mr. Roberts arrived at the school just over an hour later, he was carrying a 9-millimeter handgun, Colonel Miller said, and asked the teacher, "Have you seen anything like this?" referring to the weapon. "Can you help me find it?"

Once in the classroom, Mr. Roberts ordered all 15 boys to leave, along with four adult women who were visiting, three of whom had young children with them.

Mr. Roberts ordered the 10 remaining girls to line up facing the blackboard and remain silent as he lashed their ankles with wire and plastic ties. As he spoke with his wife, Mr. Roberts warned that he would begin shooting within 10 seconds if the police did not leave. But he did not wait, Colonel Miller said.

The authorities said that the collection of chains, clamps and K-Y Jelly found in the schoolhouse appeared to indicate that Mr. Roberts had planned a sexual assault.

"The K-Y Jelly has no exact reason, other than the potential for a sexual assault aid," Colonel Miller said.

As the details of the ordeal began to sink in, relatives said the youngsters who escaped began to agonize over whether they had missed an opportunity to prevent the attack on their classmates.

"I pity the children in the school" who got out, said Jacob Fisher Jr., 23, a farmer who lives across the street from Mr. Roberts's home. "It's going to be be a scar on their own lives."

Molestation Possible Motive In Amish Shooting (LAT)

By Ellen Barry And Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa. — The man who killed at least five girls at an Amish school said he had molested young family members 20 years ago and had dreams of doing so again, authorities said today.

At an afternoon news conference, State Police Commissioner Col. Jeffrey B. Miller painted a grisly picture of Charles Carl Roberts IV, a methodical assailant who carefully planned for a siege and left suicide notes explaining possible motives for attacking the one-room schoolhouse Monday morning.

The attack was "organized, preplanned and had forethought," Miller told reporters at a televised news conference.

Miller said Roberts stated that he had molested two family members 20 years ago, but there was no independent confirmation of those attacks. In the notes he left behind, Roberts also said he was angry over the death of his child, Elise, about nine years ago.

The number of casualties in the shooting rose overnight.

DOJ_NMG_0074769

Miller said five girls are now dead, ranging from 7 to 13 years old. Three died at the scene and two during the night. Roberts killed himself as state police rushed the building to rescue the children.

Five other females, 7 to 13 years old, were in two hospitals in grave condition, Miller said.

A day after the attack, officials struggled to explain why Roberts, a 32-year-old father of three with no criminal record and no record of mental instability, entered the schoolhouse in the sheltered Amish community with a small arsenal, including an illegal stun gun and several apparently legal weapons.

Why Roberts acted the way he did may never be known, Miller said. But the notes left by Roberts for his family cite his fears about repeating sexual assaults and the loss of his child, who died about 20 minutes after birth.

The death of the child made him angry with himself and with God, Miller said.

"The note that he left for his wife talks about the good memories together, the tragedy with Elise, it focuses on his life being changed forever ... over the loss of Elise, his hatred toward himself, his hatred toward God as a result of that event, and he alludes to this other reason for this anger but he can't discuss it with her and it happened 20 years ago," Miller said.

On Monday, officials mentioned acts that took place 20 years ago as one of the reasons Roberts gave for his attack. Today's news conference was the first time officials gave details.

According to Miller, Roberts claimed to have molested two family members 20 years ago. At the time, Roberts was a child himself. The victims would have been 3 to 5 years old.

There was no independent confirmation of the molestations, Miller said. Relatives have been interviewed and had no recollection of the incidents.

We have "no details or if anything occurred," Miller said. "We were not able to confirm a report was ever made."

In his note, Roberts said he was having dreams of molesting again. "He states in his suicide note that he had dreams about doing what he did 20 years ago again," Miller said.

Miller also gave this chronology of the events on Monday:

Roberts returned from his milk truck job about 3 a.m. By 7:30, Roberts and his wife were getting their children ready for school and by 8:45 a.m., Roberts walked his children to the bus stop.

About 9 a.m., Marie Roberts left to go to a prayer session at a local Presbyterian church, where she stayed until 10:30. She dropped off a friend and came home around 10:50 a.m., when Roberts called her.

At that point, Roberts was already at the school, Miller said. He had barricaded himself inside and had separated the girls from the boys.

Receipts and material recovered from the scene showed that Roberts was prepared for a siege after having brought bolts, nails, wood, ammunition, batteries and a bucket.

He also brought plastic ties to restrain his victims' hands and at least two tubes of K-Y Jelly, a lubricant that officials said could be used in any sexual assault. None of the girls were assaulted before police stormed the school around 11 a.m.

Inside the schoolhouse, Roberts waited. He had a shotgun, a semiautomatic pistol and a rifle, 600 rounds of ammunition, explosive powder, the stun gun, two knives, a change of clothes, and a bucket with pliers, a hacksaw and wire.

State police pulled up to the pale-yellow building at 10:45 a.m., nine minutes after the call for help from a teacher who escaped. They tried to contact the gunman using the public-address system on their squad cars. Roberts did not respond to them.

Roberts shot the girls in the head — one after another, in quick order — with his 9-millimeter automatic, stopping once to reload. He opened fire briefly on the troopers as they approached, but did not hit them. Then he turned the gun on himself; he fell face-down on the floor, dead.

"It was all over in a matter of seconds," Miller said on Monday.

Authorities said Roberts found the school a convenient target — "a location of opportunity," as Miller put it.

Employed by Land O'Lakes Inc. dairy co-op and assigned to deliver milk for a subsidiary called Northwest Food Products, Roberts was known around the community as outgoing and personable. Co-workers told authorities that Roberts had seemed tense of late, not his usual quick-to-joke self, but had been more relaxed in the last few days.

Marie Roberts released a statement Monday night to the media saying: "The man who did this today is not the Charlie that I've been married to for almost 10 years. My husband is loving, supportive, thoughtful, all the things you'd always want and more Our hearts are broken, our lives are shattered, and we grieve for the innocence and lives that were lost today."

Roberts' brutality evoked very little anger among the Amish community Monday. Men in broad-brimmed hats and suspenders and women in bonnets and long dark dresses expressed grief and shock, but in hushed, muted tones. "It's a sad day," Jacob King, a 31-year-old stonemason said. He could think of nothing else to add, just repeated that one word, "sad."

Rather than dwell on the victims — though this is a close-knit community, where few are strangers — Amish residents spoke of their concern for Roberts' family; their sorrow that a man could become so unhinged, so alienated from the Lord.

DOJ_NMG_0074770

"I wish someone could have helped him out, poor soul. It's obvious that something was troubling him," said Steve, a 54-year-old carpenter who, like many here, would not give his full name.

Of the tragedy, he would say only that it was "uncalled for," and unexpected.

An Amish woman who gave her name as Irene also expressed compassion for the gunman. "I am very thankful," she said, "that I was raised to believe you don't fight back. You should forgive."

About 20,000 Old Order Amish live among the dairy farms and cornfields in Lancaster County, about 60 miles west of Philadelphia. They shun modern conveniences such as computers and television; many do not have electricity, and some do not have indoor plumbing.

Their children usually walk the mile or two to the local schoolhouse, often a one-room building with a few dozen students from first grade through eighth. Most Amish children leave school after eighth grade to work on the family farm.

Communities do not typically have their own police force, but rely on the county sheriff or state troopers. "There's no need for police," said Aaron Meyer, 60, who owns a local business giving buggy rides to tourists.

Monday's attack in many ways echoed a fatal school shooting last week in rural Bailey, Colo. In that incident, a drifter named Duane Morrison, 53, entered a high school English class, ordered the teacher and male students to leave, and kept six girls as hostages. He sexually molested some of them during a four-hour standoff. When police swarmed the classroom, Morrison fatally shot one girl, then killed himself.

Also last week, a 15-year-old boy shot and killed his principal at a school in Cazenovia, Wis. And on Monday, school police in North Las Vegas spotted a former student on campus with a gun; he fled without firing any shots.

Here in Lancaster County, violence is not completely unknown: Just this spring, a young man confessed to killing six of his relatives, ages 5 to 64. A few months later, the county was hit with a string of robberies, including the knifepoint mugging of a buggy driver.

However, the community is known as a peaceful retreat of grape arbors and orchards. Children in straw hats drive teams of horses through green valleys — and the two-lane highway is speckled with manure. Clotheslines hang beside many of the farmhouses, pinned with whole families of dresses in dark blue and green, each a size smaller than the next.

Suburbs are creeping closer and closer, but the Amish "just go about their way," said Myron Stoltzfus, 48, a local butcher.

Stoltzfus was raised by Amish parents; he is now a Mennonite, but understands the Amish ways and anticipates that, even as the loss sinks in, few here will call for security guards at the schoolhouse — or even a cellphone in the teacher's desk. "The Amish see death as a part of life," he said. "They will grieve but they have more resignation. They will take this as something God ordained."

As night fell, the wooden schoolhouse remained cordoned off with crime-scene tape. A pumpkin sat out front; in the back, the doors to two outhouses were propped open. A few orange flags marked the places where evidence had been retrieved.

But for a cluster of TV trucks, the valley was still and dark.

Police: Gunman At Amish School Told Wife He Molested 2 Little Girls Years 20 Years Ago (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mark Scolforo, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

(AP) - QUARRYVILLE, Pennsylvania-The gunman who killed five girls in an Amish schoolroom confided to his wife during the siege that he molested two relatives 20 years ago when he was boy and was tormented by dreams of doing it again, authorities said Tuesday.

Investigators also said that Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, plotted his takeover of the school for nearly a week and that the items he brought - including flexible plastic ties often used as handcuffs, bolts that serve as hooks and lubricating jelly - suggest he may have been planning to sexually assault the Amish girls before police closed in.

"It's very possible that he intended to victimize these children in many ways prior to executing them and killing himself," State Police Commissioner Jeffrey B. Miller said. But Roberts "became disorganized when we arrived," and shot himself in the head.

Holding up a copy of the gunman's suicide note at a packed news conference, Miller also suggested that Roberts was haunted by the death of his prematurely born daughter in 1997. The baby, Elise, died 20 minutes after being delivered, Miller said.

Elise's death "changed my life forever," the milk truck driver and father of three wrote to his wife. "I haven't been the same since it affected me in a way I never felt possible. I am filled with so much hate, hate toward myself hate towards God and unimaginable emptyness it seems like everytime we do something fun I think about how Elise wasn't here to share it with us and I go right back to anger."

DOJ_NMG_0074771

Miller identified the demons in Roberts' head a day after the shooting rampage shattered the sense of calm in Lancaster County's bucolic Pennsylvania Dutch Country, where the Amish live a peaceful, turn-the-other-cheek existence in an 18th-century world with no automobiles and no electrical appliances.

"He certainly was very troubled psychologically deep down and was dealing with things that nobody else knew he was dealing with," Miller said.

The death toll rose to six Tuesday - including the gunman - when two girls died of their wounds.

During the standoff, Roberts told his wife in a cell phone call from the one-room schoolhouse that he molested two female relatives when they were 3 to 5 years old, Miller said. Roberts would have been around 11 or 12 at the time. Also, in a suicide note left for his family, he said he "had dreams about doing what he did 20 years ago again," Miller said.

Police could not immediately confirm Roberts' claim that he molested two relatives. Family members knew nothing of molestation in his past, Miller said. Police located the two relatives and were hoping to interview them.

Roberts had planned the attack for nearly a week, buying plastic ties from a hardware store on Sept. 26 and several other items less than an hour before entering the school, Miller said.

The crime bore some resemblance to an attack on a high school in Bailey, Colo., where a 53-year-old man took six girls hostage and sexually assaulted them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself. That attack occurred last Wednesday, the day after Roberts began buying materials for his siege.

Using a checklist that was later found in his pickup truck, Roberts brought to the school three guns, a stun gun, two knives, a pile of wood for barricading the doors, and a bag with 600 rounds of ammunition, police said. He also had a change of clothing, indicating he had planned a long siege, police said.

He sent the boys and several adults away and bound the girls together in a line at the blackboard. Miller on Tuesday revealed that one of the girls was able to escape with the boys.

A long piece of lumber found in the school had 10 large eyebolts - bolts with metal rings attached at their end - spaced about 10 inches (25.4 centimeters) apart, suggesting that Roberts may have planned to truss up the girls and sexually assault them, Miller said. "It's important to note that we had 10 victims at that time that were in the school," he said.

The girls left in the room were shot at close range shortly after police arrived, Miller said.

"We're quite certain, based on what we know, that he had no intention of coming out of there alive," Miller said.

At the time Roberts' wife received the phone call, she was attending a meeting of a prayer group she led that prayed for the community's schoolchildren.

The victims were identified as Naomi Rose Ebersole, 7; Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12; Marian Fisher, 13; Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lena Miller, 7. Stoltzfus' sister was among the wounded.

Three other girls were in critical condition and two were in serious condition. They ranged in age from 6 to 13.

Church members visited with the victims' families Tuesday, preparing meals and doing household chores, while Amish elders planned the funerals. An Amish woman who helped comfort family members said they were being sustained by prayer.

"It's a tragedy we've never seen before," said the woman, whose father was a church bishop. Like many Amish, she declined to give her name. "They said it was a happy school," she said. "The children were happy, the teachers were happy."

Roberts, a father from the nearby town of Bart, was not Amish and did not appear to have anything against the Amish, Miller said. He said Roberts was bent on killing girls and apparently figured he could succeed at the serene schoolhouse.

Dwight Lefever, a Roberts family spokesman, spoke at a community prayer service Tuesday evening and said he was at the home of Roberts' father when an Amish neighbor came to comfort the family.

"He stood there for an hour, and he held that man in his arms, and he said, 'We will forgive you,'" Lefever said. "He extended the hope of forgiveness that we all need these days."

Sam Stoltzfus, 63, an Amish woodworker who lives a few miles away from the shooting scene, said his grandchildren were full of questions when they came home from another Amish school.

"They were terrified," said Stoltzfus, whose son took the grandchildren to school Tuesday morning so they wouldn't have to walk by themselves. "They wanted to know: What was wrong with him? Why was he doing that?"

Stoltzfus said the victims' families will be sustained by their faith.

"We think it was God's plan and we're going to have to pick up the pieces and keep going," he said. "A funeral to us is a much more important thing than the day of birth because we believe in the hereafter. The children are better off than their survivors."

AP reporter Michael Rubinkam contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0074772

Fifth Amish School Girl Dies; Killer Hints At Motive (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Todd Zeranski

Bloomberg, October 4, 2006

Oct. 3 (Bloomberg) -- A fifth victim of yesterday's attack on a one-room Amish school in Pennsylvania died this morning, and authorities revealed that the killer told his wife he molested relatives years ago and dreamt of molesting again.

The girl, whose identity and age weren't disclosed, died early this morning, Spiros Mantzavinos, a spokesman for Christiana Care Health System in Newark, Delaware, where the girl had been treated, said in a telephone interview. Five other victims are being treated in Philadelphia, Hershey and Reading, Pennsylvania.

All of the victims are females between the ages of 6 and 13, state police Commissioner Jeffrey Miller said in a televised press conference today. Police yesterday said 11 girls were held hostage, though today they said one 9-year-old escaped with her brother.

The gunman, Charles Carl Roberts, 32, a milk-truck driver who lived near the school in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, killed himself. He left a suicide note saying he was seeking revenge for something that happened 20 years ago, police said. Today, Miller said Roberts called his wife during the attack and said he molested two young relatives 20 years ago and had dreams of molesting again.

``He split them up, males and females," Miller said yesterday. ``He let the males go, some of the adults go. He bound the females at the blackboard, and apparently executed them."

Handgun, Shotgun, Stun Gun

Roberts was armed with a semi-automatic handgun, a shotgun, a stun gun and several knives, in addition to tools such as a hammer, hacksaw and wooden boards used to barricade the classroom after letting some of the people go, said Miller. He said Roberts had no previous criminal record, and there's no evidence the victims were sexually assaulted.

``He did not intend to come out alive. But we're also concerned he may have had an extended plan to be in there for a very long time," perhaps to sexually assault the young girls before killing them and himself, Miller said. The quick reaction of the police caused Roberts to panic, he said.

The attack took place at Georgetown Amish School in Bart Township, a farming area of about 3,000 people, 60 miles (100 kilometers) west of Philadelphia. The Amish are a Christian sect that stresses separation from the modern world. Many ride horse- drawn buggies rather than drive cars and don't have electricity in their homes.

``This is the last place on earth that something like this would happen," said Raymond Bial, author of the books ``Amish Home" and ``Visit to Amish Country."

``The Amish are pacifists," he said in a phone interview. ``They don't believe in taking part in any conflict, and sometimes people take advantage of that because they don't fight back."

The killings were the third attack at a U.S. school in six days. A gunman took six students hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, Colorado, before killing a girl and himself on Sept. 27. A principal in Wisconsin was shot to death by a former student on Sept. 29.

President `Saddened'

``Laura and I were saddened and deeply concerned, like a lot of citizens around the country, about the school shootings that took place in Pennsylvania, Colorado, and Wisconsin," President George W. Bush said in California. `` Our schoolchildren should never fear their safety when they enter into a classroom."

President Bush instructed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting in Washington next week among educators and law enforcement officials to come up with ways to deal with school violence.

Police surrounded the Pennsylvania school after receiving an emergency telephone call at about 10:36 a.m., Miller said. When officers attempted to contact the attacker, multiple shots rang out inside the schoolhouse, Miller said.

Police stormed the school and broke windows to get inside, only to find the attacker and his victims dead, Miller said.

``This was a premeditated hostage scenario," Miller said. ``He intended not to walk out of there alive, but he also intended to kill innocent victims."

Fifteen boys were freed, as well as one pregnant woman and three women with infants, Miller said. A teacher who escaped called the police.

The critically injured children were flown to pediatric hospitals in Philadelphia, Hershey and Reading, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, Lancaster General Hospital spokesman John Lines said.

Three girls, ages 8, 10 and 12, who were taken to the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, are out of surgery and no longer in critical condition, the hospital said in a statement sent by PR Newswire yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0074773

Killer Wasn't Amish

Miller said he didn't think the attack was targeted against the Amish. Roberts wasn't Amish, he said.

Amish children attend schools until eighth grade, according to the Pennsylvania Dutch Convention & Visitors Bureau's Web page.

``I don't recall ever a story like this, going into a school and taking the most innocent of innocent," said Herman Bontrager, chief executive of New Holland, Pennsylvania-based Goodwill Mutual Casualty Co., about 10 miles from the site of the shooting. ``It has people in shock pretty much around here."

Many people in the community have already started donating meals, transportation and other services to Amish families affected by the tragedy, said Bontrager, who grew up in an Amish family in Indiana and serves as the secretary-treasurer of the National Committee for Amish Freedom.

Ten families had children attending the school and the children of seven families were victims of the attack, police said.

There are about 25,000 Amish in Lancaster County, the bureau said, citing Raber's 2004 Almanac.

To contact the reporters on this story: Todd Zeranski in New York at tzeranski@bloomberg.net ;

Strong Faith And Community May Help Amish Cope With Loss (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

The Amish whose children were executed by a milk deliveryman in their rural Pennsylvania schoolhouse had, until Monday, lived in a world where they were largely insulated from violence and singularly unprepared to respond to it.

But their strong faith and community ties may prepare them unusually well to cope with it, experts on the Amish say.

In their one-room schoolhouses in Lancaster County, the Amish have no need for security officers or metal detectors. Their classmates are their siblings and neighbors, their teacher usually a young woman not much older than the students, who graduate after eighth grade. There are no phones to call for help. There is no electricity, perhaps just a battery-operated clock. A wood-burning stove keeps the room warm.

“Violence in an Amish school is just unthinkable,” said Donald B. Kraybill, senior fellow at the Young Center for Anabaptist and Pietist Studies at Elizabethtown College in Elizabethtown, Pa., who has studied the Amish for 20 years.

“These are really safe schools, in rural settings, out of the way,” Mr. Kraybill said. “These children have never watched television, never seen a movie, never seen a video game. They don’t in their minds have any images of violence, and there wouldn’t be any protocol in the school for what to do in an emergency like this.”

About 28,000 Amish live in Lancaster County, and 200,000 in 27 states nationwide, Mr. Kraybill said. Far from dwindling, the Amish population in the United States has doubled about every 20 years because they tend to have many children. As young adults, they must decide whether to be baptized and stay in the community; 90 percent of them decide to remain, experts say.

The Amish are the descendants of Swiss and German immigrants who came to the United States in the 18th century, many to escape persecution. They are Anabaptists, and believe in adult baptism. They worship in homes rather than churches.

In their rural life, they are used to tragedy, said Tom Shachtman, a journalist who wrote “Rumspringa: To Be or Not to Be Amish” (North Point Press, 2006). Barns burn down. Families riding in horse-drawn buggies are hit by trucks. Farmers are maimed in accidents. Many of the large families who Mr. Shachtman met had lost a child, some to suicide.

They accept these tragedies as the will of God, an approach to life they call yieldedness, Mr. Shachtman said. He said this helped explain why the Amish interviewed after the shooting in Nickel Mines, Pa., sounded more resigned than angry. They are pacifists, and some spoke of the need to forgive the killer.

In one sign of their approach to tragedy, Amish residents started a charity fund yesterday not only to help the victims’ families but also to help the gunman’s widow.

“This is imitation of Christ at its most naked,” Mr. Shachtman said. “If anybody is going to turn the other cheek in our society, it’s going to be the Amish.”

He continued, “I don’t want to denigrate anybody else who says they’re imitating Christ, but the Amish walk the walk as much as they talk the talk.”

The Amish surmount hardship through mutual aid. When a barn burns, they do not call the insurance company. They have a barn raising, said Kimberly D. Schmidt, associate professor of history at Eastern Mennonite University, in Harrisonburg, Va., who has studied Amish women.

“For the families who lost children, there will be a tremendous community outpouring of love and support,” Ms. Schmidt said. “They will not suffer alone in their grief at all. People will bring in meals for weeks. As devastating as this is, there’s so much strength they can draw from their community.”

DOJ_NMG_0074774

Attacks Show 'threats … Can Come From Anywhere' (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson And Greg Toppo

USA Today, October 4, 2006

Monday's fatal shootings at an Amish school in Pennsylvania and last week's attack in Bailey, Colo., that left one girl dead underscore how schools across the nation, long considered among the safest places in their communities, also can be the most vulnerable.

Statistics consistently show that children are far safer on school grounds than nearly anywhere else. However, safety consultants say the recent attacks — both by men who apparently were intent on molesting girls — are vivid reminders of the challenges schools and police face in protecting campuses from the outside world.

"It's not school violence — it's community violence that takes place in schools," says Stephen Sroka, a school safety consultant who teaches at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland.

Seven years ago, the massacre at Columbine High School in Colorado — which left 14 students dead, including the two assailants — launched a new era in school security.

Shocked by how easily Columbine students Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold had been able to walk into the school heavily armed and gun down classmates, schools and police agencies across the country made metal detectors and cameras standard equipment at many schools.

Since then, several school shootings by disgruntled or disturbed teenagers have heightened awareness among teachers, students, counselors and parents to be on the lookout for troubled students. Now, the shootings in Bailey and in Nickel Mines, Pa., by adults from the surrounding communities have again changed the paradigm of school security.

"What these attacks represent is that threats to school safety can come from anywhere — from inside and outside the schools," says Kenneth Trump, president of a national school security consulting firm that tracks school-related attacks.

The attack at the one-room schoolhouse in Nickel Mines prompted President Bush to call for a meeting next week to address school safety across the USA. Bush said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings will lead the conference Tuesday.

Mary Ellen O'Toole, a supervisory special agent at the FBI's behavioral analysis unit in Quantico, Va., says that in discussing school safety it is important to distinguish school shooters with ties to a campus from adults "who use schools as a crime scene."

"There may not be a single thing that can be done to prevent a mission-oriented person from committing an act of violence," O'Toole says, referring to the emerging profile of Charles Carl Roberts IV, the Pennsylvania gunman.

Jefferson County, Colo., which includes Columbine High, could be among the most advanced U.S. jurisdictions in preparing for school violence. After the massacre, the Jefferson County Sheriff's Department boosted its training to include a new strategy for officers when confronted with "active shooters," or situations in which people appear to be in imminent danger, department spokeswoman Jacki Kelley says.

In the Nickel Mines incident Monday, officers rushed the schoolhouse after hearing gunfire. Last week in Bailey, authorities initially tried to negotiate with the gunman, Duane Morrison. Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener later told reporters that threats from Morrison and reports from freed hostages that the gunman was molesting young female captives left authorities with little choice but to raid the second-floor classroom where he was holed up.

When officers forced their way into the classroom, Morrison opened fire, fatally shooting one of the two remaining hostages and then killing himself.

Kelley said the case — including the law enforcement officers' response — remains under investigation. The SWAT unit will "never consider this event an absolute success because a life was lost," Kelley says.

In Riverton, Kan., authorities said in April that they foiled a plot for a Columbine-style attack on Riverton High. Cherokee County Sheriff Steve Norman says the episode jolted the rural community into action.

The sheriff's department set up an office near the school. Deputies began patrolling the 500-student campus during the school day and at after-school activities. Still pending are plans to install metal detectors at Riverton and other schools.

The recent shootings mean authorities likely will "go back to the drawing board" and make sure their school security plan protects students from a possible attack by an adult from off campus, Norman says. "A whole new demographic has been introduced here. We're going to have to deal with that. It's a sad state of affairs."

On CBS, Columbine Dad Blames Violence On Secularism (WP)

By Howard Kurtz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074775

The emotions surrounding the murder of five girls at an Amish school in Pennsylvania were still raw Monday when the "CBS Evening News" put on a commentator who blamed such violence on abortion and "expelling God from the school."

Brian Rohrbough, who lost his son in the 1999 Columbine school massacre in Colorado, made the remarks on the "Free Speech" segment, which for the past month has provided a 90-second platform for pundits, politicians and ordinary people to sound off.

The decision to approach Rohrbough and air his views prompted a storm of criticism, some of it within the ranks of CBS News. Anchor Katie Couric responded on her network blog, saying: "We knew when we decided to put on this segment that a lot of people would disagree with it. We also knew some might even find it repugnant.

"But that is the very essence of what we're try to do with the 'Free Speech' segment. This is a platform for our viewers to hear from a wide range of people -- those who may share your views, and those who don't."

Rohrbough, who addressed the Colorado Right to Life march in January, has blamed the Columbine attack on abortion in a number of local interviews. He filed a lawsuit alleging that a Denver police officer shot his 15-year-old son in the confusion of the Columbine attack. Rohrbough apologized to the officer in a Rocky Mountain News interview after an independent investigation concluded the officer had not yet arrived at the school when Rohrbough's son was shot.

Rohrbough also sued the school district over its refusal to allow him to include religious references in two four-inch tiles that are part of a Columbine memorial.

In his CBS commentary, Rohrbough said: "This country is in a moral free fall. For over two generations, the public school system has taught in a moral vacuum, expelling God from the school and from the government, replacing him with evolution, where the strong kill the weak, without moral consequences and life has no inherent value. We teach there are no absolutes, no right or wrong. And I assure you the murder of innocent children is always wrong, including by abortion. Abortion has diminished the value of children."

Rome Hartman, the newscast's executive director, said he was "surprised" by Rohrbough's remarks and "of course I knew that his remarks would be controversial, perhaps even offensive to some. I also knew that some people in our audience would agree with him. I also thought to myself, 'This is "Free Speech." We don't tell people what to say or what to think.' . . . I decided to run the segment."

Some online critics denounced CBS. A blogger at Dymaxion World wrote: "Grief makes people do, and say, stupid . . . things. But CBS is not grieving for anyone. What made them put this man on national television?"

Many detractors wrote to CBS's Web site. One called Rohrbough's remarks "the biggest load of hogwash I have ever witnessed. How could you use an unspeakable tragedy to give a rightwing flat earth nut job a podium?"

But a mother of three wrote to praise CBS's "courage," saying: "I'm sure that you will receive many e-mails denouncing your segment, but I appreciate hearing a 'conservative' view in what can be a very liberal media."

When Evil Disrupts Tradition (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

School shooting challenges Amish way of life in a familiar way.

IF ANYTHING IS MORE UNIMAGINABLE than the execution-style killings of five Amish girls in their one-room schoolhouse, it is the Amish community's reaction to the tragedy. Mourning without anger. Lack of interest in the news media — and a lack of resentment of them too. And an unwillingness, at least so far, to allow this brush with one of modern society's worst horrors to force it into defensiveness.

Charles Carl Roberts IV held no special animosity toward the Amish, investigators say. They believe that he attacked the Amish school simply because it was a vulnerable target — small, secluded, unguarded and, in accordance with the practice of most Amish, without phones.

Those few Amish who would talk to the media refused to vent anger toward Roberts or whatever demons propelled him to violence. The Amish generally said they could not see giving up their small country schoolhouses, or placing guards or other security in the buildings, even if that made them vulnerable. It would mean giving up their peaceful, pastoral way of life, with its insistence on keeping intrusions at bay.

And yet the most horrific of modern intrusions came. Monday's shootings show that even the Amish, for all their insular unworldliness, face the same 21st century predicament as the rest of us: How much to retain the old ways — the cherished, unfettered rituals of daily life — and how much to adapt to new realities and adopt new habits? Americans consider this dilemma every time they board an airplane, check out a library book or use a cellphone. To the Amish, many of whom eschew even electricity, these issues are utterly foreign. Most do not even drive, much less fly. Many of us dream about how wonderful it would be to live a simpler life, free from the tyranny of our BlackBerrys. The Amish live that life.

DOJ_NMG_0074776

Yet even before Monday's tragedy, it was clear that the Amish, too, must balance the pressures (and benefits) of modernity against the comforts (and drawbacks) of tradition. Many Amish have set up shared phone booths outside their homes in case of emergency. On Tuesday, there was talk that although Amish schools were unlikely to employ guards or locks, there might be cellphones on hand, just in case. We all make our concessions — to modernity or to tradition — when we must.

FBI Planning To Widen Its Investigation (SCRIPPS)

By THOMAS HARGROVE And AMIE PARNES

Scripps Howard, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — FBI agents plan to "authenticate" the widely distributed sexually explicit Internet transcripts between U.S. Rep. Mark Foley and former congressional pages, a Department of Justice official said Tuesday.

In addition, agents will interview the teenagers.

Advertisement

Justice officials said they also are considering whether federal or state laws apply in the case, the source said.

It was the first confirmation that federal authorities will conduct an extensive investigation into Foley's actions.

On Monday, federal officials said they were conducting a preliminary legal assessment into the matter. But authorities were much more certain that a significant investigation will take place following the disclosure of yet more sexually explicit transcripts Tuesday.

"We don't know quite what we are dealing with here," the official said. "We don't know if those are the only e-mails. If there are other e-mails, are those e-mails authentic? We are trying to get all the facts and be clear what we are dealing with."

Foley, who served in the U.S. House for 12 years, resigned Friday after reports surfaced that he exchanged sexually explicit online messages with a congressional page who was still in high school.

The justice source, who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the investigation, said officials will first try to determine if the online messages are real.

"The first thing they are trying to do — there is a lot of information in the public domain — is they have to determine the validity and authenticity of this," the source said.

The investigation comes as new reports surfaced that claimed Foley had Internet sex with a high school student in between House votes.

Gonzales: FBI Delving Into Foley's 'deeply Disturbing' E-mails (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

NEW ORLEANS U-S Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the F-B-I is gathering facts to decide whether any laws were broken in connection with a former Florida congressman's sexually explicit e-mails to a former congressional page.Gonzales commented after giving the opening address at a three-day national conference of federal, state and local law enforcement and social service agencies on ways to combat human trafficking and to rescue its victims.Gonzales said he notified the F-B-I after reading deeply disturbing news accounts of the e-mail activities of former U-S Representative Mark Foley a Florida Republican, who resigned in the wake of the scandal.Gonzales, who said the Bush administration lists protection of children as one of its highest priorities, declined to elaborate on how far the e-mail investigation might go.

Foley Lawyer Cites Alcohol, Childhood Abuse (WP)

By Charles Babington And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Disgraced former lawmaker Mark Foley's behavior was affected by alcoholism and childhood molestation but he "never attempted to have sexual contact with a minor," his attorney said yesterday in the first extensive defense of the Florida Republican's actions, which have rocked Congress and the GOP.

The comments came as embattled House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) turned to conservative radio hosts to defend his handling of the Foley matter, and rank-and-file House Republicans took a wait-and-see approach on their leader's fate. President Bush praised Hastert, but the House's second-ranking Republican challenged the speaker's account of how the scandal unfolded.

Lawyer David Roth told reporters in Florida that Foley was intoxicated when he sent lewd electronic messages to former House pages but was always sober when conducting official business during his 12 years in Congress. Roth said he could not explain new reports of an exchange in which Foley appeared to be having Internet sex with a youth while participating in a House roll-call vote.

DOJ_NMG_0074777

Roth also said that Foley is gay, and that when Foley was 13 to 15 years old he was abused by a clergyman. Foley, who is single and Roman Catholic, will fully cooperate with law enforcement officers and will preserve all records, e-mails and other items they might want to review, Roth said. "Nothing will be altered," he said.

Foley, 52, abruptly resigned his seat Friday and checked into an alcohol-treatment facility in Florida.

While Roth was speaking to reporters, federal agents were interviewing former House pages and trying to determine whether Foley crossed state lines to have sex with minors or enticed minors to travel across state lines for a sexual encounter, law enforcement officials said. The widening investigation comes amid reports of electronic messages in which Foley appeared to refer to past or future meetings with former pages, in Washington and other cities.

The investigation is being run by the FBI's Washington Field Office, with close supervision from the Cyber Division and other senior officials at FBI headquarters, said an official speaking on background. Other FBI field offices -- including the one in Miami that covers Foley's home district -- are involved in chasing specific leads and conducting local interviews, the official said.

While federal authorities began their investigation, the debate over the GOP's handling of the Foley matter raged on. The Washington Times's conservative editorial page called on Hastert to resign the speakership. It joined other critics in saying that Hastert and a few lieutenants tried to smother a 2005 complaint about Foley instead of opening inquiries that might have uncovered raunchier exchanges in 2003 with teenagers who had spent a semester on Capitol Hill.

Hastert turned to half a dozen friendly talk-radio hosts to repeat his argument that the early warnings did not justify punishing Foley or launching an internal investigation of his conduct. They involved e-mails in 2005 from Foley asking a Louisiana boy for his birthday wishes and a photograph, which alarmed the youth and his parents. Moreover, Hastert told Rush Limbaugh, "We did not know what the text of that message was because the parents held it and they didn't want it revealed."

Few Republican House members -- who control Hastert's fate -- made comments for or against the speaker. Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) told a Cincinnati radio station that he spoke to Hastert this spring of the early concerns about Foley, one of two such reported conversations that Hastert says he does not recall. "My position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility," Boehner said.

Later, Boehner issued a letter saying that Hastert should not resign. Reps. Henry A. Hyde (R-Ill.) and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) also wrote letters supporting Hastert, but they were not co-signed by colleagues, as such letters often are.

Bush, in his first comments about the scandal, condemned Foley's behavior and praised Hastert but refused to take questions about whether he agrees with conservatives who have called on the speaker to resign his post. "I was disgusted by the revelations and disappointed that he [Foley] would violate the trust of the citizens who placed him in office," Bush said at an elementary school during a campaign swing in California.

The president, endorsing the investigations by the FBI and Congress, called Hastert "a father, teacher, coach who cares about the children of this country," who wants "all the facts to come out" while protecting the young people in the page program.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman offered an endorsement and rejected calls for Hastert to resign. "I support the speaker," he said in a telephone interview from California. "He's a good man. He's taken a very serious situation incredibly seriously and I think we need to figure out everything about this, including whether prosecution is warranted."

Republican strategists, worried about how the scandal will affect GOP candidates in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, said they hope Bush's public comments will help quell anger among conservatives about how the leadership has handled the matter.

"A loss has already taken place, and I don't think you can get that back," said one strategist, who asked not to be identified in order to speak candidly about the party's problems. "It's damage control and picking up the pieces from here. The president doing this today can be helpful."

A source close to Hastert said he thinks the speaker and the party at large are pulling past the worst of the damage. "The speaker is hearing from [GOP] members that we're all in this together," said the source, who would discuss the conversations only on background.

ABC News, which first reported the graphic instant messages, posted a new electronic exchange yesterday in which Foley allegedly had simulated sex with a former page during a 15-minute House vote in 2003.

Debates raged on the Web and elsewhere over the degree to which closeted and open gays in Washington knew of Foley's interest in teenage boys, and whether such knowledge extended to wider circles. Former Capitol Police chief Terrance W. Gainer said: "During my four years [as chief], I was totally unaware of any such allegation. And had I been, I would have opened a case."

One congressional source, meanwhile, said the FBI inquiry could put legislators in an awkward position if tips prompt agents to seek computer records or other items from lawmakers' offices. Five months ago, many House members protested an FBI raid on the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) as part of a public corruption investigation.

In his late-afternoon news conference, Roth said Foley "does not blame the trauma he sustained as a young adolescent for his totally inappropriate e-mails and IMs," or instant messages. "He continues to offer no excuse whatsoever for his conduct."

DOJ_NMG_0074778

He said Foley "kept his shame to himself for almost 40 years. Specifically, Mark has asked that you be told that between the ages of 13 and 15 he was molested by a clergyman." Roth declined to name the clergyman's religion.

A coalition of conservative, pro-family groups issued a statement expressing concern that House leaders had not moved aggressively when first informed about the e-mail between Foley and the Louisiana youth.

The groups' leaders said they are concerned that the "integrity of the conservative majority has given way to political correctness, trading the virtues of decency and respect for that of tolerance and diversity." The statement stopped short of joining in the calls for Hastert to step aside and did not mention anyone from either party by name.

FBI's Foley Case Eyes Legal 'Gray Area' (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former Rep. Mark Foley's online conversations with teenage male pages have all the trappings of a political scandal, but making a federal case out of the sexually charged exchanges could prove difficult, veteran investigators say.

Foley, a six-term Republican from Florida, resigned abruptly as his e-mails and instant message transcripts surfaced. The chats discussed sexual acts and possible meetings with pages, according to ABC News, which first reported them last week.

With the FBI investigating Foley's behavior, his defense attorney, David Roth, said that the congressman never had sex or attempted sexual contact with a minor. Foley, who is being treated for alcohol abuse, was drinking when he had the explicit conversations, Roth said.

"Any suggestion that Mark Foley is a pedophile is false," Roth said Tuesday at a news conference in West Palm Beach, Fla.

If Foley never had sex with a congressional page, then his case is in uncertain legal territory, said Ken Lanning, a retired FBI agent who served as one of the agency's leading experts on child exploitation.

"There are going to be some issues here in the gray area," Lanning said. "You may find this behavior repulsive, offensive or immoral. Whether it's a violation of law will be based on a precise reading of the law."

Congressional leaders, who called for an FBI investigation as Foley resigned, turned to finger-pointing over who knew what about Foley's behavior, when they knew it and whether anything was done to protect the teens.

One federal law enforcement official said the FBI reviewed some Foley-related e-mail in July but concluded that no federal law had been violated. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the case is active, said agents are reviewing new evidence, including the instant message transcripts, to see if a law was broken.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said the agency is continuing its assessment.

In Florida, Roth said no law enforcement officials had contacted him. Foley has not been subpoenaed but voluntarily agreed not to delete any e-mails or instant messages from his computers, the lawyer said.

Some Democrats have claimed Foley might have violated the federal law used to prosecute Internet sex predators, but experts said it's not that simple.

On the surface, the chat transcripts released by ABC News look much like any of the explicit conversations the FBI has used as evidence in its many Internet sex stings. In those cases, however, the sexually charged talk led to an arrest when adults arrived for real sexual encounters.

Graphic talk alone is rarely enough, said Joseph Dooley, a former agent who helped set up New England's first FBI unit targeting Internet predators. Many adults engage in explicit chats with undercover agents but never show up for the scheduled meetings, he said.

"We never charged anyone unless they actually traveled to have sex," Dooley said.

Investigators could consider federal obscenity laws, experts said, but the law prohibiting disseminating obscene material to children applies only to those under 16.

Benjamin Vernia, a former federal prosecutor specializing in such cases, compared Foley's online conversations with pages to "grooming," a law enforcement term for the way sexual predators bring along their underage victims. Grooming is a red flag for authorities, Vernia said, but it's rarely enough to bring charges.

The question for federal investigators is whether Foley's online chats ever led to real encounters. One chat transcript suggests Foley and a page had met in San Diego, but the chat doesn't indicate what took place.

Even if a sexual encounter occurred, however, that won't necessarily be enough to lead to charges. It depends on how old the pages were at the time and what the age of consent was in that state.

If a state law was broken and authorities can show Foley used the Internet to facilitate it, that could trigger federal jurisdiction, experts said.

DOJ_NMG_0074779

Foley Tells Of Being Abused (SPTIMES)

By Anita Kumar

St. Petersburg Times, October 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley announced Tuesday that he was abused by a clergyman as a teenager, but he said he accepts responsibility for sending sexually explicit correspondence to boys.

His attorney, David Roth, also acknowledged at a news conference on Foley's behalf that the former congressman is gay, a widely held belief in Washington but a topic that Foley previously had declined to discuss.

"Mark Foley wants you to know he is a gay man," said Roth, speaking from West Palm Beach.

Roth said the disclosures were part of Foley's recovery for alcoholism and behavioral problems.

Foley was molested between ages 13 and 15 by a clergyman, Roth said. He would not identify the clergyman or the church. Foley is Roman Catholic.

Foley, 52, entered an in-patient rehabilitation facility at an undisclosed location about midnight Sunday. It came two days after he abruptly resigned following the public disclosure of e-mails and instant messages between him and former congressional pages that went back at least three years.

New Internet exchanges released Tuesday by ABC News indicate that Foley, using the screen name Maf54, may have met with teenage boys.

In one message, Foley appears to leave the House floor during votes to engage in Internet sex with a high school student.

The exchange, in which Foley and the former page appear to describe having sexual orgasms, occurred on the night in 2003 that the House voted to provide more money for the war in Iraq.

Roth repeatedly said Tuesday that Foley never had inappropriate sexual contact with a minor and that he was under the influence of alcohol when he sent many of the messages. He said Foley drank at night, alone, but never at the Capitol.

The FBI and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement said this weekend they are investigating the correspondence. Both agencies are using agents from their cyber child protection units.

FDLE Commissioner Gerald Bailey said the FBI has begun the process of seizing computers from Foley's homes and offices. He referred other questions to the FBI.

The FBI and U.S. Department of Justice did not return calls.

While in California on Tuesday, President Bush made his first remarks about the Foley scandal.

"I was dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior," Bush said. "I was disgusted by the revelations and disappointed that he would violate the trust of the citizens who placed him in office.''

The scandal comes just weeks before midterm elections in which some observers have said Democrats have their best chance in a dozen years to take control of the House.

It has left House Republican leaders fending off allegations that they knew about Foley's behavior for months but failed to adequately respond to it.

On Tuesday, the Democratic National Committee focused on Foley's former chief of staff, who now works for Rep. Tom Reynolds, leader of a group that helps Republicans get elected to the House.

Reynolds was one of several House leaders who knew of some "overly friendly" e-mails between Foley and one boy months ago.

The DNC said Reynolds "failed to ask the tough questions, choosing instead to cover up the facts."

Kirk Fordham, Reynolds chief of staff, said he never spoke to Reynolds about Foley's contacts with pages before the details of the e-mails became public last Thursday.

Fordham said that he provided advice to Foley last week and that when he learned the graphic sexual content of some of the instant messages, he confronted Foley.

"I said: 'Are these authentic?' and he said 'probably,' and he confirmed that they were likely his instant messages," Fordham said.

Fordham said the immediate reaction of his current boss, Reynolds, was to urge Foley to leave Congress.

"He told me (Foley) needed to resign," said Fordham, adding that the National Republican Congressional Committee wrote the first draft of Foley's resignation letter before it was rewritten on Foley's official letterhead.

Foley Was Molested As Child, Lawyer Says (USAT)

By Alan Gomez And Brad Heath

USA Today, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074780

The lawyer for former Florida congressman Mark Foley said Tuesday that Foley had been molested as a child by a clergyman and did not have inappropriate sexual contact with congressional pages.

Lawyer David Roth said Foley, a Republican who represented parts of Palm Beach County in Congress for nearly 12 years, was under the influence of alcohol when he sent overtly sexual messages to teenage male pages. He also divulged that Foley is gay and said the disclosure was part of his client's "recovery."

Foley "does not blame the trauma he sustained as a young adolescent for his totally inappropriate e-mails" and instant messages, Roth said. "He continues to offer no excuse whatsoever for his conduct."

Foley resigned Friday after his e-mails and messages were made public. He is now in an alcohol rehabilitation program.

Roth insisted Foley had no physical sexual contact with a page: "Any suggestion that Mark Foley is a pedophile is false."

Roth would not identify the clergyman. He said only that Foley, a Roman Catholic, had been molested when he was 13 to 15 years old, a time in which he was living in Palm Beach County.

Mary Ross Agosta, a spokeswoman for the Catholic Archdiocese of Miami, said Foley never filed a report of abuse, but she encouraged him to do so.

Roth's news conference came as ABC News released more lurid instant messages it said were between Foley and a page. ABC said Foley sent salacious messages while in the House voting on a supplemental defense budget in 2003. None of the messages have been independently authenticated.

In an interview with USA TODAY, a former page said he was always surprised that Foley would pay so much attention to the pages, especially the males. Tim Ford, a freshman at Stanford University who worked as a page in 2004-05, said Foley would routinely pat them on the back or place his hand on their legs. "I would always give him the benefit of the doubt because you just like it when a member of Congress notices your work," Ford said.

Meanwhile, Foley's former chief of staff said that he asked ABC News to edit out of its reports Foley's most sexually explicit messages.

Kirk Fordham told reporters he was trying to spare Foley's sister, Donna, and his ailing parents from the "lurid" details. He called "absurd" assertions that he was trying to cover up the incident.

"Perhaps a bit naively, I was thinking of Mark's family, primarily his parents," said Fordham, who is now chief of staff for Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, who is chairman of the House GOP campaign committee. "It was never, ever my intention to suppress this information."

Fordham said Foley was with him when he heard details of the messages.

"I hung up the phone and I turned to (Foley) and I asked him, 'Are these authentic?' And he said, 'Probably.' "

Fordham said he then went to his boss, who said Foley must resign. Fordham then went to Foley's home with a resignation letter, which Foley signed.

Foley Says He Was Abused By A Clergyman (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff

AP, October 3, 2006

Disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley said through his lawyer Tuesday that he was sexually abused by a clergyman as a teenager, but accepts full responsibility for sending salacious computer messages to teenage male pages.

Attorney David Roth said Foley was molested between ages 13 and 15 by a clergyman. He declined to identify the clergyman or the church, but Foley is Roman Catholic.

He also acknowledged for the first time that the former congressman is gay, saying the disclosure was part of his client's "recovery."

"Mark Foley wants you to know he is a gay man," Roth told reporters in Florida as Republicans struggled to avoid election-year fallout from the congressman's behavior and sudden resignation.

Foley represented parts of Palm Beach County for 12 years until he abruptly resigned Friday after being accused of sending lurid Internet messages to teenage boys who served as pages on Capitol Hill. The FBI and Florida law enforcement officials are investigating whether he violated any laws.

The lawyer said Foley, who is now in treatment for alcohol abuse, never had any inappropriate sexual contact with a minor. He said Foley was under the influence of alcohol when he sent the e-mails and instant messages.

Asked why he didn't disclose this information sooner, Roth said, "Shame, shame."

"As is so often the case with victims of abuse, Mark advises that he kept his shame to himself for almost 40 years," Roth said.

Foley announced in a statement Sunday that he had checked into a facility to be treated for "alcoholism and other behavioral problems."

DOJ_NMG_0074781

Roth said Foley never had any sexual contact with minors.

"There was absolutely no inappropriate sexual contact with any minor ... and any suggestion that Mark Foley is a pedophile is false," he said, adding that Foley never even attempted to have sexual relations with the teens.

Asked whether Foley was suicidal, Roth said, "I am not concerned about that at all."

"I was advised by his doctor that despite obvious pressure and the trauma of what he has gone through as a result of the revelations that he has determined to be completely inappropriate and inexcusable that he is not in danger of hurting himself," Roth said.

Foley Was Sexually Abused As A Youth, His Lawyer Says (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla., Oct. 3 — In another day of revelations about former Representative Mark Foley, his lawyer said Tuesday that as a teenager, Mr. Foley had been molested by a clergyman and had "kept the shame to himself" until now. The lawyer also issued the congressman's first public acknowledgment that he is gay.

The lawyer, David Roth, who said Mr. Foley had enlisted him immediately after resigning from the House of Representatives on Friday, told reporters, "Mark Foley wants you to know that he is a gay man."

The announcement came hours after ABC News released a new series of inappropriate messages that Mr. Foley is said to have sent to a teenager while waiting to cast a House vote in April 2003. The youth was a Congressional page, ABC News said on its Web site, but it was not clear if he had left Washington at the time Mr. Foley sent the messages.

Mr. Foley, 52, had been expected to win a seventh term in Congress easily until accusations surfaced last week that he had sent sexually graphic e-mail messages to young Congressional pages. His sudden fall has thrown Congress into turmoil just a month before Election Day, and several of Mr. Foley's associates said Tuesday evening that his claim of childhood sexual abuse did not help matters.

"It doesn't change anything," said Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Palm Beach County Republican Party. "In a way it makes it worse. A person who knows they have a problem and spends all those years covering it up, who leads a double life and allows themselves to be a leader of a community when their life is completely hypocritical, is worse."

Mr. Roth, who said he had known Mr. Foley for 35 years, called a news conference on Monday to announce that his client had checked into a treatment center for alcohol and mental health problems. On Tuesday, he said Mr. Foley had decided to disclose his abuse by a clergyman he would not identify as part of his recovery.

"Based upon the experts that I've spoken to," Mr. Roth said, "the combination of alcohol, mental illness can result in inappropriate conduct, which Mark Foley has fully accepted responsibility for."

In Tallahassee, Commissioner Gerald M. Bailey of the Florida Department of Law Enforcement said his agency was working with the F.B.I. to investigate whether Mr. Foley had engaged in criminal behavior and was "trying to determine, as we speak, what the Florida nexus is."

Mr. Roth said that he had not heard from any law enforcement agency and that Mr. Foley had not been asked to turn over any computers or electronic files.

"Mark has absolutely agreed on his own and with our counsel not to do anything with any computer," he said. "Not to delete any messages."

He also repeated what he said Monday: that Mr. Foley had never had sexual contact with minors.

"Any suggestion that Mark Foley is a pedophile is false," Mr. Roth said. "Categorically false."

Battered with questions about the messages released Tuesday by ABC News, Mr. Roth said he had not seen them and could not comment without consulting with his client.

He said Mr. Foley, who was raised a Roman Catholic and attended Catholic schools in Lake Worth, had wanted to identify the person he said had molested him from ages 13 to 15. But his civil lawyers had advised him not to do so until he had completed treatment, Mr. Roth said. He even refused to identify the man's religious affiliation.

"I cannot comment on whether the clergyman was a priest, a minister, an imam or a rabbi," he said.

"Mark does not blame the trauma he sustained as a young adolescent for his totally inappropriate e-mails," Mr. Roth said. He added, "He continues to offer no excuse whatsoever for his conduct."

Gov. Jeb Bush and other Republican leaders here continued rallying around the substitute candidate for Mr. Foley's seat, State Representative Joe Negron of Stuart.

Governor Bush said he would campaign with Mr. Negron to help surmount the challenge of Mr. Foley's name remaining on the ballot in the sprawling 16th District.

DOJ_NMG_0074782

With their party under attack because of the scandal, Governor Bush and other Republicans suggested that Democrats were hypocrites for taking them to task. In particular, Democratic leaders have attacked Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the House speaker, who is said to have learned about some communications between Mr. Foley and a 16-year-old page months ago.

Mr. Dinerstein said he and other Republicans intended to trumpet the story of Mel Reynolds, the former Democratic congressman from Chicago who was imprisoned for corruption and for having sex with an under-age campaign worker. Former President Bill Clinton pardoned Mr. Reynolds before he left office.

"If the Democrats want to fight on the issue of who's protecting the public and the children and all that," Mr. Dinerstein said, "God bless them, because two weeks from now Mel Reynolds will be a household name."

Attorney: Foley Was Molested As Teen By Clergyman (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 4, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Former Congressman Mark Foley was molested by a clergyman from the time he was 13 until he was 15, his attorney said today.

Foley, who resigned from Congress Friday after he was confronted with inappropriate e-mails that he exchanged with a 16-year-old former page, also directed lawyer David Roth to announce publicly for the first time that he is gay.

"Finally Mark Foley wants you to know that he is a gay man," Roth said in the 6 p.m. press conference at Centennial Park in West Palm Beach.

Roth said Foley, who is in treatment for alcoholism, directed him to make the statements as part of Foley's recovery.

"This was a life decision, not a tactical one made by others."

Roth said Foley wanted to announce the name of the individual and the denomination of the church, but upon counseling decided to wait until after his treatment to release those details.

Foley is Catholic and was an altar boy at Sacred Heart Church in Lake Worth.

Foley's alleged childhood sexual abuse could have contributed to his own abusive behavior, according to a psychiatrist.

"There's no question that being sexually abused as a child increases the risk of being a perpetrator," says Dr. Jon Shaw, director of child and adolescent psychiatry at the University of Miami.

"Sometimes the sexual victimization, while a horrifying experience, can often lead to sexual arousal at the same time. It's very confusing to the child. They later can identify with the aggressor, and do unto a child what was done unto them. They may pick a child roughly the same age they were when they were victimized. They become both the perpetrator and the victim."

Shaw said he didn't think that being abused by an authority figure, like a priest or a teacher, increases the tendency to be sexually abusive as an adult.

"A child gets victimized, experiences arousal along with pain, powerlessness, there may become an imbedded deviant pathway for sexual gratification and a readiness to repeat the pattern."

Not every child who is abused becomes an abuser, and only a small percentage actually do, he said.

There are no good studies on cause and effect.

"We don't quite know why, how a child goes from victim to victimizer, but clearly in many instances there is a connection."

Roth's announcement came hours after ABC News reported that it obtained new instant messages between Foley and unnamed teenager while Foley waited to cast his vote in April 2003 on HR 1559, Emergency War Time supplemental appropriations.

ABC is reporting that it has received "52 separate instant message exchanges which former pages say were sent by Foley, using the screen name Maf54, to two different boys under the age of 18."

While waiting to vote at 7 p.m. Foley, according to ABC , engaged "in Internet sex with a high school student who had served as a congressional page."

ABC did not provide the more lurid aspects of the exchange. It simply said. "Foley and the teen both appear to describe having sexual orgasms."

Then the exchange continues:

Maf54: ok..i better go vote. . .did you know you would have this effect on me

Teen: lol I guessed

Teen: ya go vote -- I don't want to keep you from doing our job

Maf54: can I have a good kiss goodnight

Teen: :-*

Teen: (kiss)

Later, Foley invite the teen to come to Foley's Washington home where they can drink in private.

DOJ_NMG_0074783

Teen: shhh...
Maf54: ok
Teen: that's not what my ID says
Teen: lol
Maf54: ok
Teen: I probably shouldn't be telling you that huh
Maf54: we may need to drink at my house so we don't get busted.

Foley Acquaintances Question Alcoholism (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff
AP, October 3, 2006

When disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley announced he was entering rehab for treatment of alcoholism and "other behavioral problems," some of those who have known him for years were shocked and suspicious.

Some friends and acquaintances said they rarely saw him drink.

A former colleague, Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., said on Fox News Channel: "I don't buy this at all. I think this is a phony defense. The fact is, I think he's responsible for what he did here and I think it's a gimmick."

Foley abruptly resigned from Congress after being accused of sending lurid Internet messages to teenage boys who served as pages on Capitol Hill. The FBI and Florida law enforcement officials are investigating whether the Florida Republican violated any laws.

"Mark acknowledges that he is an alcoholic and as many alcoholics does not publicly display his consumption," Foley's attorney and longtime friend David Roth said.

Some longtime acquaintances said they cannot reconcile Foley's public and private lives, including the lurid communications and the claimed drinking problem.

"I have never seen Mark inebriated in public," said Robin Bernstein, who has known Foley for 25 years. "I mean, he was a social drinker like most of us at cocktail parties with a glass of wine, but Mark was always ... the consummate gentleman."

"The best thing he can do now is get help for the problem he hid from many of us. The man I knew was certainly an honorable man," Bernstein said.

Longtime friend and Palm Beach socialite Petra Levin said she knew Foley had a drinking problem. "You know, a lot of people who have drinking problems, you mainly do not see them in public, and that's why it becomes a problem," she said.

Dr. Lauren Williams, a psychiatrist who specializes in addiction at the University of Miami's Miller School of Medicine, said many alcoholics hide their drinking, especially when they are in positions of power.

"It really permeates the person's life at different stages, and until something drastic happens, they don't own up and say, `I have a problem,'" Williams said.

It is certainly not new for public figures to blame alcoholism or addiction for misdeeds. Mel Gibson blamed alcohol for his anti-Semitic tirade during a drunken driving arrest in California.

Rep. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I., checked himself into the Mayo Clinic for addiction to prescription pain drugs after a nighttime car crash near the Capitol that he claimed not to remember. Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, began treatment for alcohol dependency after admitting he improperly accepted tens of thousands of dollars worth of trips, meals and sports tickets in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

While Foley's attorney said the congressman never had "inappropriate sexual contact with a minor," that may not matter, said Kendall Coffey, a former U.S. attorney in Florida.

He said Foley could face criminal charges under state or federal laws for "grooming" minors for sexual contact.

"There are going to be experts who look at these e-mails and say those are the unmistakable fingerprints of a predator, but others will call them fantasies. It's a question of intent," the former prosecutor said.

New Foley Instant Messages; Had Internet Sex While Awaiting House Vote (ABC)

By Brian Ross And Maddy Sauer
ABC.com, October 3, 2006

Former Congressman Mark Foley (R-FL) interrupted a vote on the floor of the House in 2003 to engage in Internet sex with a high school student who had served as a congressional page, according to new Internet instant messages provided to ABC News by former pages.

ABC News now has obtained 52 separate instant message exchanges, which former pages say were sent by Foley, using the screen name Maf54, to two different boys under the age of 18.

DOJ_NMG_0074784

This message was dated April 2003, at approximately 7 p.m., according to the message time stamp.
Maf54: I miss you
Teen: ya me too
Maf54: we are still voting
Maf54: you miss me too
The exchange continues in which Foley and the teen both appear to describe having sexual orgasms.
Maf54: ok..i better go vote..did you know you would have this effect on me
Teen: lol I guessed
Teen: ya go vote…I don't want to keep you from doing our job
Maf54: can I have a good kiss goodnight
Teen: :-*
Teen:
The House voted that evening on HR 1559, Emergency War Time supplemental appropriations.
According to another message, Foley also invites the teen and a friend to come to his house near Capitol Hill so they can drink alcohol.
Teen: are you going to be in town over the veterans day weekend
Maf54: I may be now that your coming
Teen: haha good stuff
Teen: umm no one really
Maf54: we will be adjourned ny then
Teen: oh good
Maf54: by
Maf54: then we can have a few drinks
Teen: shhh…
Maf54: ok
Teen: that's not what my ID says
Teen: lol
Maf54: ok
Teen: I probably shouldn't be telling you that huh
Maf54: we may need to drink at my house so we don't get busted

Aide At Center Of The Controversy (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writers
The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006
Questions arise over whether GOP leaders should have known earlier about the behavior of Kirk Fordham's former boss.
WASHINGTON — As the world collapsed around former Rep. Mark Foley, he looked for advice from a friend who knew him better than anyone else in the Capitol: his longtime chief of staff Kirk Fordham.
The upstate New York native had run Foley's first campaign for Congress in 1994. He remained loyal three years ago as Foley abandoned his ambitions of winning a Senate seat amid reports that he was gay. And Fordham looked out for Foley as the congressman led an active social life around Capitol Hill, trying to make sure his boss' activities did not lead to politically harmful speculation.
But today, Fordham is at the center of questions over whether Republican leaders should have known more about Foley's behavior before the revelation broke last week that Foley was sending sexually explicit messages to teenage boys.
Fordham, 39, is now chief of staff to one of the most powerful Republicans in the House, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, who as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee is in charge of helping the GOP retain its majority — a goal that has been placed further in jeopardy by the Foley scandal.
Fordham left Foley's office in 2004, but on Friday he joined in a conversation at the congressman's Capitol Hill town house advising Foley to resign.
Fordham counseled his former boss as the story began breaking last week — first with a report of an e-mail in which the congressman had asked a former House page for his picture and then with the more explicit instant messages that followed. He asked an ABC News reporter to not publish the messages, a protective role Fordham had performed for years as he sought to prevent mainstream media reports about his ambitious boss' sexual orientation.

Democrats charge that Fordham's involvement reflected the GOP's desire to minimize the political fallout by, at least initially, keeping the issue quiet.

Reynolds, who is locked in a tight reelection battle for his own upstate New York seat, was forced to address his aide's role on Tuesday, telling reporters that Fordham acted without his knowledge. He said he didn't discuss the Foley matter with Fordham until Friday.

"I didn't give him permission to have any conversations that he's had at any time with Mark Foley, either as his friend or as his former employer," said Reynolds, adding that Fordham was interacting with Foley on his own time.

Reynolds has said that he first alerted House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert last spring to an "overly friendly" e-mail that had been sent by Foley to a teenager. But he did not know about the more explicit instant messages until they were reported last week, he said.

Fordham, who worked on the 2004 campaign of Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) before working as a private consultant and then joining Reynolds' office, retained a lawyer on Tuesday and said that he intended to cooperate with the FBI's investigation of Foley's behavior.

Speaking on the advice of his lawyer only to the Associated Press and to an upstate New York newspaper, Fordham said Tuesday that he confronted Foley on Friday about the sexually explicit messages.

"I said, 'Are these authentic?' and he said, 'Probably,' and he confirmed that they were likely his instant messages," Fordham told AP.

Fordham said that Reynolds instructed him to tell Foley that he needed to resign.

The NRCC wrote Foley's resignation letter, which was transferred to Foley's stationery and signed by the congressman during a gathering at his house that included Fordham and Foley's sister, who has been his closest friend and political advisor.

"I was still pretty shellshocked myself," Fordham told AP. "This was someone I had worked for for 10 years. I had no inkling that this kind of blatantly reckless — just obscene — behavior was going on behind our backs."

Fordham added that, until last week, he had never spoken with Reynolds about any potential problems involving Foley and that Reynolds did not ask him about the Foley e-mail last spring.

Fordham's lawyer, former federal prosecutor Tim Heaphy, said Tuesday that Fordham would be forthcoming when investigators interviewed him about Foley.

The aide's attempt to ask ABC not to publish or air the instant messages was not an effort to withhold the information from law enforcement, Heaphy said.

"It was never an attempt to obstruct justice," Heaphy said. "It was an attempt to shield his boss from the political storm."

*

peter.wallsten@latimes.com
noam.levey@latimes.com

*

Times staff writer Deborah Schoch in Los Angeles contributed to this report.

Some Say They Felt Uneasy About Representative's Attention (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi, Juliet Eilperin And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

In 1995, male House pages were warned to steer clear of a freshman Republican from Florida, who was already learning the names of the teenagers, dashing off notes, letters and e-mails to them, and asking them to join him for ice cream, according to a former page.

Mark Beck-Heyman, now a graduate student in clinical psychology at George Washington University, and more than a dozen other former House pages said in interviews and via e-mail that Rep. Mark Foley was known to be extraordinarily friendly in a way that made some of them uncomfortable.

Beck-Heyman, who was a Republican page and is now a Democrat, said the attention was "weird," and he provided a handwritten letter that Foley sent him after the page left Washington to return home to California. The note suggested that they get together during the Republican National Convention in San Diego in 1996.

The e-mail exchanges that have become public in recent days are between Foley and male former pages. None of those interviewed said they had received a sexual or suggestive overture from him during their time on Capitol Hill. Yet many of them said they were uneasy about Foley's actions and felt awkward complaining to anyone about them.

"Mark Foley knew that he could get away with this type of behavior with male pages because he was a congressman," said Beck-Heyman, who later worked in the Clinton White House and on Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential campaign. "But many people on Capitol Hill," including many Republican staffers, "have known for over 11 years about what was going on and chose to do nothing," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0074786

The six-term lawmaker resigned Friday after ABC News questioned him about sexually explicit electronic messages he had sent to a former page.

Yesterday, his attorney said Foley has never had sexual contact with a minor.

Also yesterday, ABC reported that Foley had a sexual conversation via instant message with a former page during a House vote in 2003.

Foley was popular with many of the pages. The teenagers come from all over the nation to serve at the Capitol, taking school classes and living in dormitories.

Their schedules are tightly controlled. They travel with adult chaperones and their computers are monitored. They attend social functions and sometimes spend time alone with House members. So when they do receive extra one-on-one attention, it is a big deal.

The pages did, however, receive a lot of attention from Foley. He attended one of their parties in a tuxedo. He donated to the fundraiser that helps pay for their prom and spoke admiringly about them in floor speeches. He learned their names and asked them about themselves. For many, it was welcome attention.

"He was consistently kind," said Bryce Chitwood, president of the 2002 page class. "He was just a very friendly man and was always willing to befriend a page. It was something we appreciated. You find yourself very low on the totem pole of the congressional power scale. For a congressman to act like he was interested in a person and cared about us was something pretty special and pretty important."

Foley spoke about his attachment to the program occasionally as part of the farewell address lawmakers delivered to House pages each summer. In 2002, he discussed how he was tempted "to put some money" in a card he gave to one page who had sent him a graduation notice.

"Then I realized he would tell all of you, and then I would get hundreds of graduation announcements," Foley said, according to the Congressional Record. "So I chose not to."

Another page had won a lunch with the congressman that year at the annual page auction. When he asked to go to Morton's steakhouse, Foley said on the House floor that the two of them "proceeded to cruise down in my BMW to Morton's. And all of this story is meant to make you all feel jealous that you were not the high bidders."

In a separate floor speech two years later, Foley praised the teenagers for their maturity. "Now, I know you have one more year of high school to conclude and that probably is some degree of relief or maybe, to those you feel like you are probably well equipped to enter your first year of college," he said. "Some of you, I think, in conversing with you, some are actually mature enough to enter college right away."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who served as a Senate page between 1963 and 1967, said Foley's attempts to socialize with pages went beyond the ordinary. Davis and other lawmakers may have taken their own pages to lunch at the Members' Dining Room at the end of the year, Davis said, but anything else was considered inappropriate.

As a page, Davis recalled, "if a member of Congress, a House member or a senator, took the time to talk to you, that was a big deal."

Anna Fry, a former House page who said she had never heard about Foley's advances, said some of her classmates may have been tempted to correspond with the congressman after they left because they were eager to land jobs on Capitol Hill.

"After we graduated, everyone wanted to come back. Everyone was looking for an opportunity to stay in Washington," Fry said. "I can see how a 16-year-old would be vulnerable to that."

Matt Schmitz, a former page whose younger brother also was a page, said: "I certainly warned my little brother, who was a page last year. A few of the members are a little friendlier to the pages."

Beck-Heyman, who contacted The Washington Post and the Los Angeles Times, joined the page program in the summer of 1995. He said a departing page told him to be "very careful" of Foley. Within weeks, Beck-Heyman said, Foley had learned his name and asked at least once to take him to get ice cream. He declined. After one all-night work session, Beck-Heyman's girlfriend -- another page -- offered to bring him breakfast. Foley asked if she was his girlfriend. "It was an odd conversation," Beck-Heyman said.

After he completed the page program, Beck-Heyman wrote thank-you notes to 10 House members. He received a reply from Foley almost immediately, suggesting that the two meet up during the Republican convention in San Diego.

Get Congress Out Of The Page Business (NYT)

By Jonathan Turley

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074787

WASHINGTON

MEMBERS of Congress have been falling over themselves this week to assign blame to other people in the aftermath of the resignation of their colleague Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who has acknowledged sending improper e-mail messages to a former House page. The fact is, however, that they are all to blame to different degrees for this latest page scandal.

I served as a House leadership page in 1977 and 1978 under the sponsorship of Sidney Yates, an Illinois Democrat. This was during the dark ages when male pages were simply given a salary and told to find their own housing. (Female pages were housed at the Y.W.C.A.) It goes without saying that pages grew up fast and had to learn self-discipline and survival skills.

During my tenure, I was taken by other pages to the home of a man who lived on Capitol Hill — not a member of Congress — and who would give male pages alcohol and drugs. He was clearly a pedophile. On weekends, he brought boys into the woods to drink, shoot guns and pose for semi-nude pictures for his "collection." I knew enough to leave, but, given the extent of his "collection," some clearly did not.

It later became obvious, however, that some of the greatest dangers lurked inside, not outside, the halls of Congress. In 1983, two members were censured for having had sexual relationships with House pages. Dan Crane of Illinois was defeated after he said he had sex with a 17-year-old female page in 1980. Gerry Studds of Massachusetts refused to apologize for a 1973 relationship with a 17-year-old male page, saying that the page was above the age of consent. Mr. Studds was elected five more times.

Like the rest of society, Congress has always had sexual deviants and sexual predators who cultivated images of themselves as churchgoers with family values. Mr. Foley was a co-chairman of the House Caucus of Missing and Exploited Children and an author of various bills about abuse of children. For a member with dark predilections, the presence of trusting and vulnerable pages can be an irresistible temptation.

There are aspects of the representative-page relationship that can unfortunately provide ample opportunities for sexual predators. Pedophiles often assume fatherly roles, reassuring pages living far from their parents. The subordinate position of pages also fulfills power fantasies for some pedophiles.

What is at risk is something truly unique. Since the 1820's, pages have been an official part of Congress, but there were probably pages even in the first Congress, in the 1790's. For these young men and women, being a page is an experience that will resonate with them for the rest of their lives. (It is therefore particularly galling that, as in 1983, the misconduct of members often leads to calls to abolish the page service — removing the temptations rather than deterring the abuses.)

As a 16-year-old page, I served such iconic figures as Barbara Jordan and heard addresses from leaders like Hubert Humphrey. I still remember the first time I had to hoist the flag on top of the House of Representatives, walking over a narrow plank of rotted wood that was probably 200 years old. I stood on top of the windy Capitol holding that flag and having my own "Titanic" moment: I felt as if there was no limit to this country or its promise. When I sat to catch my breath I noticed a spot near the door where pages had recorded their names for over a century. You could feel a connection that ran for generations, as if pages were part of the Capitol itself.

Pages also serve as reminders to members of Congress of the idealism that first drove them to choose public service. In the hallways of the Capitol they seem like antidotes to the Abramoffs, the Cunninghams and the general stifling cynicism that has taken over government. That is why many of us are so angry with the failure, yet again, to protect our pages.

The 1980's scandals led to some important reforms on housing and schooling (including the creation of a page dormitory). These reforms, however, fell short of the needed changes.

The most glaring problem is that the House Page Board, which supervises the pages, is made up mostly of members of Congress (the Senate Page Board is composed of only two Senate officials, with no members). The representatives on the board have built-in conflicts of interests in moving against members accused of harassment. Political and social alliances complicate the process and many members would prefer to remain in blissful ignorance when rumors arise. Indeed, some (including the House speaker, Dennis Hastert) are accused of having known about Mr. Foley's inappropriate messages months ago but allowing the matter to be addressed only informally and without serious action.

The solution is simple: the alumni of the page program need to protect their own ranks. Some of Washington's most powerful figures in politics, media, business and the law are former pages. They are neither intimidated by members of Congress nor hesitant to drag a member to account. They are protective of pages and have the clout to match their concern.

Congress should create a Congressional Page Board composed of former pages. This board would have the ability to report infractions directly to the respective Ethics Committees for each house, which would be required to investigate and act upon any complaint submitted by the board.

One of the benefits of such a board is that former pages are likely to have a greater connection and rapport with current pages. Indeed, what is unusual about this case is that the page actually came forward — reports suggest that other pages had known of Mr. Foley's conduct for years. They were wrong in not coming forward with the information. But that's a difficult thing to do. It might have been easier if the voice on the other end of a telephone line was a former page.

DOJ_NMG_0074788

If members are truly outraged, they will help us protect pages from predators in their own ranks. Power and pedophilia are by no means inevitable allies, but it is ridiculous and reckless to ignore their historical relationship. As former pages, we are happy to leave the Foleys, Cranes and Studdses to Congress. But Congress should leave the welfare of the pages to us.

Those IMs Aren't As Private As You Think (WSJ)

By Amol Sharma And Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

It's already a workplace maxim that employees should be careful what they say in their emails from company computers. But fewer office workers know to apply caution to their use of instant-messaging services.

These immensely popular computer programs, which let users exchange short text messages with online buddies in real time, are no haven for private chatter. Companies and government agencies can monitor and log IM conversations conducted on company-network computers. And though it seems that IM conversations disappear into a cyber-vacuum when a session is over, that isn't always true.

Two scandals currently dominating the headlines highlight the risks. In the past week, instant messaging came back to haunt former Republican congressman Mark Foley of Florida. He resigned abruptly when he was confronted with his emails to a young Capitol Hill page, which showed a member of Congress taking an unusual -- and perhaps disturbingly close -- interest in a subordinate. But the most damning revelations came from his sexually explicit IM sessions with several pages.

Mr. Foley sent emails to pages from an AOL email account with the screen name "Maf54," and he used the same ID for chats on AOL's AIM instant-messaging service, says a person familiar with the matter. The pages were most likely AIM users as well, though it is possible on AIM to write to users of Apple Inc.'s iChat software. It's unclear how those IMs were saved. If they were using AIM, congressional pages could have saved sessions on their computers or copied and pasted them into separate files that could be printed or emailed.

And Hewlett-Packard Co.'s leak-investigation scandal, though it has centered on the use of "pretexting" to obtain phone records of journalists and board directors, also involves IMs. H-P tracked the instant-message communications between a company spokesman and a Wall Street Journal reporter.

Most companies are just beginning to wake up to the popularity of IM in the workplace. While more than a third of employees use instant-messaging services at work, only 31% of organizations have policies in place that specifically restrict the use of IM, according to a survey on workplace monitoring by the American Management Association and the ePolicy Institute. But the issue has caught the attention of leading industries. The National Association of Securities Dealers requires member firms to "supervise" the use of instant messaging the same way they do written and electronic communications and to retain electronic copies of instant messages for at least three years.

The survey found that only 13% of companies have started logging IM records, but the crackdown is starting to take effect: About 2% of employers have fired employees for something they said over IM. By comparison, the study said, 26% of companies have terminated employees for misuse of email.

There are several ways users can save IM sessions. Google Inc.'s Google Talk instant-messaging service automatically saves the chat sessions of users that have signed in with Gmail email accounts. Users of Google Talk can disable the setting or choose to go "off the record" during a particular session if they want to avoid having it saved. Other instant-messaging services, such as AOL's AIM, Yahoo Inc.'s Yahoo Messenger, and Microsoft Corp.'s Windows Live Messenger, don't store conversations on their servers automatically. But they do offer various tools for companies and individuals to log conversations. Users can save an IM session by using a built-in save feature or by copying it into another file.

Some of the instant-messaging services are trying to expand their current offerings to give businesses more tools for tracking their employees. AIM Pro, a new free version of AIM for businesses and individual at-work users, is, by default, set to archive conversations on a local hard drive for 14 days, although the feature can be extended and turned off. A more robust fee-based version, WebEx AIM Pro Business Edition, will store all of a company's IM conversations on servers hosted at WebEx and can block messages that contain certain keywords from being sent at all.

Microsoft's Live Communications server allows companies' information-technology departments to log and search employees' IM conversations, including those conducted on other easily available consumer instant-messaging services like Yahoo and AOL.

On top of that, some companies are also purchasing separate hardware that can trace and block IM conversations companywide or set rules for particular employees. One appliance, offered by San Diego-based Akonix Systems Inc., tracks the traffic that goes through a company's firewall, scans it and logs it for compliance and liability issues at a starting cost of around $5,000 plus $20 to $70 per employee. Companies also could read employees' IMs by using key-tracking software and programs that capture what appears on employees' screens at a given moment.

DOJ_NMG_0074789

World-wide, the corporate-messaging-software market hit $2.5 billion in 2005 and will climb to $3.3 billion by 2009, according to the Radicati Group Inc., a Palo Alto technology market-research firm.

Gregg Lemley, a labor and employment attorney with Bryan Cave LLP, said instant-messaging sessions are joining email and other company records as an important element in cases dealing with everything from sexual and racial harassment to violations of noncompete agreements. "Most employers now have a firm-wide policy that says what you do on your computer and in your internal emails isn't subject to a privacy right," Mr. Lemley said.

Still, he said, employers would be smart to expand their internal communications policies to make specific reference to instant messaging, explaining what it can and can't be used for, to insulate them from privacy lawsuits.

As for whether the government can subpoena instant-messaging records, as it does with emails, Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, said the law isn't so clear, because emails are often stored on the servers of Internet service providers, while instant-messaging sessions aren't. "It's a new issue from the legal perspective how privacy rules might apply," he said.

Revelations That Cheney's Ex-Aide Wasn't Original Source Of Leak May Hinder Prosecution (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has taken a public-relations hit from the news that the White House aide he indicted in the CIA-leak investigation wasn't the original source. In coming months, his court case against Lewis "Scooter" Libby could suffer as well.

With pretrial settlement looking unlikely, Mr. Fitzgerald's prosecution of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff is heading toward a January court date. But recent revelations may have dealt Mr. Libby's defense team some powerful cards.

They could undercut the prosecutor's allegation of Mr. Libby's motive: That he lied to investigators to conceal a White House effort to leak Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame's identity. The notion of such a White House campaign is now easier to attack, since it turns out that the initial information came from then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage, who wasn't viewed as a close White House political ally.

The revelations also could bolster Mr. Libby's claim that he didn't intentionally cover up details of his conversations with reporters, but simply forgot -- an explanation Mr. Armitage gave for why he took so long to reveal one of his conversations on the subject.

At a news conference following Mr. Libby's indictment last October, Mr. Fitzgerald said Mr. Libby was the "first official known to have told a reporter" about Ms. Plame's identity when he discussed it with then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller in late June 2003.

But it has become clear that Mr. Fitzgerald knew early on in his investigation that Mr. Armitage was the original source for Robert Novak -- the journalist who disclosed Ms. Plame's identity in a July 14, 2003, column. Yet for nearly two years, the prosecutor pursued reporters to reveal confidential sources, as the investigation focused more on the coverup than the original alleged crime.

In addition, in late August, Mr. Armitage confirmed that when interviewed in mid-June 2003 by Washington Post reporter and author Bob Woodward, he identified Ms. Plame, who also is known by her married name, Valerie Wilson. That means Mr. Armitage, not Mr. Libby, likely was the first official to tell a reporter. Mr. Armitage says he forgot to inform prosecutors about that conversation until Mr. Libby's indictment late last year.

Still, Mr. Libby's lawyers may face an uphill fight in getting the new revelations before a jury, and in making them seem relevant to the case. Part of the defense team's challenge lies in the narrowness of the case against Mr. Libby. While it started as a leak investigation, the charges against Mr. Libby focus on his alleged false statements to investigators -- not the leaks.

"In some ways it [the Armitage disclosure] undercuts the government's case as a whole," said Dan Richman, a former federal prosecutor and colleague of Mr. Fitzgerald who is now a Fordham University law professor. But, he added, "if the focus of the trial is properly kept on what Libby was doing and what was in Libby's mind, the Armitage disclosures are irrelevant," and therefore inadmissible.

The latest twist in the CIA-leak probe could lead to a further diminution of the independent-prosecutor system that allowed Mr. Fitzgerald, largely unsupervised, to pursue Mr. Libby. In light of the much-criticized investigation, top Justice Department officials should consider "another layer of supervision" to review charges by special prosecutors, said Andrew McCarthy, a former federal prosecutor. Mr. McCarthy calls Mr. Fitzgerald "as good a prosecutor as we've had," but worries that independent prosecutors focus too much on bringing charges.

DOJ_NMG_0074790

Because Congress allowed the old independent-counsel law to lapse, the Justice Department tapped Mr. Fitzgerald, the U.S. attorney for the Chicago area, to take on the case in 2003. Under his direction, a grand jury in Washington indicted Mr. Libby in October 2005. For more than two years, a cloud also hung over Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's chief political adviser, but he ultimately was cleared.

Prosecutors have suggested in court pleadings that Mr. Libby lied to investigators to conceal a White House effort to leak Ms. Plame's identity. At the time, prosecutors say, Mr. Cheney was "upset that his personal credibility had been attacked" by Ms. Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, then an emerging critic of the war in Iraq. The vice president was urging Mr. Libby to "get out 'all' the facts," including spreading the story that a CIA fact-finding trip Mr. Wilson made was in fact a junket arranged by his wife, according to prosecution filings in the case.

After the federal probe began, Mr. Armitage quickly informed federal investigators of his role, but failed to disclose the conversation with Mr. Woodward. Mr. Fitzgerald's erroneous statement at the news conference that Mr. Libby was the first leaker led Mr. Armitage to reveal to prosecutors that he had had the earlier conversation with Mr. Woodward. For nearly three years, Mr. Armitage withheld information about his role from the public, at the request of Mr. Fitzgerald. Mr. Armitage said publicly he was Mr. Novak's original source after publication last month of "Hubris," a book by Michael Isikoff and David Corn about how the administration made its case for the war in Iraq.

So far, neither Mr. Libby nor his defense team has spoken publicly about the news. Lawyers following the case say it is likely that the defense team would try to introduce the Armitage-Woodward conversation at trial by calling Mr. Woodward as a witness. It also is possible they would try to call Mr. Novak, who also spoke with Mr. Armitage about the Wilsons. They could even try to call Mr. Armitage.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton's preliminary rulings on discovery requests suggest that he might not allow Mr. Armitage to testify. "The only question the jury will be asked to resolve in this matter will be whether the defendant intentionally lied...about statements he purportedly made to the three news reporters," Judge Walton wrote in a June order that largely rejected a broad defense request for documents, including documents relating to Mr. Armitage. But some lawyers say given the new Armitage revelations, the judge might soften his stand.

Another possible result of the Armitage revelations might be to pave the way for a presidential pardon of Mr. Libby, if he is convicted, some lawyers said. The Bush White House "might easily say that 'we've all learned this is much ado about nothing, so it's easier to pardon him,'" said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, who is representing the Wilsons in a civil case.

Feds Will Seek Death In Abduction Case (AP)

By NICHOLAS K. GERANIOS

AP, October 4, 2006

SPOKANE, Wash. - Federal prosecutors said Tuesday that registered sex offender Joseph Edward Duncan III will face the death penalty for the abduction of two children, a move which may spark new efforts to settle Idaho state charges against the predator.

Jean McNeil, spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Tom Moss in Boise, Idaho, said prosecutors there have received permission from the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C., to seek capital punishment against Duncan once he is charged in the abduction of Shasta Groene, 8, and the abduction and slaying of Dylan Groene, 9.

"Federal charges and formal notice to seek the death penalty are expected to be filed at a later date," McNeil said.

She declined to say exactly what federal charges Duncan would face, which she acknowledged made Tuesday's announcement unusual.

"There has been so much publicity and so much speculation about what we would do, that we think it is appropriate to make the announcement now," McNeil said.

Duncan, 43, a Tacoma native, already faces the death penalty if he is convicted in an Idaho court on three counts of murder for allegedly using a hammer to kill the children's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie; and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade, in May 2005 at the family's home east of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

Court documents allege Duncan, who spent most of his adult life in Washington prisons for sexual crimes against children, committed the slayings so he could kidnap the two children for sex.

The federal decision could have implications for the state case as Shasta's father, Steve Groene, would prefer that the case be settled so his daughter would not have to testify against Duncan in court. Steve Groene was recovering from cancer surgery in Seattle on Tuesday and not available for comment.

Duncan's public defender, John Adams, has said he would be open to a plea bargain if the state agreed not to seek the death penalty. Otherwise, he has warned, Shasta Groene may have to face Duncan in court through 20 years of appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0074791

Adams was out of his office Tuesday and not available for comment.

Kootenai County Prosecutor Bill Douglas and the families of some of the murder victims have been adamant that capital punishment remain an option.

Shasta Groene, now 9, is the only survivor of the attack on her family's home, and of the subsequent ordeal in which the children were held for seven weeks and abused at a remote Montana campsite. Court documents indicate she has provided a wealth of details to investigators and her eyewitness testimony is likely to be devastating to Duncan's defense during the trial that begins on Oct. 16 in Coeur d'Alene.

Roger Peven, Duncan's federal public defender, said the decision by the U.S. attorney was not a surprise. Peven traveled to Washington, D.C., in late September to discuss the case with the Justice Department's capital case unit.

Peven said he hoped the federal decision might push Douglas to seek a settlement in the state case.

"What this does offer is not avoidance of a trial, but avoidance of appeals, which can take a decade or two," Peven said of the state case. "If the case is settled in state court, there would be no appeals."

Kootenai County Commissioner Katie Brodie told a newspaper on Monday that settling the state case is likely to save the county at least $1 million in trial costs.

"If we're able to plead it to life without parole and let the federal system do their thing, I think the benefits to Kootenai County are great," Brodie told The Spokesman-Review of Spokane.

Lee McKenzie Wood, mother of victim Mark McKenzie, told the newspaper that she still supports seeking the death penalty in Kootenai County.

"We've got to be sure he's getting the death sentence," she said Monday.

Duncan was arrested July 2, 2005, at a Denny's restaurant in Coeur d'Alene while eating with Shasta. Dylan's remains were later found at the remote campsite near St. Regis, Mont.

Alaska Probe Turns From Oil To Fish (SEATIMES)

By Hal Bernton, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, October 4, 2006

FBI agents investigating Alaska legislators have expanded their interests from oil to fish, looking at the relationship between state Senate President Ben Stevens and the North Pacific seafood industry, which has deep roots in Puget Sound.

In late August, the FBI searched the offices of Stevens and at least five other Alaska legislators and gathered documents relating to Veco, a major oil-field services company that had been heavily involved in lobbying the Legislature on oil-tax policies and other energy issues. FBI agents returned to Stevens' office for a second search Sept. 18.

This time, their take included two letters that Stevens wrote to the federal Commerce Department about the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, according to a letter outlining the searches that Stevens provided to the Anchorage Daily News.

Stevens has not disclosed what was in those fisheries letters or any of the other documents taken in the searches.

Stevens chaired the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board until earlier this year. It was created in 2003 with federal legislation sponsored by his father, U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens.

The board has awarded more than $12 million in federally-funded grants to salmon-processing companies, most of them based in Puget Sound.

Some of those companies who received marketing-board funds — either directly or through related companies or industry groups — also paid the younger Stevens consulting fees. Those payments included more than $250,000 in the years Ben Stevens served on the board, according to disclosure documents filed with the Alaska Public Offices Commission.

During the Sept. 18 search, FBI agents also obtained an affidavit written to the commission by a Friday Harbor salmon fisherman, Victor Smith, who has been a sharp critic of Ben Stevens.

Smith has alleged in fishing-industry articles and affidavits that Ben Stevens took money from a seiners association to lobby his father and did not disclose that income as required by state disclosure reports.

During the visit, the FBI also took "unknown" documents of Ted Stevens' and one document faxed from Ben Stevens to his father, according to Ben Stevens' letter in the Anchorage Daily News.

The FBI investigation has involved agents from around the country who assisted in the searches, said Eric Gonzalez, a FBI spokesman in Alaska.

U.S. Justice Department attorneys based in Washington, D.C., with the Public Integrity Section, which handles political corruption, also have joined the case, along with two U.S. assistant attorneys in the Alaska office, said Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman.

Both Ben and Ted Stevens on Friday declined to comment on the FBI investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0074792

"We don't believe it's appropriate to comment on factual questions that may be related in any way to a possible investigation of the subject matter," said John Wolfe, a Seattle attorney representing Ben Stevens.

Ted Stevens, in an e-mail to The Seattle Times, said, "I understand the public's interest in the investigation. It has always been my practice to not comment on such matters to avoid even the appearance that I might influence the investigation. That is especially important in this case where records have been obtained from a number of legislators, including my son Ben."

Ties to fishing industry

Both son and father have long associations with the North Pacific fishing industry, which is the nation's largest and involves many Puget Sound processors and fishermen.

Ted Stevens has spent more than three decades in the U.S. Senate, where he has been influential in shaping fisheries policies and funding.

Ben Stevens is a former Bering Sea crab skipper who was a federal lobbyist in the late 1990s before returning to Alaska to launch a consulting practice that included numerous seafood-industry clients.

In annual state disclosure filings, Ben Stevens wrote that his clients hired him for business services. He has not listed any lobbying fees.

The younger Stevens has served in the state Senate since 2001 but is not running for re-election.

In 2003, when the Alaska salmon industry pleaded for help to face growing competition from commercial fish farmers, both son and father lent a hand.

Ted Stevens crafted federal legislation to form the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board. The board gives grants, raised from a federal tax on seafood imports, to help companies develop and market their products.

Ben Stevens became the board's first chairman, a volunteer position that he held until earlier this year. As chairman, he helped approve grants that in fiscal years 2004 and 2005 totaled more than $12 million and were awarded to dozens of seafood companies.

Some of the biggest grants went to major Puget Sound-based seafood companies, including Icicle Seafoods, which received more than $1.5 million; Peter Pan Seafoods, which received more than $1.55 million; Trident Seafoods, which received more than $1.3 million, and Yardarm Knot Fisheries, which received more than $227,000. Some of that money was awarded on the basis of how much salmon was processed, and some resulted from grant applications submitted to the board.

These companies also paid Ben Stevens as a consultant either directly, through related companies or through industry groups such as the North Pacific Crab Association.

Officials for all five of the seafood companies and the executive director of the marketing board declined to comment or did not return phone calls.

Ben Stevens disclosed all his payments from the processing companies on disclosure forms filed with the Alaska Public Offices Commission. But he did not disclose his chairmanship of the fisheries board to that commission, as required by state law, until after a complaint was filed, according to the commission staff.

Ben Stevens has not reported receiving any income for consulting or lobbying work on behalf of the Southeast Alaska Seiners Association, a group that in 2004 sought help from Ted Stevens for legislation that would finance a buyout of some of the fleet. The legislation was approved by Congress, but the buyout has yet to occur.

Smith, the Friday Harbor salmon fisherman, said in an affidavit filed with the state commission that a contract paying Ben Stevens $5,000 a month to consult and lobby on behalf of that bill was openly discussed at a 2004 fishermen's meeting in Lynnwood. Others have said the money was paid to a partnership that included Ben Stevens.

The Alaska commission staff is now investigating whether he received money and should have reported it on state disclosure forms.

Seattle Times reporter Steve Miletich and researcher David Turim contributed to this report.

Former Court Clerk Gets Probation For Leak In Newton Case (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, October 4, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. -- A former federal court clerk was spared from prison Tuesday for leaking the existence of a public corruption investigation in 2004 into then-state Sen. Ernest Newton before documents in the case were unsealed.

Cassandra Warren, 46, was sentenced to three years' probation and fined $1,000 by Senior U.S. District Judge Alfred V. Covello in Hartford. She had faced up to six months in federal prison under her plea bargain.

Warren, a former Bridgeport resident who now lives in Baltimore, pleaded guilty in May to one count of contempt for telling her husband about sealed documents regarding Newton that she saw in the federal court clerk's office in Bridgeport.

Her lawyer, Thomas Murphy, has said that Warren told her husband about the case to persuade him not to get involved with Newton and his associates. The information eventually got back to Newton.

Newton, a Bridgeport Democrat, resigned amid the corruption investigation and began serving a five-year prison sentence in April for bribery and other charges. He was caught on an FBI wiretap talking to the head of a Bridgeport jobs training agency, who paid the lawmaker $5,000 for help getting a state grant.

Prosecutors have said that Warren did not intend to obstruct the Newton investigation. She resigned last year after being interviewed by the FBI.

"Disclosure of sealed information rips the fabric and threatens the integrity of our judicial system," U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said. "This prosecution shows that those who violate court orders will be prosecuted."

Mo. Couple Charged With Another Murder (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 4, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - A couple already facing charges in a gruesome videotaped sex killing of a woman and the sexual assault of a 5-year-old girl were indicted Tuesday in the death of another woman. Prosecutors said they will pursue the death penalty.

A grand jury issued first-degree murder charges against Richard D. Davis, 41, and Dena D. Riley, 39, in the strangling and suffocation death of Michelle Ricci.

Davis and Riley are already charged with murder, kidnapping, sodomy, rape and assault in the death of Marsha Spicer, which happened several weeks after Ricci's death.

Authorities said Davis and Riley raped and tortured Ricci for several days before killing her, afraid they she knew where they lived and would go to police.

In June, investigators searching the couple's apartment found videotapes of Spicer in violent sex scenes, including a two-hour tape showing Spicer being beaten, raped and strangled during sex with the couple.

They also allegedly found another tape that authorities claim shows the couple raping and torturing another woman, later identified as Ricci.

Davis and Riley were the FBI's most-wanted couple after they were linked to the Spicer killing. After their arrest, they allegedly directed police to Ricci's body.

The two also are facing federal charges for allegedly kidnapping and sexually assaulting a 5-year-old Kansas girl after they told the girl's parents they were taking her to a restaurant.

Clay County Prosecutor Daniel White said the criminal histories of Davis and Riley played into his decision to pursue the death penalty. "The most vile and criminal act should be subject to the ultimate punishment," he said.

Congress Deals Poker Fans A Hand They Can't Bet (LVS)

By Liz Benston, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, October 4, 2006

Casino giants could take a hit as act tightens ban on wagering online

Fallout from the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act of 2006 may land hard on two of Las Vegas' biggest gaming companies, Harrah's Entertainment and MGM Mirage. Each has tapped poker fans who love Internet play and then turn to Vegas for the real action.

When those gamblers try to log onto their PartyPoker.com account, they'll soon discover they can no longer place a bet. And that will chill tournament play on the Strip.

For nearly a decade, the campaign by conservative members of Congress to outlaw online gambling remained on the fringes in Washington.

But with Republican lawmakers nervous about the Nov. 7 elections and eager to find issues that will please conservative religious groups, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and other Republican leaders saw an opportunity to adopt the ban. They attached it to an unrelated port security bill, which was approved by Congress on Saturday.

Once a small, tight-knit group of hard-core sports bettors, Internet gamblers, attracted by celebrity players and incessant television coverage of poker tournaments, have grown into a largely mainstream group of amateur bettors. But in the eyes of the U.S, they have joined the ranks of people who transport illegal drugs or sell unregistered firearms .

Online operators had largely ignored the Justice Department's opinion that all forms of online gambling are illegal. It was a weak legal position, they said, that was unsupported by federal law and largely unenforceable because online betting operators are based outside of the United States.

With the bill , a "gray area" of gambling just got a lot clearer by making it a felony to process Internet bets generated by Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0074794

British operator Partygaming, which owns PartyPoker.com, said it would cease operations in the United States by blocking American bets. Other companies publicly traded in Europe, trying to salvage shares that have already tanked by more than 50 percent, could follow suit.

That means American players could soon be gambling on black market Web sites and reverting to a time when no-name sites operated in an online Wild West of sorts.

A more likely outcome will be an increasingly creative cat-and-mouse game between the remaining Internet gambling sites and regulators who now have the authority to shut down Web sites and go after third parties. Those include Internet service providers that link to gambling sites and a growing number of affiliate sites that make money from referring business to Internet casinos.

Nevada interests have been ineffective in fighting the legislation. State regulators don't want to run afoul of the feds. The state's most powerful legislator, Sen. Harry Reid, opposes Internet gambling on the basis that it can't be adequately regulated. Even Nevada casinos, which have reaped the benefits when online gamblers are teased to real poker rooms, weren't willing to go to the mat on a prohibition bill.

The American Gaming Association, which represents the largest land-based casinos, says the bill's passage won't mean much for its members, which aren't in the business of online gambling.

That may be true for most members that aren't profiting much on poker. They may rather fill those rooms with more profitable slot machines.

But that's probably not the case for the association's two biggest members, MGM Mirage and Harrah's Entertainment. Both companies host the world's largest poker tournaments and have lobbied for regulating and taxing Internet gambling.

As many as half of the entrants in Harrah's latest World Series of Poker qualified for their $10,000 buy in to the final event by playing satellite tournaments hosted by online gambling sites. Similarly, MGM Mirage hosts some events for the World Poker Tour, a global poker tourney that attracts big money from online bettors who qualified for the events online.

Both tournaments will likely now attract fewer entrants.

The ban will have further implications in Las Vegas, the de facto hub for online bettors and support industries such as magazines, Internet portals and other businesses that made money catering to the online poker and betting industry.

"It's like a death," said Jan Fisher, a poker writer, tournament announcer and partner in a company that produces a cruise ship tourney for online operator PartyPoker. "This didn't just stop people from playing online. This touched literally everyone I know. I'm afraid for the industry." Liz Benston can be reached at 259-4077 or at benston@lasvegassun.com.

Picayune Woman Pleads Guilty To Fraudulent Katrina Claims (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A Picayune woman has pleaded guilty to making false claims to obtain Hurricane Katrina relief funds, U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said Tuesday.

Dianne M. Dean pleaded guilty to making a false claim and a false statement to the Federal Emergency Management Agency and to the Department of Agriculture's Rural Development Agency, Lampton said.

Dean admitted in her guilty plea that on Sept. 11, 2005, she submitted an application for disaster assistance with FEMA using a false address in Picayune, Lampton said. She received $2,000.

Her sentencing hearing is set Jan. 16. She faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine, plus restitution to both FEMA and the Department of Agriculture.

Money-launderer Gets 10 Years In Prison (PHDN)

By Kitty Caparella

Philadelphia Daily News, October 4, 2006

Mount Airy real-estate agent Melvin Stein must have had a pretty high anxiety level to throw away seven months of government cooperation and a potentially low prison sentence - all because he wanted his attorney to hold his hand.

But Stein, 61, who laundered hundreds of thousands of dollars of drug dealers' money for more than 10 years, did just that, his attorneys said.

Instead of taking the advice of his first attorney to cooperate with a government investigation into violent drug trafficking, Stein replaced her with a lawyer who convinced him that the government was out to get him.

Stein was "very much in fear, needed comfort and reassurance," said one of his attorneys Jodeen M. Hobbs, and Stein hired another lawyer who put an end to his cooperation.

Stein had fired his first attorney Elizabeth Ainslie and replaced her with attorney Gregory Magarity, who he said convinced him to stop cooperating with the government.

DOJ_NMG_0074795

Yesterday, despite 80 people showing up at a federal sentencing hearing to attest to his many good deeds, Stein paid the price: 10 years in prison, an $800,000 forfeiture and $200,000 fine, and two years of supervised release. The fine and forfeiture must be paid in 30 days.

U.S. District Judge Mary McLaughlin took a prosecutor's advice and refused to give the millionaire a "Get Out of Jail Free" card, as his third defense team, Hobbs and Gino J. Benedetti, had urged.

The sentence reflects "a very serious crime, a significant problem in the city and significant punishment, and no defendant is beyond that," said Gregory C. Lisa, a U.S. Department of Justice attorney. He had replaced prosecutor Mark J. Ehlers, who left the U.S. Attorney's Office in August.

Neither Stein's attorneys nor family members would comment.

Before being sentenced, Stein apologized to the court, government, and his family and friends, many of whom were in tears.

"If I had fully understood, I would never have stopped cooperating," he said.

Stein then apologized to FBI case agent Kevin Lewis and his partner, Thomas Zielinski, a Philadelphia detective deputized as a federal agent:

"You were honest with me, telling me that the government could not make any guarantees in court. I'm sorry I did not trust what you were telling me."

Stein asked the judge to give him a second chance so he could continue to help people via a nonprofit committee providing safe homes for the homeless - as he had done as a realtor, according to witnesses who spoke on his behalf.

Stein did not agree to cooperate until his home and office were raided by the FBI on July 21, 2003. Stein's first attorney, Elizabeth Ainslie, advised him that he was considered a target in a federal probe of violent drug trafficking and urged him to cooperate.

The judge found that Ainslie had given the defendant "excellent advice, then he fired her," after she was unable to respond to Stein's calls several times a day.

As the defense heaped blame on Magarity's "ineffective counsel," Lisa rejected the allegation, saying "Magarity didn't tell him to sell the house to Paul Daniels [a drug dealer]. He didn't tell him to sell the Nissan Maxima to Craig Oliver [another drug dealer], or to mislead law enforcement."

Nevertheless, the defense team urged the judge to consider Stein's cooperation.

"You can't roll back time," Lisa responded. Stein's information was "completely useless," after he aborted his agreement.

Lisa also pointed out that Stein failed to admit his own crimes when he agreed to cooperate, and then warned other drug dealers they were under investigation.

He lied to an FBI agent, who was posing as a Salem County, N.J., detective, who asked Stein if he knew Oliver, a drug dealer to whom Stein was then leasing four properties. Stein claimed not to know him, Lisa said

When Stein was compared to cooperators, such as Daniels, Lisa defended Daniels, saying he turned his life around, urged others to cooperate, and admitted giving Stein $50,000 in drug proceeds in return for a check - even as drug trafficker Kaboni Savage threatened to kill Daniels' son.

Tried with Savage and three others, Stein was convicted of conspiracy and laundering at least $416,000 in drug money last Dec. 16 after a seven-week trial.

Stein will remain under house arrest - except to meet with doctors, attorneys and to go to synagogue - until Nov. 3, when he must surrender to authorities.

Mobster's Chronic Use Of Cocaine Blamed For Illnesses (PROJO)

By W. Zachary Malinowski, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, October 4, 2006

PROVIDENCE — Anthony M. "The Saint" St. Laurent, a longtime capo regime in the Patriarca crime family, is a physical wreck whose health has been in a freefall for the past 20 years.

At a sentencing hearing Friday in U.S. District Court, Assistant U.S. Attorney James H. Leavey suggested that a "$500- to $600-" a-day cocaine habit was a key factor in leaving the mobster in such poor medical condition.

Leavey dropped the bomb about St. Laurent's drug use after Dr. Marc S. Weinberg testified about a series of medical ailments that St. Laurent suffers from, including hypertension, kidney failure, intestinal cancer and chronic bowel problems.

"In all honesty, unequivocally, [St. Laurent] is absolutely the sickest guy I have ever seen," said Weinberg, who has treated him for 20 years. "I have no one else like him."

Friday's hearing was scheduled to sentence St. Laurent, 65, of 2 Rotary Drive, Johnston, to prison for conspiring several months ago to extort $100,000 from two Massachusetts men.

Judge William E. Smith continued the hearing to give the government more time to find a suitable prison to treat St. Laurent for his various ailments. A new date has yet to be set for the sentencing.

At a plea hearing in July, Assistant U.S. Attorney Peter F. Neronha said the government had evidence that St. Laurent directed two men to collect the money and, if the two victims did not pay at least $50,000, to "bash" the victims.

FBI agents and detectives from the Rhode Island State Police and Providence police arrested St. Laurent the next day.

Friday, U.S. Marshals pushed St. Laurent, who wore a neck brace, in a wheelchair into the courtroom on the third floor of the federal courthouse. He wore prison-issued khakis and gingerly climbed out of the wheelchair and into his seat at the defense table.

In the spectators section behind him sat several state, local and federal investigators. Also in attendance were St. Laurent's wife, and their son and daughter.

The son, also named Anthony St. Laurent, has spent time in federal prison.

Leavey, the prosecutor, recommended that St. Laurent be sentenced to 46 months in prison, the low end of the federal sentencing guidelines, for taking responsibility for his crimes and for avoiding a trial. Under the guidelines, St. Laurent faced up to 57 months in prison.

Leavey also asked the judge to sentence St. Laurent to an additional year in prison for violating the terms of his supervised release from a past federal conviction.

John F. Cicilline, St. Laurent's lawyer, had Weinberg take the stand to tell the court about the mobster's medical problems. Cicilline was seeking a lighter sentence or the possibility of having St. Laurent serve his time in a prison medical facility instead of a traditional prison.

Weinberg, who is on the faculty at Brown University Medical School, spent about 30 minutes detailing a myriad of illnesses that afflict St. Laurent. The mobster, who once took as many as 40 enemas a day, suffers from a chronic bowel disease that has taken him to medical specialists in Boston, Baltimore, Chicago and London.

Weinberg testified that St. Laurent needs "close, tedious laboratory and clinical monitoring."

Leavey suggested that St. Laurent's cocaine addiction and the fact that he has been a heavy smoker caused many of the mobster's problems. "Isn't it fair to say that he doesn't really take care of himself?" he said.

Leavey also asked Weinberg whether St. Laurent would be better off in a structured environment — prison — where he would get three meals a day, could not smoke or snort cocaine and would have a medical staff readily available.

"I don't know about the quality of care in the Bureau of Prisons," Weinberg said.

Smith also directed a series of questions at Weinberg, who maintained that he was "not trying to manipulate the court."

Weinberg also said that he never talks to St. Laurent, or other patients, about their chosen profession.

"I never ask him what he did, that's our rule," Weinberg said. "I don't want to know anything about his private life that made him end up here. But I don't think they should take his health care and hang it out to dry. I feel bad when people laugh at him and the media calls him things like "Public Enema.'"

St. Laurent has spent most of the past decade in prison on gambling and extortion charges. During one of his federal prison stays, he was arrested for directing a gambling ring in Rhode Island from his prison cell in Kentucky.

Prosecutors Argue Against Galante Return To His Businesses (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP)_ Federal prosecutors claim that the owner of a Danbury trash hauling business plundered it, using it as a personal ATM to pay for his hobbies and bankroll no-show jobs for friends.

The claims are contained in legal briefs made available Monday and filed in the case of James Galante, a central figure in an investigation of organized crime and its alleged role in the trash hauling business.

Galante, who owns Automated Waste Disposal and other trash companies, has been fighting the government for control of his businesses, which federal marshals took over when he was indicted in June in the racketeering case.

Galante and his lawyers argued their side of the story in U.S. District Court in August and in a 16-page brief filed last week.

The prosecution briefs argue that Galante used the trash company to pay for his hobbies such as his hockey and racing teams and he was constantly bouncing checks.

Under Galante's direction, the prosecutors argued that the evidence shows that the companies had been "regularly bouncing checks" on their commercial bank accounts for years and that the overdrafts became so "endemic by late 2004" that the companies' bank shut the accounts and ended its relationship with AWD.

Galante's legal team alleges that before the court-ordered monitoring in June, Galante's companies were well run and profitable, but when Leonard Briskman, head of the U.S. Marshal Service team, took over, he and others hired by the government to run the trash businesses began running them into the ground.

Galante was arrested in June on racketeering charges for allegedly conspiring with organized crime bosses to prevent competition in the garbage business.

Galante, whose businesses handle about 80 percent of southwestern Connecticut's garbage, has been charged with racketeering, extortion and witness tampering.

Karr Computer Files Reviewed By FBI (FINDLAW/AP)

By Marcus Wohlsen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ROSA, Calif.-The FBI is reviewing images of teenagers found on computer equipment seized from former JonBenet Ramsey slaying suspect John Mark Karr's home to compare the images with a national database of child porn victims, a Sonoma County prosecutor said.

The digital images were not related to child pornography charges against Karr, said Deputy County Counsel Anne Keck. It was not immediately clear which files the FBI was reviewing.

The disclosure came at a hearing in which Judge Cerena Wong refused to unseal police documents in the child pornography case against Karr. Prosecutors argued they could harm the investigation and prejudice potential jurors.

Authorities said they found five images of child porn on Karr's computer when he was arrested in April 2001. He fled before he went to trial. Investigators conceded they lost Karr's computer some time in the past five years, but claim to have found copies of the data recently.

Defense lawyers did not comment on the FBI involvement, but renewed efforts to get the charges dismissed and filed a motion to exclude newly discovered computer evidence from his case.

Prosecutors "don't know how the images got there," defense lawyer Robert Amparan said. "They don't know whether Mr. Karr knew they were there. They don't know when if ever they were viewed."

A hearing was scheduled Tuesday to decide whether the case should be dismissed or evidence should be excluded if it goes to trial.

Karr, who was extradited from Colorado last month to face the five-year-old charges, appeared briefly at the hearing, looking tired and worn.

Karr has rejected a plea deal that would have put him on probation. Prosecutors have conceded he probably won't serve more time if convicted because he already spent several months in jail awaiting trial five years ago. They said they want Karr to register as a sex offender.

The former teacher was arrested in Thailand last month after suggesting he killed JonBenet, a 6-year-old beauty queen, in her Boulder, Colo., home in 1996. The Ramsey case quickly collapsed after DNA failed to connect him to the crime.

Defense: Evidence Withheld In Karr Case (STPPP)

By Marcus Wohlsen

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, October 4, 2006

SANTA ROSA, Calif. - Prosecutors withheld evidence that might have led to the dismissal of child pornography possession charges against former JonBenet Ramsey slaying suspect John Mark Karr, defense lawyers told a judge Tuesday.

Karr's attorneys said prosecutors deliberately withheld a September interview with his ex-wife, Lara Knutson, in which she told them the computer from where they found the five allegedly illegal images did not work at the time of his arrest.

Karr's attorneys are seeking to have the charges against him dismissed. Arguments in the case were delayed Tuesday while his lawyers asked a judge to order prosecutors to turn over more evidence. They are expected to resume Wednesday.

Karr, 41, is accused of having five images of child porn on his computer when he was arrested in 2001. If convicted of the misdemeanor offenses, it is unlikely Karr would face jail time, as he already served time when first arrested five years ago, prosecutors have said.

Knutson's lawyer, Michael Rains, who has read a transcript of his client's interview, said it's not as clear-cut as defense lawyers claim. He said the couple was estranged at the time and sleeping in different rooms, and not intimately aware of each other's lives.

"The way I read this transcript is she's simply not certain," he said. "She's clearly wrestling with memory issues."

Chief Deputy District Attorney Joan Risse said that the computer from Karr's house must have been working, since a Sonoma County detective was able to find the five illicit images on its hard drive.

Karr's defense team also is seeking to invalidate the search warrant that led to the seizure of the computer, claiming a detective failed to disclose that his confidential informant suffered from bipolar disorder, depression and post-traumatic stress disorder.

DOJ_NMG_0074798

The computer has been a recurring issue in the case. Investigators conceded they lost Karr's computer some time in the past five years, but claim to have found copies of the data recently.

Karr, a former teacher, fled before his trial in 2001. He was arrested in Thailand last month after suggesting he killed JonBenet, a 6-year-old beauty queen, in her Boulder, Colo., home in 1996. But Colorado officials dropped him as a suspect after DNA failed to connect him to the crime, and he was extradited to California last month to face the five-year-old child porn possession charges.

US Attorney: Parents Need Computer Savvy To Protect Kids From Perverts (MRT)

By Bob Campbell, Staff Writer

Midland (TX) Reporter-Telegram, October 4, 2006

Many parents are handicapped in trying to protect their children from Internet sexual predators because their kids know more about computers, U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton of San Antonio said Tuesday.

Parents must therefore educate themselves and take measures to keep their offspring from being victimized, he said.

Addressing a U.S. Attorney's Office seminar for law enforcement officials Monday and Tuesday, Sutton said putting the computer "in a room where the whole family can walk by and see it" is a good safeguard.

"The Internet is an incredible tool that is opening up worlds for lots of people," he said. "It brings freedom and information to people who normally wouldn't be able to get it, but with that there are real dangers because it is so wide open.

"A child might think she is talking to another 14-year-old girl when in reality she is talking to a 45-year-old man. We estimate that at any given time in the U.S., there are 50,000 predators talking to children in chat rooms.

"Punishments on the federal side for people who solicit children or possess or trade child pornography are extremely harsh -- five to 15 years for a first offense. It's a big hammer we have to hit these guys with.

"U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales believes we have no more precious resource than our children. Unfortunately in modern America, lots of children spend a lot time by themselves or in situations where they are not as well protected as they should be."

Sutton said parents should investigate his agency's "Project Safe Childhood" Web site to educate themselves and become more vigilant. "We have seen some sad cases where young people start looking at images of child porn," he said.

"You don't have to scare your children, but the dangers are serious enough that you need to have that discussion with them."

Wrapping up the seminar at noon Tuesday, Assistant Texas Attorney General Grant Sparks of Austin reviewed new developments for 15-20 representatives of the FBI, U.S. Immigration & Customs Enforcement, Midland and Ector County District Attorney's Offices, Midland and Odessa Police Departments and other agencies.

Sparks said perverts have been going to the MySpace Web site where millions of teenagers and pre-teenagers registered to network with other young people around the nation and world. He said MySpace has become so well known many youths are using the newer Facebook and Xanga sites, where predators go through photos and biographies to find new targets.

An ICE agent asked if enforcement has extended to egregiously offending nations like Russia and Assistant U.S. Attorney John Klassen of Midland said there have been more crackdowns in the Russian Federation and Scandinavian nations in the past three or four years. "There is big money in this business," Klassen said.

"But there are good people and good cops in all the countries involved."

While the scope is daunting, Sparks said, combined agencies have cut the number of American children solicited by perverts each year from one in five to one in seven.

"Like we want the new and different baseball card, they want the new and different child molestation image," said Sparks. He explained many exploited children are compelled to perform by parents who are paid by pornographers.

Civic Activist Faces Federal Death-penalty Trial In D.C. (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Antwuan Ball is caught between two worlds.

One has him being praised by social workers for his civic activism; the other has him facing a rare death-penalty prosecution in the District on murder and racketeering charges.

Mr. Ball is accused of leading a violent street gang that sold hundreds of kilograms of crack cocaine in Southeast for more than a decade.

But he also has worked as a youth counselor, has helped oversee security at a troubled housing development and is even quoted in a national social services newsletter.

DOJ_NMG_0074799

What's more, a former White House official said she held him in such high regard as a civic activist that she regularly sought out his views.

Edgar S. Cahn, a professor at the David A. Clarke School of Law at the University of the District of Columbia, said, "I just don't recognize the Antwuan Ball in the indictment."

Mr. Cahn met Mr. Ball in 2001 while doing volunteer work at the Capital Area Food Bank and said Mr. Ball delivered food to the elderly and renovated a computer lab for local children.

"I came to know him well enough, and I just felt this was a remarkably gutsy human being," Mr. Cahn said.

Last month, the U.S. attorney's office filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty for Mr. Ball and David Wilson, accused of being leaders of the Congress Park Crew -- a gang that resorted to assault and homicide to protect its drug trade in Southeast.

Only two death-penalty cases have proceeded to trial in the District since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976. Capital punishment is banned in the District, except in federal crimes.

Michael Kimsey, executive director of the Kimsey Foundation, a nonprofit social services group based in the District, said he met Mr. Ball five years ago and worked with him on ventures in Southeast.

He helped Mr. Ball with startup plans for a consulting business called MANN Inc., an acronym for Making a Neighborhood Network, and a nonprofit called Changing Neighborhoods into Communities, he said.

"We saw it as taking a guy who had some troubles in the past who obviously was intelligent and who wanted to do something positive for the community," Mr. Kimsey said. "We were trying to help him think of his future."

Janie L. Jeffers met Mr. Ball when she was the executive deputy director of the federal D.C. Interagency Task Force in the Clinton administration in the late 1990s.

Miss Jeffers, now a professor at Howard University, said Mr. Ball attended monthly meetings at the White House conference center to discuss initiatives to improve Southeast neighborhoods.

"I'm still waiting to see the proof," she said of the charges against Mr. Ball. "They want to make him out to be this charismatic 'Scarface' type of figure, saying all he did was all an act. But I saw no evidence of that."

Mr. Cahn and Miss Jeffers said they met Mr. Ball through Harv Oostdyk, who was involved with a Texas-based nonprofit called the Step Foundation.

Mr. Oostdyk could not be reached for comment.

A 2002 article in the Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy newsletter profiled Mr. Oostdyk's work in the Congress Park Public Housing Complex in Southeast and said he spent 40 years building up troubled neighborhoods in Harlem and Dallas. The roundtable is a nonpartisan public policy group based in New York that studies government partnerships with faith-based groups.

"Harv gave us a way out," Mr. Ball is quoted as saying in the article. "But I don't need him to open up any more doors. He gave me the know-how I needed to make it on my own. I have a family. I have a bank account."

The Step Foundation was hired to provide security services in the Congress Park complex. Organizers hired local residents for security details, including Mr. Ball, Mr. Wilson and several other gang members, prosecutors said.

The foundation has since merged with another ministry based in Dallas, said Lalla Shackelford, a former executive director who said she did not know Mr. Ball.

Miss Shackelford said the foundation's general mission was to improve troubled communities by giving jobs to ex-convicts attempting to turn around their lives.

A spokesman for Edgewood Management Corp., which has run the Congress Park complex for much of the past decade, said Mr. Ball attended several community gatherings that involved the Step Foundation.

Federal prosecutors said Mr. Ball used his security position at the foundation to strengthen the Congress Park Crew's hold on the drug trade.

"Mr. Ball and his co-conspirators used that organization ... took over security of that complex in order to keep rival drug dealers from being able to distribute in Congress Park," Assistant U.S. Attorney M. Jeffrey Beatrice told a judge at Mr. Ball's bail hearing last year. "So they turned what may have been a well-intentioned organization into a means to further a conspiracy."

A superseding indictment against Mr. Ball and more than a dozen other reputed Congress Park Crew members filed in May states that Mr. Ball "personally committed murders and assaults to further the purposes of the organization."

Mr. Ball fatally shot Troy Lewis on Jan. 23, 1996, prosecutors said. Mr. Ball and Mr. Wilson also are accused of conspiring to kill members of a rival gang, the 10th Place/Trenton Place Crew.

In addition, prosecutors said, Mr. Ball used "intimidation and physical force" to keep witnesses to slayings silent.

Mr. Ball got his start in drug dealing in the 1980s as a lieutenant in the 1-5 Mob, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0074800

His mother, Violet, was a cooperating witness in the prosecution of the 1-5 Mob, whose leader, Tommy Edelin, received life in prison without parole, though prosecutors had sought the death penalty.

Mr. Kimsey said Mr. Ball never talked in depth about his past.

"We never talked specifically about it," he said. "He didn't talk about anything illegal, but he pretty much admitted he had a troubled past."

Killer's Archive Yields More Photos (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

The Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department today released about 30 more photographs taken by William Richard Bradford, seeking to find out if any of the people were victims of the convicted killer.

Officials in July released photos of 54 women who were photographed two decades ago by Bradford. One of those women was discovered strangled and dumped in the High Desert. About two dozen women in that first round of photographs have come forward.

Bradford is on death row at San Quentin. He was convicted in 1988 in the murders of Shari Miller and Tracy Campbell.

"From 1966 to 1984, Bradford posed as a freelance photographer, seeking to lure potential victims. Bradford photographed his victims in sexually explicit positions, committed sexual assaults, strangled them and disposed of their bodies in public places," according to the wanted posters listed at lacountymurders.com/wanted/LADIES1.html.

The photographs were seized at Bradford's residence when he was arrested in 1984. The original group of 54 photographs sat untouched for years until a cold case detective decided to take a second look.

Anyone with information about the women is being asked to call the sheriff's homicide bureau or e-mail LACountyMurders@lasd.org

CIVIL LAW:

Tobacco Companies' Request Denied (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

A federal judge has denied a request by tobacco companies to continue marketing so-called light and low-tar cigarettes until an appeal is settled in the case. The judge, Gladys Kessler, ruled in August that the cigarette makers had violated racketeering laws and misled the public about the health consequences of smoking. In rejecting the request last week, Judge Kessler wrote, "Loss of market share, if it results from imposing an appropriate remedy to prevent and restrain past violations of the law, may well be the price defendants have to pay."

U.S. To Stop Seizing Canadian Medicine (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

Under pressure from Congress, U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials scrapped their 11-month-old policy of seizing prescription drugs imported through the mail from Canada.

The practice, implemented last November, had come under fire from lawmakers for depriving tens of thousands of American seniors of their drugs and protecting the high prices charged by U.S. pharmaceutical companies.

Lynn Hollinger, a Customs spokeswoman, said the seizures would stop Oct. 9 but declined to explain the policy reversal. "We're going back to operating procedures prior to November 2005," she said.

Although most prescription-drug importations are illegal under U.S. law, Customs had long turned a blind eye to small mail orders coming across the border from Canada, before launching the new policy of seizures late last year.

Prescription drugs are significantly cheaper in Canada because its national health-care system negotiates lower prices for its citizens. The U.S., by contrast, is one of the only markets in the world where the government doesn't exercise control over drug prices.

As a result, pharmaceutical companies earn the bulk of their profits in the U.S. market. Imports from Canada, which have surged in the past six years with the rise of online pharmacies, have been a sore point with drug makers. The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America has argued that drugs imported from Canada are unsafe because they haven't been vetted by the Food and Drug Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0074801

Upon learning that Customs would stop the seizures, Ken Johnson, senior vice president of the industry trade group, said he was disappointed with the policy reversal. "We're adamantly opposed to any importation schemes. Fake drugs are a very serious problem that is real and growing."

As of mid-July, Customs had seized more than 37,000 prescription-drug packages from Canada. The agency declined to say how many more packages its agents have seized since then.

Congressional pressure had been building against the seizures. At the behest of Sen. Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs was investigating the new Customs policy.

"This is a huge victory," Mr. Nelson said. "For nearly a year, the White House has been punishing seniors for filling their prescriptions at lower Canadian prices. Now it looks like the government is getting out of the business of harassing these consumers."

Last week, Congress sent President Bush a Homeland Security appropriations bill that includes an amendment barring Customs agents from preventing persons from re-entering the U.S. from Canada with a 90-day supply of medicine. The amendment excluded packages sent by mail, but it represented a significant breach in the tight alliance between Republicans and the drug industry, which remains a major source of financial support for House and Senate campaigns.

Dan McLaughlin, a spokesman for Mr. Nelson, said the senator believes the seizures were politically motivated to bolster enrollments in Medicare Part D, the new drug benefit for seniors that took effect last January, and wants the Senate investigation to be completed.

U.S. Drops Program To Halt Discount Drugs From Canada (LAT)

By Lisa Girion

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

The federal government plans to halt a controversial crackdown on discount drugs mailed from Canadian pharmacies to U.S. customers, removing a significant hurdle to Americans buying cheaper medications from abroad.

Earlier this week, Customs officials sent an e-mail to some members of Congress that it would abandon the seizure policy next Monday.

Instead of the broad effort, the e-mail said the agency would sample and test mail-order medications for counterfeits and ineffective ingredients on "randomly generated days throughout the fiscal year."

The reversal by the Department of Homeland Security, which operates U.S. Customs and Border Protection, could eliminate much of the fears from senior citizens and other consumers that drugs purchased from Canadian mail-order houses would be confiscated.

Those drugs, including the popular medications Lipitor and Fosamax, can be 30 percent to 80 percent cheaper from Canada and other countries, surveys have shown. But the U.S. government was confiscating as much as 20 percent of them earlier this year at the height of the crackdown.

The move reverses a policy that began last November around the time enrollment opened for the Medicare drug plan. The Canadian shipments had been confiscated out of concerns about safety, but consumer advocates and others argued that the crackdown was an effort to limit competition in the pharmaceutical market and force seniors on fixed incomes to sign up for new Medicare plans and pay higher prices for drugs from U.S. pharmacies.

The change comes as millions of seniors on Medicare drug plans were expected to hit the "doughnut hole," the gap in coverage created by Medicare law that requires enrollees to pay the full cost of medicines after their total annual drug spending exceeds $2,250. Coverage kicks in again only if annual drug expenses hit $5,100.

As a result, many low-income seniors were considering going without needed medications through the end of the year, advocates said.

Although it is illegal for individuals to import pharmaceuticals to take advantage of price differences, the Food and Drug Administration historically had turned a blind eye to personal purchases of non-narcotic prescription drugs from Canada and Mexico in shipments of as much as three months' worth.

That changed Nov. 17 when Customs got involved and began a quiet crackdown on foreign mail-order drugs. By some estimates, more than 40,000 packages were interdicted. Canadian mail-order pharmacies said seizures jumped from between 3 percent and 5 percent of their U.S. shipments to a peak earlier this year of more than 20 percent. They said seizures declined after the crackdown was disclosed in media reports.

Seniors complained that they were failing to receive needed medications, and members of Congress who favor the importation of inexpensive drugs for senior constituents criticized Customs for failing to adequately warn people of the crackdown.

DOJ_NMG_0074802

A spokeswoman for Homeland Security would not discuss the change in policy, but she issued a statement saying, "While we are reversing this policy, CBP (Customs) remains committed, in cooperation with the FDA, to protecting the American public from unsafe and ineffective medications. We will be focusing our resources to best protect the American public."

A spokeswoman for the FDA said it had no comment because it had not been officially informed of the change.

Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., called the change a "huge victory."

"For nearly a year the White House has been punishing seniors for filling their prescriptions at lower Canadian prices," he said. "Now it looks like the government is getting out of the business of harassing these consumers."

In Congress, political momentum in favor of allowing personal importation of prescription medications is building. House and Senate Republicans recently reached an agreement that would allow Americans to bring a 90-day supply of drugs across the border from Canada. But, in negotiations over the language of the Homeland Security spending bill, the conferees stopped short of doing the same for medications purchased via the Internet.

Memorial Focuses On Religious Freedom (RGJ)

By Betty Aleck

Reno Gazette Journal, October 4, 2006

FERNLEY — At the end of the 22-minute ceremony, a bell was rung 22 times in tribute of Mustang 22, the call number for a Chinook helicopter that was shot down by enemy fire and crashed in Afghanistan on Sept. 25, 2005.

Last Monday (Sept. 25), a Lights of Liberty Candlelight Vigil was held at the Northern Nevada Veterans Memorial Cemetery to pay tribute to Sgt. Patrick Stewart and four other soldiers of Mustang 22, who died a year ago that day.

The celebration honored the soldiers' service and sacrifices and it also underscored American constitutional freedom of religious.

Roberta Stewart of Fernley has spent a year battling with the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (DOVA) to have the Wiccan pentacle placed on her husband's memorial plaque at the local veterans cemetery.

On Sept. 13, the Nevada Office of Veterans Services announced that with help from the Attorney General's Office and Governor Kenny Guinn, a Wiccan emblem will be placed on the plaque and on the Memorial Wall at the NNVMC.

The DOVA does not recognize the Wiccan religion and that agency only allows approved emblems to be placed on DOVA issued headstones and markers, including the Christian cross, Buddhist wheel and an atheist symbol.

According to Tim Tetz, executive director of the Nevada Office of Veterans Services (NOVS), the decision to place the plaque with the Wiccan emblem was made after it was determined through the AG's office that the NOVS has sole discretion over state veterans cemeteries.

He said via a press release, "I promised his widow (Stewart) and many others that we would diligently pursue every option to make certain Sgt. Stewart received recognition for his contribution as an Army soldier, a Nevadan and an American hero."

At last Monday's ceremony, Stewart said, "We are here to honor my husband and the sacrifices he made." She then went on to thank the "State of Nevada, Governor Kenny Guinn, Congressman Jim Gibbons, Congresswoman Shelly Berkley, Tetz, who had compassion and understanding to fight for religious freedom and grant it to me on Sept. 13."

She added that throughout the process she and her family were placed in the media spotlight and their "pain and suffering" was revealed, but through it all they stayed together.

"We stayed together as a family and we stayed strong," she said.

Reverend Selena Fox, senior minister of Circle Sanctuary of the Wiccan Church, based in Barneveld, WI, said while standing at the Memorial Wall that candles would be lit for "those who passed on and the freedom and liberty that this country embodies" and for the five soldiers that died in Operation Enduring Freedom.

She then lit the candle of remembrance for soldiers Sgt. Stewart, Chief Warrant Officer John Flynn of Sparks, Sgt., Kenneth Ross Peoria, Arizona, Sgt. Tate Baum of Pendleton, Ore., and Warrant Officer Adrain Stump, Pendleton, Ore.

Rev. William Chrystal, military chaplain, recalled when Patrick Stewart came home from Desert Storm and joined the Nevada Army National Guard. "He loved being in northern Nevada and seeing the horses, as they would fly low to see the mustangs."

He also recalled Flynn, who came home from flight school and was starting his family with his wife Crystal.

Throughout his prayers, the reverend reminded people of American's religious freedoms. He said, "Oh Creator, Great Spirit, Heavenly Father, we call you by an endless variety of names."

Chrystal continued, ""Freedom isn't something we can take for granted. Freedoms for which Pat and John and others died are freedoms which can be snatched from us at any moment."

"We are here to remember them and the freedoms for which they fought, especially to worship you in one's own way and to express it as he or she feels is appropriate," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0074803

Fox said that Wiccans continue to strive for equal rights. She said there are Wiccan families of other soldiers who were killed in Iraq, as well as in Korea and Vietnam, that are also fighting to have the Wiccan emblem placed on grave markers.

She also said other vigils were held around the country not only by Wiccans but Christians, Buddhist, Jews and other faiths.

Fox said, "Let us focus on the importance of American tradition of freedom and religious liberty for all. Let each of us pray… that all of our American freedoms are upheld."

Stewart is hoping her husband's plaque will be placed on the Memorial Wall by Oct. 21, Patrick's birthday.

Wiccans Seek Place In Military Graveyards (ADA)

Advertiser Adelaide, October 4, 2006

NEO-PAGAN Wiccans in the United States have gone to court to force the US military to accept their five-pointed star-in-a-circle symbol on tombstones in military cemeteries, a civil liberties group said today.

The American Civil Liberties Union said the Wiccans want to have their symbol recognised for use in the official veterans' graveyards in the same way that Christian crosses, the Jewish Star of David and symbols for Muslims, Sikhs and adherents of other religions - 38 in all - are used.

The US military recognises Wicca, inspired by Europe's ancient pre-Christian pagan practices but also sometimes associated with witchcraft, as an official religion, which gives it certain tax privileges.

But the National Cemetery Administration of the US Department of Veterans Affairs has refused to permit the Wiccan symbol to be used in its cemeteries.

Use of the symbol has been sought recently by a retired military follower of Wicca and relatives of two former soldiers who have passed away - one a World War II veteran buried in the prestigious Arlington National Cemetery near Washington, and the second a soldier killed in Iraq.

"The Federal Government's discriminatory delay in approving these applications must end. There is no good reason to deny grieving families the solace and comfort available to military families of other religions," said Daniel Mach, an ACLU lawyer.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales: More Money Going To Fight Human Trafficking (AP)

By Becky Bohrer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) -- The Interstate 10 corridor has become a magnet for human traffickers seeking to exploit labor needs on the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday.

Gonzales announced that Louisiana will get about $450,000 to fight the problem.

Nearly $8 million is being used to set up 10 new task forces - partnerships between law enforcement agencies and social service groups - to investigate and prosecute trafficking cases and to help victims.

Besides Louisiana, other states set to receive task force funds include Texas, Utah and Missouri.

"Freedom is guaranteed only with vigilance," Gonzales told law enforcement officials at a conference on human trafficking. "And while ensuring freedom is a goal of our fight, that fight can never really be ended until we are sure that no one is denied freedom."

Each year, up to 17,500 people - mostly women and children - are brought into the United States by traffickers to be prostitutes, work in sweat shops or work in domestic servitude, he said.

Already, 32 task forces are established around the country and in territories, according to the Justice Department.

US Boosts Efforts Against Human Trafficking (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 4, 2006

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced an expansion of US efforts to fight what he called the "vile practice" of human trafficking.

Speaking at the government-sponsored National Conference on Human Trafficking in immigrant-heavy New Orleans, Gonzales said the government will increase funding for prosecuting commercial slave traders by eight million dollars and increase the number of task forces on the issue to 42 from 32.

Some of the money will be used to "put a stop to the exploitation and abuse of laborers" brought into the New Orleans area by traffickers to work in rebuilding efforts in the wake of devastating Hurricane Katrina last year.

DOJ_NMG_0074804

"Human trafficking is a violation of the human body, mind and spirit," Gonzales told some 600 law enforcement officials and victims' advocates at the conference.

"For the vile practice to be taking place in a country the world looks to as a beacon of freedom is a terrible irony and an utter tragedy."

The US government estimates as many as 17,500 people in the US each year, mostly women and children, are enslaved for the commercial sex trade or other industries. Worldwide, an estimate 600,000 to 800,000 people fall victim annually to human traffickers.

Human smuggling, where traffickers move illegal migrants across borders for money without holding them against their will afterwards, is a more prolific problem in the United States.

Gonzales acknowledged that educating the public is a critical part of prosecuting the more cynical trafficking in sex slaves and forced labor.

"Most Americans think that our country resolved the question of slavery with the Civil War," Gonzales said.

During this year the Justice Department has broken up two sex slavery rings involving South Korean women smuggled into the country and then held in brothels.

A federal prosecutor in Florida, which hosted the government's first human trafficking conference in 2004, said he has 11 slavery investigations underway in his state.

Gonzales said the new funding includes money to stop the enslavement of migrants seeking to help rebuild New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

He said Interstate 10, a coast-to-coast highway that runs from Southern California through Texas and New Orleans to Florida, has become a "magnet for human trafficking."

Advocates for post-Katrina migrant laborers have cited poor pay and hazardous working conditions as more common problems for the itinerant workers, whose numbers are estimated between 45,000 to 60,000.

But Gonzales suggested the government's focus on New Orleans is a preemptive strike that reflects its strategy for attacking human trafficking everywhere.

"We have an aggressive approach to human trafficking and it is working," he said.

Utah Getting Money To Fight Forced Labor (KUTV)

KUTV-TV, Salt Lake City, October 4, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY The Interstate 10 corridor has become a magnet for human traffickers seeking to exploit labor needs on the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday.

“The thirst for freedom and opportunity is part of the human spirit and is very strong in this world,” he told law enforcement agents and others at a conference on human trafficking. “To offer it as a lure, for purposes of a crime, in unconscionable.”

Nearly $8 million is being used to set up 10 partnerships between law enforcement agencies and social service groups to investigate and prosecute trafficking cases and to help victims.

Police and community groups in the Salt Lake City area will share $900,000, said Melodie Rydalch, spokeswoman for Utah U.S. Attorney Brett Tolman.

“I don’t think anyone is suggesting Utah is a hub of human trafficking. ... We have not prosecuted a case,” Rydalch said.

“But through training and partnerships, we’ll raise the awareness to put people in position to identify these kinds of cases,” she said.

Jim Letten, the New Orleans-based U.S. attorney, said the opportunity for exploitation in his state, and particularly hard-hit New Orleans, is ripe.

Estimates put thousands of migrant or unskilled workers in the area to work, he said. And with I-10 traditionally seen as a pipeline for moving drugs, the opportunity for using the route to traffic people – perhaps through the state to other parts of the country – is highly likely, Letten said.

“New Orleans is a frontier town now,” he said in an interview.

In addition to Utah and Louisiana, other states set to receive funds for new task forces are Florida, Missouri, Nevada, New York and Texas as well as the commonwealth of Northern Marianas. Already, 32 task forces are established around the country – in some of the same states getting new groups – and in U.S. territories, according to the Justice Department.

“Freedom is guaranteed only with vigilance,” Gonzales said. “And while ensuring freedom is a goal of our fight, that fight can never really be ended until we are sure that no one is denied freedom.”

Each year, traffickers bring up to 17,500 people – mostly women and children – into the United States to be prostitutes, work in sweat shops or otherwise work in forced labor situations, he said, acknowledging, though, that getting a handle on the extent of the problem is difficult.

DOJ_NMG_0074805

The number of human trafficking cases brought by prosecutors has risen in recent years, according to the Justice Department. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, 91 such federal cases were filed_ up 405 percent from fiscal years 1996-2000. The agency said 140 defendants were convicted, the Justice Department said.

In fiscal year 2006, the government charged 111 people in 32 cases and got 79 convictions, the department said.

Gonzales credited the rise in cases to an increased focus on the issue and partnerships between agencies.

SLC Awarded Crime Funding (SLT)

By Jason Bergreen, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 4, 2006

Human trafficking battle: The $450,000 will help train officers to spot sexual or economic exploitation of victims

Nearly half a million dollars in federal funding was awarded to Salt Lake City on Tuesday to help train law enforcement in arresting and prosecuting human traffickers and providing support to victims.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the nearly $8 million funding to be distributed to 10 U.S. cities, including Salt Lake City, at the 2006 National Conference on Human Trafficking in New Orleans.

Salt Lake City will receive $450,000.

Though human trafficking involving sexual, economic or labor exploitation has not been identified in Utah, the project is a "proactive" step to educate the community, said program proponent and Salt Lake City Attorney Sim Gill.

The program is a collaboration among the U.S. Attorney's Office, Salt Lake City, the FBI, other law enforcement agencies and nongovernmental organizations, such as Utah Health and Human Rights Project, the Latino Communication and Information Center and Holy Cross Ministries.

This is "an effort to educate every portion of the state," said Dustin Pead of the U.S. Attorney's Office. "We want them to understand what trafficking is."

The forcible transportation of someone from another country or even another state for labor, services, sex or debt-bondage constitutes human trafficking, Gill said.

"We're an agricultural state," he said. "You can see how labor may be exploited."

Utah has never prosecuted a case of human trafficking, said Melodie Rydalch, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah. She said that if law enforcement agencies ask "one or two more questions, they might find . . . signs and symptoms of human trafficking."

"I'm not suggesting this is a hotbed of trafficking, but we need to be aware of it and look for it," Rydalch said.

However, there are a handful of ongoing human trafficking investigations in the state, Pead said.

Gill said the funding was expected to be split evenly between law enforcement agencies and support services.

"Human trafficking is very complex and relies a lot on the mental state of the victim," Rydalch said.

This funding is the first of its kind Utah has received for this issue, Gill said.

La. Gets Grant To Halt Migrant Abuse (NOTP)

By Susan Finch, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, October 4, 2006

Workers turned into virtual slave laborers

A $450,000 federal grant coming to Louisiana will help catch criminals who bring migrant workers to do hurricane damage repairs and then use violence and threats to turn them into slave laborers, the nation's top law enforcement officer said here Tuesday.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the grant is part of nearly $8 million the Justice Department is spending this fiscal year to add 10 new task forces to the 32 already at work trying to stop exploitation and abuse of migrant workers.

The Louisiana task force, like the others, will be a partnership between law enforcement agencies charged with catching and prosecuting human traffickers and social service organizations whose job it will be to try to rescue trafficking victims and get them help to return to their normal lives.

The $450,000 grant will go to the Louisiana Commission on Law Enforcement, which will coordinate the task force enforcement work.

A similar amount out of the $8 million total, has been earmarked for the social services agency that will serve trafficking victims, the commission's policy planning administrator, Robert Mehrtens said.

Speaking for Michael Ranatza, the commission's executive director, Mehrtens said the work of the task force will start with training on how to spot and address human trafficking.

He said the Calcasieu Parish Sheriff's Office will head the initial task force effort, including developing sources.

DOJ_NMG_0074806

"What we think is happening is that they (traffickers) are not only bringing in laborers, taking their documents from them, not paying them, but also bringing in prostitution to service the workers," Mehrtens said.

Another byproduct of human trafficking is an increase in sale of illegal drugs to migrant workers, he said.

Gonzales, whose family came to the United States from Mexico, said that most Americans "think we resolved the question of slavery with the Civil War, but freedom is assured by vigilance."

But Gonzales said, people from other countries are being betrayed by their fellow countrymen who take advantage of their dream for a better life in America but bring them here only to keep them penned up working as prostitutes, sweat-shop laborers or domestic workers.

Jim Letten, U.S. attorney for the New Orleans-based federal Eastern District of Louisiana, declined to say Tuesday whether the government has any human trafficking investigations under way.

But in remarks before Gonzales spoke Tuesday, a Letten counterpart from another state was more forthcoming: "In my district, there are 11 slavery investigations going on right now," said Paul Perez, U.S. attorney for the Middle District of Florida.

City Wins Grant On Human Trafficking (SPT)

By JACOB H. FRIES

St Petersburg (FL) Times, October 4, 2006

The $450,000 federal outlay, the only one awarded in Florida, will set up a task force to fight exploitation for the sex industry and slavery.

CLEARWATER - The city Police Department on Tuesday won a $450,000 federal grant to create a local task force devoted to rescuing victims of human trafficking and arresting their smugglers.

Part of the money will pay for two full-time detectives to investigate such cases over the next three years. Clearwater was one of 10 police agencies nationwide to receive the grant this year, and the only one in Florida.

"Without this money, we would never be able to do this right," said Dewey Williams, the deputy police chief. "These are not your typical, mainstream criminal investigations. It's not like robberies or rapes, where victims report the crimes. Victims of human trafficking have to be sought out. We have to go out and find them."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the Justice Department grants Tuesday at a national conference on human trafficking in New Orleans.

In addition to Clearwater police, the task force will include representatives of the U.S. Attorney's Office, the Pinellas-Pasco State Attorney's Office, the Pinellas County Sheriff's Office and the Regional Community Policing Institute.

World Relief, a Christian aid organization with a local office at 6219 U.S. 19 in New Port Richey, will receive an additional $450,000 to help rescued victims, who often need temporary visas, housing and other support as the cases wind through the court system.

"When you rescue these victims, they have nothing," said Williams, who was attending the conference in New Orleans.

Trafficking in people is not the same as smuggling them. Human smugglers are typically paid to take people illegally across international borders, leaving them alone once they do so.

Traffickers, meanwhile, may transport people across borders, but they generate their profits through exploitation, coercing their victims into slavery, involuntary servitude or the commercial sex industry.

After drug dealing, human trafficking is tied with illegal arms sales as the second-largest criminal industry in the world, according to the Health and Human Services Department.

Florida ranks as the No. 2 destination for trafficking victims, behind California, with both states being home to large immigrant populations, says the Florida Coalition Against Human Trafficking.

The scope of human trafficking in Clearwater and the Tampa Bay area is unclear, but it's definitely "alive and well," Williams has said.

In May, when police raided a brothel on Camellia Drive, just north of Gulf-to-Bay Boulevard, they found signs of human trafficking, officials have said. A woman found at the house was not held against her will, but evidence and testimony from a doorman suggested that other prostitutes brought there had been lured from Mexico and forced into the sex industry, police say.

It was not the first time city police officials thought they had encountered a tentacle of human trafficking. In 2003, they shut down a prostitution operation at an apartment near Drew Street and U.S. 19 - similar to the one on Camellia Drive - but investigators couldn't tie it to a trafficking network.

In Clearwater's grant application, the department noted the success of its Hispanic Outreach Center, which opened in 2001. However, workers at the center had encountered several suspected cases of human trafficking, but because of a lack of resources, police were unable to effectively investigate, the application said.

That's going to change, Williams said.

DOJ_NMG_0074807

"Beginning next week, the task force is going to be under way," he said. [

Grand Jury Indicts 42 In Multistate Drug Network (FWCOM/AP)

By Associated Press

FortWayne.com, October 4, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS – A federal grand jury has indicted 42 people on charges of transporting and selling cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana in southwest Indiana as part of a multistate drug operation.

Those arrested were members of three drug rings, each of which was primarily responsible for distributing one of the drugs, said Susan Brooks, the U.S. attorney for southern Indiana.

Federal and local police began making arrests at a series of raids at 18 sites Wednesday.

Most of those taken into custody were being held Thursday at the Henderson County Jail in Kentucky, Brooks said.

The raids resulted in the seizure of $69,000 in cash and 15 firearms, including an AK-47 semiautomatic rifle and a sawed-off shotgun, she said.

"It's a very good day for the citizens of Evansville and Princeton," Brooks said of the cities where five of 18 raids were conducted. "Today, the good guys won."

The indictments followed a six-month investigation headed by the Drug Enforcement Administration and charged two Texas men, Jose A. Cabrera, 27, of Dallas and Rickey Boyd, 36, of Spring with being among the ringleaders of a conspiracy to bring methamphetamine to the Evansville area.

Others were charged with bringing cocaine from Los Angeles and Nashville, Tenn.

Drug dealers "see communities like Evansville and Princeton as places to do business and make money where they won't get caught," Brooks said.

Feds Indict 42, Arrest 38 - Many Locally (WIFE-TV)

WIFE-TV, October 4, 2006

The U.S. Attorney's Office announced the indictments of 42 individuals; 38 have been arrested. A larger number, 24 people, were in Evansville, allegedly moving crystal meth, cocaine and marijuana.

U.S. Attorney Susan W. Brooks exclaims, "This is a very good day for the citizens of Evansville and the citizens of Princeton. Today [Wednesday], the good guys won, and we have a victory in these communities because of these indictments."

Three different drug trafficking rings, dismantled after three indictments, were unsealed in federal court from a six month investigation. A total of 42 people are indicted for different organizations - one for crystal meth, another for cocaine and the third for marijuana.

Dennis Wichern, with the DEA, explains, "Not one organization but three. The reason: The men and women standing right behind me."

More than 200 law enforcement officials conducted raids Wednesday morning, mostly in Evansville but some in Princeton. But the story spans across the nation.

Brooks says, "People have to realize the problem doesn't start here. This is a national problem, and we work with our federal partners all around the country."

Defendants were named in Dallas, Los Angeles and even Nashville. It's unknown how long these three separate drug rings have been in operation, but officials say they did help move large amounts to the area.

"The cocaine and crack organization moved kilogram quantities of cocaine from Los Angeles, CA," says Brooks.

Even though these authorities call Wednesday a victory in the war against drugs, they know there are still many more out there.

Vanderburgh County Sheriff Brad Ellsworth warns, "And to the people that continue this behavior, as you see this group, we'll not falter to take you off the streets."

Authorities also confiscated more than $69,000 in cash and 15 firearms from Wendesday's raids.

Four individuals have not been arrested; three are from the Tri-State. They are 31-year-old Amir Morgan and 32-year-old Ramon Clayton of Evansville and 24-year-old Myron Berry of Princeton.

All of these defendants, including the ones from out of state, are expected to be in court sometime next week.

Feds Allege Father Helped Son In Marijuana Dealings (MUNCSP)

By Nick Werner

Muncie Star Press, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074808

MUNCIE -- Delaware County resident Aaron Drumm sold marijuana by the pound to two men and a woman in southern Indiana who then redistributed the drug to other dealers, according to a grand jury indictment provided to The Star Press on Friday.

Twenty-five-year-old Aaron Drumm's father, Jeffrey Drumm, 46, helped with the transportation of some of the marijuana in motor vehicles, the indictment alleges.

The document details one specific drug deal in which the younger Drumm on July 4 agreed to sell 50 pounds of marijuana at between $600 and $700 a pound to a Princeton man.

Two days later, Jeffrey Drumm allegedly delivered the package to Princeton.

The Drumms were arrested Wednesday morning as part of a multi-state drug probe involving the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

The six-month investigation focused on suspected cocaine, marijuana and methamphetamine dealers in the Princeton and Evansville areas and their suppliers.

The Drumms face a charge of conspiracy to distribute 100 kilograms or more of marijuana.

One-hundred kilograms is about 220 pounds.

Forty-two people in Indiana, Texas and California were indicted in the investigation.

In an interview Wednesday, Patricia Drumm said her husband and son were innocent.

Delaware County Sheriff George Sheridan said he did not believe the Drumms were supplying local dealers.

Contact news reporter Nick Werner at 213-5832.

Jury Selection Begins In Retrial In Smuggling Deaths Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Jury selection could take up to two weeks in the retrial of a truck driver who prosecutors say failed to help the illegal immigrants packed into his tractor-trailer in what became America's deadliest human smuggling attempt.

If convicted for his role, Tyrone Williams could face the death penalty. Prosecutors said he was part of a smuggling ring that tried to transport more than 70 illegal immigrants from Mexico, Central America and the Dominican Republic in his airtight tractor-trailer from South Texas to Houston in May 2003.

Nineteen immigrants died after succumbing to the heat inside, which authorities estimate climbed to 173 degrees Fahrenheit (78 degrees Celsius). Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop near Victoria, about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston.

Jury selection began Tuesday with an initial jury pool of about 250 people. Potential jurors will be questioned individually due to the possible death sentence. The retrial could take up to four weeks.

A jury convicted Williams last year on 38 transporting counts in the deaths. He avoided a death sentence because the jury could not agree on what role Williams played in the crime. The jury deadlocked on 20 other counts.

But the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the decision, saying the verdict did not count because the jury failed to specify his role in the deadly smuggling attempt.

The trial will be overseen by a new judge, Lee Rosenthal.

The appeals court removed U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore from the trial because of the case's "extraordinary history" and her busy docket. Prosecutors and Gilmore had a contentious relationship throughout the case.

Williams is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty. He was indicted on 58 transporting, harboring and conspiracy counts, 20 of which are eligible for the death penalty.

Williams' lead defense attorney, Craig Washington, said the federal government is only retrying his client because it failed to get a death sentence during the first trial.

"There is no proof he was aware of their suffering. The (first) jury didn't believe (he was aware). If they had, they would have found him guilty of a death penalty eligible count," Washington said. "They found him guilty of what he did do, which was transport those unfortunate people."

Prosecutors declined to comment before the start of the retrial. But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez said at a recent hearing that Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen who lived in Schenectady, New York, could have opened the doors of the tractor-trailer and freed the immigrants but he chose not to do that.

So far, seven people have been sentenced to prison in the case. Sentencings for three others are pending. Charges against two were dismissed and one man remains a fugitive.

Prison Official Accused In Sex Case (HC)

DOJ_NMG_0074809

Houston Chronicle, October 4, 2006

A prison official had sexual contact with female inmates at the Bryan Federal Prison Camp and lied about it to investigators, according to criminal information made public Tuesday.

The information filed in federal court by the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Justice Department accuses former Inmate Systems Manager Ricky L. Bernard, 45, of College Station, of sexual contact with the women in 2003 and 2004.

He is charged with two counts of sexual abuse of a ward, two counts of abusive sexual contact with a ward and one count of making a false statement to a federal agent.

Man Sues Secret Service Agent Over Arrest After Approaching Cheney And Denouncing War (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

DENVER, Oct. 3 — A Colorado man who was arrested in June on harassment charges after he approached Vice President Dick Cheney to denounce the war in Iraq filed a federal lawsuit on Tuesday accusing a Secret Service agent of civil rights violations.

In his suit, filed in Federal District Court in Denver, the man, Steven Howards, an environmental consultant who lives in Golden, Colo., says he stepped up to the vice president to speak his mind in a public place and found himself in handcuffs — in violation, the suit says, of the Constitution's language about free speech and illegal search and seizure.

The suit seeks no specific damages, and names only one agent, Virgil D. Reichle Jr., who is assigned to the Denver office of the Secret Service. But Mr. Howards's lawyer, David A. Lane, said Mr. Cheney might be called as a witness, along with the district attorney in Eagle County who threw out the criminal case against Mr. Howards. If a chain of command within the Secret Service is found that suggests Mr. Reichle was acting on orders, Mr. Lane said, more defendants could be named.

A call to Agent Reichle was not returned. A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney referred questions on the matter to the Secret Service. The agent in charge of the Denver office, Lon Garner, declined to comment.

Mr. Howards, 54, said at a news conference here that he was taking his 8-year-old son to a piano lesson on June 16 at the Beaver Creek Resort about two hours west of Denver when he saw Mr. Cheney at an outdoor mall. Mr. Howards said he approached within two feet of Mr. Cheney and said in a calm voice, "I think your policies in Iraq are reprehensible," or as the lawsuit itself describes the encounter, "words to that effect."

Mr. Howards said he then went on his way. About 10 minutes later, he said, he was walking back through the area when Agent Reichle handcuffed him and said he would be charged with assaulting the vice president. Local police officers, acting on information from the Secret Service, according to the suit, ultimately filed misdemeanor harassment charges that could have resulted in up to a year in jail.

A June 16 article in The Vail Daily quoted a spokesman for the Secret Service, Eric Zahren, as saying that Mr. Howards "wasn't acting like other folks in the area," and that he became "argumentative and combative" when agents tried to question him. Mr. Howards said Tuesday that he was never threatening and did not become upset until his arrest.

"This was not about anything I did — this is about what I said," he said.

Mr. Zahren declined to comment on the suit or on his original description of the event.

Mr. Howards said he was released on $500 bond after about three hours in jail. A state judge dismissed the charge about three weeks later at the request of the Eagle County district attorney, Mark Hurlbert.

"It was our understanding that the vice president did not want to prosecute," Mr. Hurlbert said in a telephone interview. "The original indication was that he had pushed the vice president. Later it looked to be that he had just spoken to him."

Mr. Hurlbert said the initial information on the incident came from the Secret Service agents at Beaver Creek. A later communication from Mr. Cheney's office or the Secret Service — Mr. Hurlbert said he did not remember which — said the government wanted to drop the matter.

The suit joins two others — in West Virginia and another in Denver — charging that Secret Service agents or White House staff members violated the law in keeping people with opposing political views away from President Bush or Mr. Cheney.

In the other Colorado suit, two people said they were ejected from a taxpayer-financed appearance by Mr. Bush in Denver in March 2005 because of an antiwar bumper sticker. The case is awaiting a ruling from the judge on a motion by the government to dismiss the case.

In the West Virginia case, the American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit on behalf of Jeff and Nicole Rank, who said they were arrested on July 4, 2004, at an appearance by Mr. Bush in Charleston. The Ranks had proper tickets but were wearing anti-Bush T-shirts, the suit says. The government has an Oct. 10 deadline to respond to the suit, said Chris Hansen, a senior staff counsel at the A.C.L.U. in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0074810

Mr. Howards said that he had had no intent to test the limits of free speech when he approached Mr. Cheney, but that the government's actions in the aftermath only deepened his convictions and opposition.

"This administration has a history of intimidating folks," he said.

Another Of Jewish Group's Buses Vandalized (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Vandals damaged a parked bus that belongs to the Jewish Council for the Aging of Greater Washington in Rockville over the Yom Kippur holiday, marking the second time the organization's fleet has been smashed up this year.

Drivers who reported to work Sunday afternoon found that the rear window of a new, $71,000 bus customized to transport senior citizens had been smashed with a rock, said Jeanne Zepp, a spokeswoman for the organization.

"The timing of this is very troubling," Zepp said, referring to the holiest day of the Jewish calendar, which this year lasted from sundown Sunday to sundown Monday. "We're perplexed by this."

Zepp said the vandals have left no explicit anti-Semitic signs. The name of the organization is marked on the outside of the buses.

Seven of the group's buses were targeted in a similar act of vandalism in January at a commercial lot the council leases in the 4900 block of Wyaconda Road. One, which was damaged beyond repair, was replaced by the bus vandalized over the weekend. The group has spent $221,000 fixing the damaged buses and beefing up security in the buses and around the lot.

The center announced yesterday a $5,000 reward for information leading to an arrest and asked the police to do more.

"We're more than a little disappointed with the reaction we've gotten from the Montgomery County police," said Zepp, adding that officials at the nonprofit group haven't heard from detectives since they reported the January incident to police.

Police spokeswoman Melanie Hadley said she didn't know whether the January incident -- which was not classified as a hate crime -- is related to the one reported this weekend.

"Every incident of this nature we take very seriously," she said. "We are diligently looking into this. We want to find the perpetrators."

Hadley said she did not know whether the latest act of vandalism would be classified as a hate crime.

The center provides services to seniors of all religious denominations in the Washington area and depends on the wheelchair-accessible buses to transport clients to activities, appointments and programs.

"It saddens me that a nonprofit devoted to serving frail elderly of all faiths must use our funds in any way other than direct-service programs for seniors," Richard Dine, the group's president, said in a statement.

Plan Outlined To Save King/Drew (LAT)

By Steve Hymon And Susannah Rosenblatt

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

The Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors this afternoon approved the outlines of a plan to save Martin Luther King Jr./Drew Medical Center by greatly reducing the size of the facility and handing over its management to another county hospital.

The five supervisors unanimously asked the county health chief to return in two weeks with more details on a plan that would shrink services provided at King/Drew, relocate most of King/Drew's staff to other county facilities and put King/Drew under the day-to-day control of Harbor-UCLA Medical Center, located 10 miles away near Torrance.

The plan would preserve emergency room services at King/Drew in Willowbrook, south of Watts.

Dr. Bruce Chernof, chief of the county's Department of Health Services, told supervisors that the plan could take as much as a year to implement and left open the possibility that King/Drew may have to close for an unspecified amount of time while being put under the oversight of Harbor-UCLA.

Chernof also confirmed that the plan would sever longtime ties between King/Drew and the neighboring Charles R. Drew University of Medicine and Science, which trains residents at the hospital.

Susan Kelly, the university's president, told supervisors that the plan could threaten the university's future. "Our major fear is that we will be collateral or road kill" in such a plan, Kelly said, adding that the school will likely have to cut back some of its training programs.

"Frankly, the implications of this are deeper than we imagined," Kelly added.

The county was informed last month that the embattled King/Drew hospital failed its most recent inspection by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. As a result, the agency has told the county that it intends to cut about $200 million in funding for King/Drew by year's end.

DOJ_NMG_0074811

Faced with losing roughly half of King/Drew's budget, the Board of Supervisors had a choice of either funding the hospital on its own — a steep price for county coffers — or finding ways to appease federal inspectors.

The new plan aspires to straighten out chronic patient care issues at King/Drew by handing oversight of the facility to Harbor-UCLA, a hospital that is viewed within the county system as a much more stable and well-run institution.

According to two doctors quoted in The Times this morning, Harbor-UCLA's well-regarded chief executive officer, Tecla A. Mickoseff, reportedly threatened to resign over the plan.

"She's not available for comment, but she has told me that she is not intending to resign," said Julie Rees, spokeswoman for Harbor-UCLA. "I don't know anything about who the doctors were or why they may have said something like that."

Rees said that Mickoseff was unavailable for an interview, citing ongoing meetings about the King/Drew plan. Doctors at the hospital Monday issued a statement questioning whether Harbor-UCLA had the resources to assume oversight of King/Drew while not threatening the care it provides to its patients.

Mickoseff's name was not spoken during the meeting. "I understand when some people at Harbor have some reticence," said Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky. "This is not a time to resist, this is a time to step up."

Chernof said that the most critical step now is to ensure that the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services will continue the funding while the county continues drawing up a plan. He acknowledged that he does not know if the plan will pass muster with the agency.

Federal inspectors could not be reached for comment early this afternoon as to whether the plan was acceptable.

"I hope that when we come back in two weeks we have a letter of some sort that clearly defines that we are going in the appropriate direction," said Supervisor Gloria Molina.

Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Los Angeles) told supervisors that she and other members of Congress who represent the area served by King/Drew are generally supportive of the plan. Waters said that congressional leaders would urge the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services to extend the cutoff of funding beyond the end of the year.

"This is not a time for division, this is not a time for finger-pointing. This is a time for us to work together," Waters said. "I would like to piggyback on what Supervisor Molina said. As we go through describing what the hospital will be in the transition, we must keep in mind that the community does have a vision that someday it will get back to or get to where it has never been -- a complete acute care hospital."

South-Central L.A. Hospital In Critical Condition (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

LOS ANGELES -- Activists who fought hard to bring a hospital to south-central Los Angeles after the 1965 Watts riots are in mourning since the announcement that their beloved but deeply troubled hospital failed a crucial federal inspection and will lose more than half its funding.

While the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors weighs a proposal to slash services and turn most of King/Drew Medical Center's management over to a nearby county facility, African American community members met for a combination pep rally and wake.

"I don't want to talk about closing this hospital," Mollie Bell, a resident of nearby Compton, said at the emotional assembly Monday night. More than 300 gathered for the meeting, organized by Rep. Maxine Waters (D) and including Jesse Jackson and a who's who of local African American politicians and clergy members.

Bell held a "Save King Drew" sign as she said that Harbor-UCLA Medical Center in Torrance -- the facility that probably will take over operations and offer services to be cut at King/Drew -- is too far from south-central Los Angeles.

"The people that come here are on Medicaid. They're on fixed incomes. How are they going to get to Torrance? They don't have transportation," she said.

Martin Luther King Jr./Charles R. Drew Medical Center administrators learned Sept. 22 that they had failed an inspection by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services in nine of 23 areas. As a result, the hospital will lose $200 million of its $380 million annual budget at the end of the year.

Failed inspections, mismanagement and well-publicized lapses in patient care have gradually built to a crescendo in the past 20 years. King/Drew has been out of compliance with Medicare standards since January 2004 and lost its national accreditation in early 2005.

Its trauma center was closed in 2004, dealing a blow to community pride and further diminishing emergency care in Los Angeles County, where nine emergency rooms and trauma centers have closed in the past five years.

DOJ_NMG_0074812

County Supervisor Yvonne B. Burke, whose district includes King/Drew, said at a Board of Supervisors meeting Tuesday that she is disappointed the hospital will lose funding but hopes a plan to provide different specialty services at each of the county's five hospitals will bring stability to the health-care system.

"We're the safety net, and as much as I wish this hadn't come about in this way, I believe we're moving forward," Burke said.

For the activists who met in Watts the night before, though, losing services and control of the hospital looked more like a move backward.

"We fought real hard to get this in 1965. I remember the Watts riots," Bell said. "I hope we don't have to do that again."

Despite the protests, the Board of Supervisors voted unanimously to approved the outlines of a plan to hand over management of the hospital to Harbor-UCLA Medical Center and drastically reduce services at King/Drew.

The board directed Bruce A. Chernof, the Department of Health Services chief, to return in two weeks with a more detailed plan.

Although the hospital's most vocal supporters and management have always been African American, the Watts neighborhood has transformed since King/Drew opened. Today, 70 percent of the hospital's patients are Latinos.

Arturo Ybarra, director of the Watts/Century Latino Organization, a local group that assists immigrants and fosters ties with the black community, attended Monday's meeting and said afterward he was frustrated that prominent Latino politicians have not rallied around King/Drew the way black politicians have.

"In general, the Latino community in this area is deeply concerned over what is going on at King/Drew Medical Center," he said.

"This is not a matter of ethnic groups. This is not a matter of who is involved or not involved in political activism. It is a matter of essential need."

Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Sidley Austin Case (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 4, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court has denied Sidley Austin's petition for writ of certiorari in the age discrimination suit being brought against the firm by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The firm, which is facing allegations it demoted 31 partners in 1999 on the basis of age, had argued for the suit's dismissal on the grounds the EEOC had no authority to seek monetary damages. But that motion was denied by both the Chicago district court hearing the case and the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals based on the Supreme Court's 2002 ruling in EEOC v. Waffle House, 534 US 279, which said the agency had a statutory right to seek damages separate from any individual's right.

The agency must still show that federal age discrimination law applies to law firm partners who have traditionally been considered employers exempt from such laws. The agency has argued that Sidley's centralized management structure rendered most of its partners employees.

ANTITRUST:

Judge Denies Motion To Dismiss DOJ Lawsuit Against NAR (INMAN)

Inman News, October 4, 2006

A U.S. District Court judge has denied a motion by the National Association of Realtors trade group to dismiss an antitrust lawsuit filed last year by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Justice Department officials charge in the lawsuit that the Realtor group has adopted overly restrictive policies for the online display and sharing of property listings information. The trade group had sought in a December court filing to dismiss the federal government's case, disputing several aspects of the lawsuit.

Mark Filip, a U.S. District Court judge for the Northern District of Illinois, wrote in a Sept. 28 court notice that a status conference will be held Oct. 30, and a detailed opinion about the court's denial of the motion to dismiss the lawsuit will be distributed to both parties on or before that day.

Laurie Janik, general counsel for the National Association of Realtors, said of the judge's decision, "We're not surprised but we're disappointed." Janik today said the association has not yet received the full opinion of the judge in denying the lawsuit's dismissal. "We're looking forward to the written opinion so that we can learn from that."

Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said, "We're pleased the court denied NAR's motion to dismiss the case and we're looking forward to moving ahead with our case."

DOJ_NMG_0074813

According to a July 11 court document, the Justice Department will "disclose in writing the MLS (multiple listing service) areas from which it intends to draw evidence to prove anticompetitive effects" in the lawsuit by Oct. 16. Earlier this year, Janik announced that at least 14 MLSs had received subpoenas from the Justice Department relating to the agency's lawsuit against the trade group. The MLS of Northern Illinois, one of the largest Realtor-operated MLSs in the country, was among those MLSs that received a subpoena.

The National Association of Realtors will disclose its "pro-competitive justifications" for its challenged Internet policies "along with a list of the MLS areas for which it intends to present evidence" by April 15, according to the court document, and the evidence-gathering period for these items will close June 15, according to the document.

While representatives for the Justice Department and National Association of Realtors met in a settlement conference on March 22, a court document on April 20 states that the parties reported "several key impediments to settlement."

After filing an initial antitrust complaint against the Realtor association in September 2005, the Justice Department submitted an amended complaint the following month. The initial complaint charged that a Virtual Office Web site (VOW) policy adopted by the Realtor group contained anticompetitive provisions. In its request to dismiss the lawsuit, the association stated that it had withdrawn that VOW policy prior to the filing of the original complaint and put in place a new Internet Listings Display policy.

But the Justice Department, which had conducted a two-year probe of the association's VOW rules, charged in its amended complaint that the modified policy also is anticompetitive. After the amended complaint, the Realtor association advised Realtor-operated MLSs not to implement the ILD policy and advised MLSs not to enforce the disputed aspects of the VOW policy.

The association stated in its motion to dismiss the lawsuit that its VOW and ILD policies "impose no restraints whatsoever on any of NAR's members who would be subject to the policies if they were being enforced. They do not encourage NAR members to refuse to allow listings to be displayed on other brokers' Web sites."

While the policies did contain provisions that would allow MLS members to opt out from displaying listings on other MLS members' Web sites, "any decision to opt out is made unilaterally by listing brokers exercising their independent judgment," the association stated in court filings.

In a Feb. 6 court filing responding to the association's motion, the Justice Department stated that the trade group's arguments "all miss the mark," and "NAR's VOW policies constitute restraints of trade, despite NAR's protestations to the contrary, because they restrain competition in real estate markets, generally, and the behavior of multiple listing services and virtual office Web site operators, in particular."

FTC Approves Lockheed-Boeing Rocket Deal (AP)

By Stephen Manning, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Federal Trade Commission said Tuesday it has approved the joint venture between defense contractors Lockheed Martin Corp. and Boeing Co. to launch government satellites, lifting a final barrier to the long-delayed proposal.

While the commission concluded that the $1.06 billion partnership between the nation's two biggest defense firms could unfairly muscle out competitors, it said that concern was outweighed by the national security demands for a reliable and cheaper way to send military and other satellites into space.

The so-called United Launch Alliance, or ULA, was proposed in May 2005 to resolve a long-standing dispute between Lockheed and Boeing, then the two major suppliers of rockets for government launches.

It also came after Boeing was stripped of $1 billion in launch contracts and suspended for 20 months from launches by the Air Force after accusations that it used thousands of sensitive documents stolen from Lockheed to gain an edge in the bitter rivalry. Boeing later agreed to pay $615 million to end a Justice Department probe of the case.

The FTC decision "brings the ULA closer to the goal of meeting the government's need for reliable, lower-cost launch services for national security, civil and scientific payloads," Boeing spokesman Dan Beck said.

Lockheed spokesman Tom Jurkowsky, calling the decision good news, said the two companies still needed to complete reams of legal documents before the deal closes.

ULA will be a 50-50 venture between the two companies, each providing a $530.7 million stake. It is planned for Denver and would combine launch services for Boeing's Delta and Lockheed's Atlas rockets, known as expendable launch vehicles. The venture is expected to save about $150 million annually.

DOJ_NMG_0074814

The government already had few contractors to choose from. Maryland-based Lockheed and Chicago-based Boeing are the only domestic suppliers of medium to heavy rockets. California-based Northrop Grumman is the only other major competitor in the domestic space launch vehicle business, according to the FTC.

The FTC set conditions on the deal such as requiring ULA to not favor Lockheed and Boeing on issues such as who makes the satellites that are launched and other contracting issues. It also requires ULA to guard trade secrets closely.

Northrop said in a statement that it was still reviewing the FTC decision. The California rocket company SpaceX, which had sued to try to stop ULA, said the FTC appeared to only protect large companies like Northrop.

"It appears to do very little to ensure free and fair competition in the launch vehicle market," said Elon Musk, SpaceX CEO.

The commission voted 5-0 to approve the venture, which will now be open for public comment for 30 days before it becomes permanent.

The FTC appeared to be swayed by arguments from the Defense Department that the single launch provider was needed even though it would cut competition. In an August letter to the commission, Undersecretary of Defense for Acquisitions Kenneth Krieg said ULA would launch satellites for tasks such as guiding missiles to targets. He said two types of rockets were needed in case one failed.

"The national security advantages of ULA are paramount to the Department's support of this transaction," Krieg wrote.

But a month earlier, Michael Moiseyev, the assistant director of the FTC's bureau of competition, wrote in a letter to the Pentagon that "a consolidation of the only two market participants would create a durable monopoly." He also challenged whether the government would actually benefit from the $150 million the companies claim ULA will save.

In a separate statement released Tuesday with the FTC decision, Commissioner Pamela Jones Harbour deferred to the Pentagon while expressing concern about the anticompetitive nature of the deal.

Associated Press writer Matthew Daly contributed to this report.

FTC Approves Lockheed-Boeing Rocket Launch Venture (MRKTWTCH)

By Laura Mandaro

Market Watch, October 4, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Staunch rivals Lockheed Martin Corp. and Boeing Co. said on Tuesday that the Federal Trade Commission signed off on a venture to jointly launch government satellites, the final step in a lengthy approval process.

The two largest U.S. defense contractors had announced their $1.06 billion venture about 17 months ago, touting the $150 million in annual cost savings the partnership would bring to the U.S. government.

But the anti-trust agency's concerns that Lockheed (LMT: news, board) and Boeing (BA: news, board) would dominate the market for medium-to-heavy government rocket launches stalled formation of the venture, named the United Launch Alliance.

On Tuesday, the FTC said that it had voted to approve the ULA by a 5-0 vote after discussions with the Department of Defense, which concluded that the benefits to national security by providing reliable launch services outweighed concerns about less competition.

"The Commission's proposed consent order does not attempt to remedy the loss of direct competition," said the FTC, because the Defense Department concluded the joint venture "would improve national security and that the unique national security benefits from the joint venture would exceed any anticompetitive harm," the FTC said in a statement.

To settle the FTC's charges, the agency stipulated that the ULA not give an unfair advantage to the space vehicle businesses of its parent companies during the Defense Department's space vehicle procurement process. And Boeing's and Lockheed's space vehicle businesses must provide equal consideration to all launch service providers when bidding for contracts to put satellites in orbit, it said.

The order will be subject to public comment until Oct. 31, at which point FTC will decide whether to make it final.

Lockheed said the FTC's action will allow it to finalize closing documents and work toward setting a closing date.

The two companies have also agreed to dismiss civil litigation against each other related to previous competition for launches, Lockheed said.

They'll headquarter the ULA in Denver, with most engineering and administrative activities consolidated at Lockheed's facilities and major assembly operations based at Boeing's plant in Decatur, Alabama. They will use facilities at Cape Canaveral Air Force Station in Florida and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California to launch the Boeing Delta and Lockheed Martin Atlas rockets.

Michael Gass, vice president and general manager of Lockheed Martin Space Transportation, will become ULA president and CEO. Dan Collins, vice president of Boeing Expendable Launch Systems, will serve as chief operating officer.

Lockheed shares fell 0.17% to $86.80 on Tuesday. Boeing gained 2.3% to $81.78.

Laura Mandaro is a reporter for MarketWatch in San Francisco.

Critics Say Smithfield Merger Would Unfairly Fatten Pork Producer (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, October 4, 2006

Smithfield Foods Inc.'s effort to digest a rival pork producer has become a food fight, as a coalition of consumer and farming organizations are begging the Department of Justice to scrutinize the deal for antitrust concerns.

Regulators in Washington have historically had problems when dealing with large agricultural mergers, and they seem to have a full plate with this one, since legislators on Capitol Hill have already announced a desire to hold hearings on the deal.

Smithfield, the nation's largest producer of pork, agreed to pay some $810 million for Premium Standard Farms Inc., the nation's second-largest pork producer and sixth-largest pork processor.

The coalition, which includes the National Farmers Union and the Consumer Federation of America, says the deal will further consolidate the market for pork, making it more difficult for small family farms to sell their hogs.

In their press release announcing the deal Sept. 18, the companies said that after the merger Smithfield will honor all existing contracts and is "committed to purchasing significant numbers of hogs on the open market."

But that promise doesn't provide much solace to the deal's opponents. In their letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, they wrote, "Ensuring that livestock markets operate in a free, fair and transparent manner is critical to our nation's agriculture economy. Without such open and competitive markets, independent producers cannot survive and consumers lose."

Moreover, they said pork is not the only issue for regulators to consider. Cattle, too, will be affected. "Last year, a ContiGroup [Cos.] subsidiary, ContiBeef, merged with MF Cattle Feeding Inc. -- a subsidiary of Smithfield Foods Inc., to form a joint alliance in the cattle feeding business," the letter stated. "We believe the proposed Smithfield-Premium Standard Farms hog acquisition will have a direct impact on the issue of concentration in the cattle industry."

In addition to that deal, Smithfield also recently agreed to pay $575 million for ConAgra Foods Inc.'s branded meats business, which includes, Armour, Margherita and a handful of other brands. That deal, expected to close "during its fiscal second quarter which ends October 29, 2006," according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, will give an even bigger boost to the company.

The acquisitions, when final, would put all phases of the beef and pork industry under Smithfield's control, from production of live cattle and hogs, through processing and into American supermarkets under the well-known ConAgra brands.

Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, chairman of the Senate committee with antitrust oversight, last week said he plans to hold hearings on the proposed merger between Smithfield and Premium Standard Farms. He, too, warned of the problems the nation faces if family farms are hurt by consolidating meat processing concerns. "Consumers will certainly be affected by the deal. We will need to scrutinize this deal very carefully," DeWine said.

The uproar is reminiscent of protests from Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, and others on Capitol Hill in 2003 when the Justice Department permitted Smithfield and Cargill Inc., another agricultural conglomerate, to participate in a bankruptcy auction for Farmland Industries Inc. Smithfield ultimately acquired Farmland's pork division for $457 million.

Wright Bill May Take Effect Quickly (DMN)

By Emily Ramshaw, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, October 4, 2006

Dallas, Fort Worth mayors are waiting for Bush to sign measure

The mayors of Dallas and Fort Worth joined key North Texas lawmakers Tuesday to celebrate Congress' repeal of the Wright amendment, calling it nothing short of a miracle.

They vowed to move forward quickly with the terms of the agreement – brokered in June after months of negotiations between the two cities, Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, American Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Co. – as soon as President Bush signs the measure.

LOUIS DeLUCA/DMN Dallas Mayor Laura Miller and Fort Worth Mayor Mike Moncrief spoke Tuesday at D/FW Airport. Not everyone is pleased about the Wright bill. Dallas is facing lawsuits over it.

"For too long, we've tussled over that problem," Mayor Laura Miller said of the Dallas Love Field flight restrictions, speaking at a news conference in the D terminal at D/FW Airport. "It's nice to heal old wounds."

Congress approved legislation to phase out the long-debated flight restrictions at Love late last week, just hours before lawmakers' pre-election recess.

The measure is "sitting on the president's desk," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said at the news conference, and could be signed in as few as 10 days.

DOJ_NMG_0074816

"It took all weekend for me to come back to earth," Ms. Hutchison said, recalling her glee Friday night as she watched the vote board "light up with all those green lights."

"This was truly Team North Texas," she said.

City officials said that once the bill is signed, they'll get down to business again: with major renovations at Love Field and with eminent domain proceedings to seize the former Legend Airlines terminal gates slated for demolition.

Under the agreement, gates at the inner-city airport would be reduced from 32 to 20. The agreement would allow immediate through-ticketing from Love with a stop in the nine-state Wright perimeter – and full repeal in 2014.

But Dallas faces an uphill legal battle, one that appears to grow by the week.

Love Terminal Partners, which holds the lease at the vacant Legend terminal, has filed three lawsuits against the city, alleging anti-trust and open meetings law violations. The group's attorneys say they'll fight to block the city if it begins condemnation proceedings before a court ruling.

"I think it's a bad bill, and I'm proud of my clients for hanging in there," said Bill Brewer, a Dallas lawyer representing Love Terminal Partners. "It's good for the consumers, and it's good for us if we maintain the facility."

Ms. Hutchison, who asked the mayors of Dallas and Fort Worth to craft a local solution to the Wright amendment early this year, said such lawsuits are to be expected.

"I feel sure there will be lawsuits," she said.

Dallas officials, meanwhile, call the suits frivolous.

Ms. Miller said Tuesday that eminent domain proceedings at the Legend terminal will begin "very, very soon" and that she had already spoken with the city manager and city attorney about it.

She also said that plans for Love Field renovations are already in the works and that city officials will sit down with Southwest "the minute the bill gets signed." No architect or designer has been chosen for the project, which, under the agreement, must be complete within eight years.

"Where we are is a very good place," Ms. Miller said.

Court Blocks Injunction On U.S. Sales Of EchoStar DVRs (WSJ)

By Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

A federal appeals court stayed a permanent injunction that prevented EchoStar Communications Corp. from selling its digital-video-recorder models in the U.S. The stay blocks the injunction, pending appeal of a patent-litigation dispute between EchoStar and TiVo Inc.

The companies' DVR technology records television programs digitally. In April, a Texas jury found that EchoStar had infringed upon a TiVo patent in making its own set-top box with DVR capabilities.

A judge subsequently ordered EchoStar to pay $89.6 million in damages and ordered EchoStar to stop selling and turn off about four million of its DVRs. The stay blocks that order.

Intel Could Face EU Antitrust Case (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby, Adam Cohen And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

European Union investigators believe they have enough evidence to pursue formal antitrust charges against Intel Corp., a critical step in their five-year probe of the computer-chip maker, according to two people with knowledge of the case.

Investigators for the European Commission in Brussels have prepared a written draft of charges against Intel and are gearing up to defend their conclusions before an internal "devil's advocate" panel of legal experts, the people with knowledge of the probe said. Such panels are convened in high-profile antitrust cases to explore possible weaknesses in investigators' arguments and to offer advice.

After that process, a report will be sent to European antitrust chief Neelie Kroes, who will make a final decision, likely before the end of the year, on whether to issue formal charges against the Santa Clara, Calif., chip maker. If Ms. Kroes decides to proceed, her staff would send Intel a formal "statement of objections" describing how the EU believes Intel broke its antitrust laws.

Intel would then get two months to issue a written response. The company also would have the right to argue its case before a closed-door hearing of regulators in Brussels. If Ms. Kroes decides that Intel broke EU antitrust laws, she could fine the company and order it to change its business practices.

DOJ_NMG_0074817

Intel competitor Advanced Micro Devices Inc. of the U.S. has told regulators that its bigger rival has unfairly abused its position as the world's dominant supplier of computer chips to muscle AMD out of new markets. In July 2005, the EU searched Intel offices in Europe, seizing documents that investigators are now using to bolster their case against Intel.

Investigators have been examining a variety of Intel's practices, including giving rebates to computer makers and retailers that stock products made with Intel chips. "Our view is that the allegations from AMD are wrong. Our business practices are both fair and lawful," said Intel spokesman Chuck Mulloy.

AMD counters that it has struggled to get computer makers to switch to its chips due to Intel's practices. Thomas McCoy, the chip maker's executive vice president for legal affairs, said in a recent interview that Intel uses "false rebates schemes and the threat of price increases" to persuade computer makers like Hewlett-Packard Corp. and Dell Inc. to use its chips.

A spokeswoman for H-P declined to comment, and Dell couldn't be reached to comment.

Mr. McCoy said that in the past, when AMD's market share has risen above 20%, Intel has retaliated by demanding that computer makers ratchet up the share of its chips in their products or lose hefty rebates.

A spokesman for the EU, Jonathan Todd, declined to comment.

South Korea is also probing Intel for possible antitrust violations. U.S. regulators, however, haven't pursued antitrust action against Intel since the 1990s.

The more adversarial legal culture in the U.S. enables companies to pursue grievances in court that are more often left to governments abroad. AMD, for example, filed an antitrust lawsuit against Intel in federal court in Delaware last year.

That lawsuit is pending, although a judge recently dismissed portions of the case that dealt with Intel's conduct outside the U.S., ruling that a federal court didn't have such jurisdiction. AMD is asking the judge to reconsider that ruling.

Europe Is Said To Be Close To Pressing Intel Case (NYT)

By Paul Meller

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

BRUSSELS, Oct. 3 — European officials investigating the chip maker Intel have presented what they say they believe is a watertight argument for pursuing antitrust charges to an internal panel of so-called devil's advocates, a person briefed on the investigation said late Tuesday.

The move by antitrust officials is seen as an indication that the case is strong enough to proceed.

The panel was recently introduced into the review process to prevent poorly prepared antitrust cases from becoming formal legal proceedings.

The European Commission has been investigating Intel for five years.

With about an 80 percent share of the global computer chip market, Intel dwarfs its nearest rival, Advanced Micro Devices, which accounts for most of the remaining chip sales.

Officials from Intel and the European Commission were not immediately available to comment.

A.M.D.'s executive vice president for legal affairs, Thomas M. McCoy, said recently in an interview that he was confident the European Commission would move to stop Intel from abusing its dominance in the market.

"The Intel investigation is coming to a close," he said, adding that he was confident it would result in Neelie Kroes, the European competition commissioner, issuing a charge sheet, known as a statement of objections, to the company.

Mr. McCoy said he was optimistic that Ms. Kroes would move ahead with a lawsuit "because she is independent from political pressure; both Intel and A.M.D. are big employers in Europe; and because, unlike other antitrust cases, there are no complicated intellectual property issues at stake in this case."

Last year, the European Commission made surprise visits to Intel offices in Europe, confiscating documents in an effort to find evidence of illegal behavior.

Last month, the European Commission took over a separate investigation by German antitrust officials into claims that Intel was forcing Europe's biggest computer retailer, Media Markt, to stock only computers fitted with Intel chips.

Consumer groups have told regulators that computer buyers are getting fewer choices as a result of Intel's tactics, which reportedly include granting rebates in return for loyalty from PC makers.

The devil's advocate panel includes the chief economist of the commission's competition departments, Damien Neven, along with colleagues in the department who are not involved in the Intel case.

If the panel supports the draft case against Intel, the investigating team will propose that Ms. Kroes issue a statement of objections to the company for the first time in the five years it has spent investigating Intel.

Wisconsin Stem-Cell Patents To Be Reviewed (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0074818

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

MADISON, Wis. -- The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office will re-examine patents covering embryonic stem-cell discoveries made by University of Wisconsin researchers.

The decision means the office could revoke, modify or leave intact patents that cover all embryonic stem-cell research in the U.S. But any such action could be months to several years away.

Critics say the patents are too restrictive and have been impeding the field. The patent office is acting in response to challenges brought by two groups who contend the patents should never have been issued because other researchers paved the way for the breakthroughs.

The patents cover research by University of Wisconsin-Madison scientist James Thomson and his colleagues, who were the first to grow and isolate human embryonic stem cells in 1998. The federal agency issued the patents to the Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation, the university's patenting arm, in 1998, 2001 and 2006. If allowed to stand, the patents are expected to eventually create a windfall of royalties for the school.

"This decision does not come as a surprise," said Beth Donley, special counsel to the research foundation.

Media Ownership Rules Reviewed, And Tense Fight Is Likely Brewing (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

LOS ANGELES -- Community activists, lawyers, students and hundreds of others turned out to oppose what they see as growing media concentration in the U.S., the first in a series of Federal Communications Commission field hearings aimed at updating the nation's media ownership caps.

If the four-hour session held in a packed conference room in a university basement here is any indication of future hearings, it is promising to once again be a contentious process.

In some ways, it was almost more notable for who didn't show up than who did. Not a single top executive from any of the major media companies testified at the hearing to lift the ownership caps, while opponents including Hollywood unions and the Rev. Jesse Jackson appeared to testify or give their opinion in five-minutes or less.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has made little secret of his desire to loosen the restrictions, particularly to dump cross-ownership limits barring media companies from owning newspapers and television stations in most markets. He argues they aren't needed now because of the media diversity offered by the Internet and the explosion of cable and satellite television or radio programming.

"We need to develop a rule for cross-ownership that reflects current market characteristics, including the struggling nature of today's newspaper industry," Mr. Martin said. "We must also recognize ... that some of our rules have not been updated for years and may no longer reflect the current marketplace."

It has been three years since the FCC last tried to rewrite the nation's ownership rules, which raised the national cap on how many television stations a single company could own, loosened radio ownership limits and allowed more cross-ownership of newspapers and broadcast stations.

Amid a public outcry, Congress stepped in to slightly increase the national television ownership limit, but the FCC's other rules were essentially tossed out by a federal court, which argued the commission didn't justify its changes and told it to try again. Three years later, the FCC is beginning that effort, though the media market has changed significantly.

This time, major media companies haven't been pushing as actively for the FCC to ease the rules that would allow them to expand and buy more newspapers or broadcast stations in the smae markets. Indeed, a growing number of companies -- notably Tribune Co. -- appear to be heading in the opposite direction.

Media activists, however, appear to have picked up where they left off a few years ago, bombarding the FCC with emails and packing public hearings like the one held yesterday at the University of Southern California campus.

"Is American radio better today than it was 10 years ago?" asked Mike Mills, the bass player for the band R.E.M., urging the FCC to tighten -- not loosen -- national radio ownership limits.

"No!" yelled the crowd.

Complaints about job cuts in newsrooms and less local programming on radio and broadcast television stations dominated yesterday's hearing, as the audience clamored for more local ownership. "People feel proprietary about their airwaves and they don't like the way they're being used," said Michael Copps, a Democratic FCC commissioner.

Indeed, some media activists were expressing cautious hope yesterday that if Congress changes hands in November, Democratic lawmakers might be able to put pressure on the Republican-controlled FCC to actually tighten some rules, instead of loosening them. The president appoints FCC members, although the FCC listens closely to what congress says.

DOJ_NMG_0074819

Academy Award-winning director Taylor Hackford, for example, was among the union leaders asking the FCC to impose new rules on media companies, specifically to require television networks to use independently produced programs for 25% of their prime-time lineups.

Security Software Makers Upset Over Windows Vista (NYT)

By Steve Lohr

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

Leading security software companies, including Symantec and McAfee, are publicly pressing their concerns that Microsoft's new Windows Vista operating system hinders them and steers users to Microsoft's security offerings.

The security software makers have not made any antitrust complaints, but they have talked to authorities at the European Commission and to the technical committee that oversees Microsoft's antitrust settlement with the Justice Department, executives at the companies said yesterday.

In Europe, F-Secure, a Finnish security software company, has joined American companies in criticizing the design of Windows Vista, which is scheduled to be available to business customers in November and to consumers in January.

The issues raised by the companies, in interviews yesterday, touch on broad themes of consumer choice and innovations that surfaced in previous antitrust suits against Microsoft.

"We're trying to make sure that consumers have choice in security software and that future innovation is not prohibited in a Microsoft world," said Enrique T. Salem, group president for consumer products and services at Symantec.

Microsoft says that it has made changes in Vista from previous versions of Windows, such as not allowing anyone to fiddle with the core, or kernel, of the operating system. Such changes, Microsoft insists, were made to cope with the proliferation of Internet-borne viruses and other malicious software. Most software vandals aim at Microsoft's desktop products, especially Windows, which runs on more than 90 percent of the world's personal computers.

With Vista, Microsoft will be entering the $4.4 billion-a-year market for desktop security software — and compete for the first time with companies like Symantec and McAfee. Microsoft insists there will be plenty of opportunity for the security specialists, but the company is taking responsibility for a basic level of security software that is included in Windows.

The shift, said Ben Fathi, Microsoft's corporate vice president for security, is not an anticompetitive step but merely a response to customers' pleas "to provide them a more secure, stable and reliable computing experience on Windows."

"It's our way of improving the health of the machine," Mr. Fathi said.

Symantec and McAfee, Mr. Fathi said, are the largest of 150 security software companies that Microsoft deals with. They are the most vocal, he said, because they have the largest vested interest in "the old way of doing things," which is inherently less secure.

"They need to continue to innovate as well," he said.

The dispute between the security software companies and Microsoft has been brewing for more than a year, and negotiations are at an impasse. The security companies' talks with regulators in Europe and the court-appointed technical committee in the United States go back months.

But now, with Vista shipping soon, the companies are emphatically making their complaints public. On Monday, McAfee took a full-page advertisement in The Financial Times in the form of a letter to "computer users around the world" under the headline, "Microsoft Increasing Security Risk with Vista."

In an interview yesterday, George Samenuk, chief executive of McAfee, pointed to two design features in Vista that he said undermined rivals and led users to Microsoft's security software.

First, Mr. Samenuk said, denying outside software companies access to the Windows kernel — access permitted in earlier versions of Windows and other operating systems — would make it more difficult to develop innovative security products.

Second, he said Vista would direct users to a Microsoft security console — an on-screen dashboard called Windows Security Center — that could not easily be shut off and replaced with security consoles from other suppliers. "These are two major steps backward for security and for customers," Mr. Samenuk said.

The security companies say they want an easier way for users to switch off Microsoft's security console, and a way to provide security software companies authenticated access to the Vista kernel while keeping software vandals out. The kernel lockdown applies only to the more powerful 64-bit versions of Vista, which will gradually take over from today's 32-bit standard.

Microsoft, industry analysts say, seems to have adopted a draconian approach.

"They are removing choice in the name of security," said Neil MacDonald, an analyst at Gartner, a technology research firm. "There ought to be a mechanism for introducing trusted code into the kernel. It should be doable."

Even security companies that are working closely with Microsoft — and not publicly criticizing the company — have their doubts about Microsoft's decision to prevent all outsiders from dipping deep into the Vista operating system.

DOJ_NMG_0074820

Trend Micro, a security software maker, collaborates with Microsoft, including supplying the virus-scanning software for Hotmail, Microsoft's Web-based e-mail.

Lane Bess, general manager for consumer products and services for Trend Micro, said he shared some of the concerns expressed by Symantec and McAfee.

"But we try to work through any issues we have with Microsoft," Mr. Bess said, "not by taking a shot across the company's bow and suggesting that there might be antitrust action later."

Trend Micro's concern, he said, is the possibility that limiting access to the Vista kernel could limit the diversity of security-protection tools to fight malicious software.

"I'm not sure that a company that has had as much trouble securing its users from malware as Microsoft should be going it alone," he said.

ENVIRONMENT:

Hastert Way Ahead Of The Story (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Some lawmakers pay a lot of attention to their Web sites. Others less so. Up until just the other day -- sources say Monday -- House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert 's site was highlighting an Aug. 29 news release about how "Hastert Drives Effort to 'Keep Kids Safe in Cyberspace.' "

Seems Hastert had put together a meeting at a high school in his Illinois district featuring law enforcement officials, Internet experts and parents "to share information and insights on protecting children from Online predators."

"Recent news stories remind us that there are predators using the Internet to target children," Hastert is quoted as saying. "And just as we warn our children about 'stranger danger' when they are at the park or answering the door or telephone, we need to be aware of potential dangers in Cyberspace." And of even greater dangers in the House of Representatives.

But the lead news item on Hastert's home page now is about an effort by the Potawatomi tribe to run a bingo operation in Shabbona, Ill. The headline: "Hastert: Gaming in Shabbona a Long Way From Reality," in part because the tribe hasn't even gotten recognition from the federal government that the proposed site is a reservation.At Interior, Surfin' USA

Speaking of sex -- the topic du jour in Washington -- the Interior Department's inspector general has uncovered an impressive amount of time spent by department employees surfing porn, game, gambling and shopping Web sites.

"Our review of one week of computer use logs revealed over 4,732 log entries relating to sexually explicit and gambling websites" by department computers, said IG Earl E. Devaney 's report -- titled "Excessive Indulgences."

"More alarming," the report said, "was our finding regarding access to on-line game and auction websites: we discovered over 1 million log entries where 7,763 department computer users spent over 2,004 hours accessing game and auction sites during that same week." In a year, "these veritable shopping and gaming binges could account for 104,221 hours of lost productivity," equaling the amount of yearly work time put in by 50 employees.

But it's likely worse, the report continued. "We believe that our estimates of inappropriate use activity are conservative, particularly the amount of time spent at pornographic and/or sexually explicit websites."

No doubt. And auction and shopping "binges" are nothing in August, when Devaney did his review, compared with what they'd be during the Christmas shopping season.

This Internet use costs taxpayers more than $2 million in lost wages, the report said. (Officials yesterday were not sure how the 80,000-employee department compared with other agencies.)

Department filters "provide some level of protection" but don't fully block the prohibited sites," the report said. In a "spot check" in August, "we were able to access sexually explicit photographs at several agencies in the department," including the National Park Service and other agencies that don't even have blocking software.

Devaney urged the department to plug the gaps in enforcement and improve blocking software. He also said a better job needs to be done to ensure violators are "held accountable for their actions."

Accountable? In Washington?Predictions?

Foleygate could be a problem for Republican candidates on Nov. 7, possibly costing them seats. Loop Fans may want to take that into account when they submit their entries to the In the Loop Congressional Election Contest! Send your prediction of the number of R's and D's in the Senate and the House to intheloop@washpost.com . You must include your home, work or cellphone number. Entries must be submitted by midnight Oct. 10. The 10 participants closest to the results will receive a mention in the column and highly coveted "In the Loop" T-shirts.

DOJ_NMG_0074821

Long Beach Closes Beaches (LAT)

By Nancy Wride, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

Swimming is banned after bacteria levels surge. Health officials say the source may have been sewage from an RV or a passing boat.

Long Beach has closed three connected waterfront areas to swimming because of high bacteria levels, probably from human waste, and city health officials said Tuesday that the contamination will keep ocean water off-limits at least through today.

Marine Stadium and Mother's Beach — both popular sites for boaters and picnicking families, the latter featuring a waterfront playground — were closed Friday after routine testing revealed unsafe levels of E. coli at Mother's, said Dr. Darryl Sexton, the city's health officer.

Colorado Lagoon has been closed for the same reason since Sept. 14, said Sexton, adding that the health risk at all three sites is limited to contact with the water.

The lagoon is the farthest inland and connected by a culvert to Marine Stadium, which is adjacent to Mother's Beach.

Having all three closed at once, said Sexton, "really is unusual."

By midday Tuesday, he said, investigations showed no sign of a spill or break in the storm drain systems of the city or of Los Angeles County. The storm drains can overflow into channels feeding into the sea, contaminating nearby beaches, but that usually happens during heavy rains.

Sexton said the original bacteria test at the lagoon indicated animal waste as the likely source of contamination. But testing at all three locations Friday indicated human waste as the source — most likely from the holding tank of a boat or recreational vehicle driven into a beach parking lot, he said.

Because it does not receive adequate tidal flushing to churn out accumulated bacteria, the lagoon has had chronically high bacteria counts, although not always forcing closure. The lagoon also has a waterfront playground and picnic sites.

Officials in Los Angeles and Long Beach say preliminary investigations show no sign of a sewage system breakdown. The affected waterways are sheltered from the open ocean, and Sexton ruled out any large-scale dumping by a passing ship.

Along Long Beach's seven miles of beach Tuesday, the affected areas were marked with warning signs, alerting the public to the health risk. When a beach fails to meet state standards for bacteria levels, ocean water contact should be avoided for at least 50 feet on either side of a sign, according to the city's website, http://www.longbeach.gov .

The beach itself is not unsafe when such signs are posted, and the sand can be used for sunbathing or playing, health officials said. It is swimming or other contact with the bacteria-bearing ocean water that poses potential risk.

Ocean water is tested weekly year-round at beaches where swimming and other recreation are common, and monthly in other locations such as marinas. Once bacteria is found, water testing continues daily until safe levels of bacteria are restored for two full days.

*

nancy.wride@latimes.com

Letters (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

Upstream Battle to Save the Salmon

Your recent article "Inside the Failure of $8 Billion Effort to Save Prized Fish" (page one, Sept. 19), describing efforts to recover threatened and endangered Pacific Northwest salmon, makes clear what an enormously complex task we have in rebuilding fish populations. From the perspective of the federal agencies with key roles in achieving recovery of these fish, the region has made very positive strides and steady progress over the past 25 years. Between 2001 and 2004, we have seen substantial increases in 11 of 13 Columbia Basin salmon and steelhead listed as threatened or endangered. In addition, the past five years have seen the highest returns of spring, summer and fall chinook salmon since we began record-keeping more than 60 years ago.

While ocean conditions have a tremendous influence on salmon populations, a great deal of credit also goes to improvements that provide safer and quicker salmon passage at Columbia and Snake River dams, improvements in spawning and rearing habitat, predator control and improved hatchery and harvest management. These programs are designed and carried out by a multitude of federal agencies, states, local governments and tribes throughout the Pacific Northwest.

Today, adult salmon and steelhead passing upriver through the eight-dam Columbia and Snake River hydro system survive at levels equivalent to pre-dam conditions. And juvenile salmon passing downriver through the dams are moving more quickly and safely because of new fish passage devices we've installed at two lower Snake River dams and one dam on the Columbia River. More dams are scheduled to receive similar devices. Our job isn't done, but tremendous progress has been made.

DOJ_NMG_0074822

Bob Lohn
Northwest Regional Director
NOAA Fisheries
Seattle

(The letter is also signed by Karen Durham-Aguilera, director of Programs, Northwestern Division, U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, and Steve Wright, administrator, Bonneville Power Administration, Portland, Ore.)

Your article is right about the failure of the Bonneville Power Administration to restore Northwest salmon, but it's misleading about the causes for the decline and the reasons Bonneville has failed. Rather than make the difficult decisions that scientists say have the greatest likelihood of success, Bonneville has instead relied on half-hearted, over-engineered fixes that never get to the root of the problem, which is that the salmon no longer have a living river to traverse in their journeys to and from the Pacific Ocean. For Snake River salmon, eight dams, including four dams on the lower Snake River, and eight slack-water reservoirs stand between their spawning grounds in Idaho and the ocean. On top of that, almost 80% of the juvenile salmon begin their lives in hatcheries and prepare for their epic journey by swimming endless circles in concrete raceways.

If there is a model for restoring salmon, it is the last remaining free-flowing undammed stretch of the Columbia River that flows past the Hanford Nuclear Reservation. Above four dams, it nevertheless supports a strong run of wild chinook salmon that are caught in significant numbers by fishermen from Alaska to the Columbia River itself. Scientists overwhelmingly tell us that breaching the four lower Snake River dams and focusing on wild salmon instead of inferior hatchery fish are the answers to restoring the once great salmon runs. Unfortunately, lack of vision and political courage continue to result in billions more wasted on ever more complex engineering fixes and hi-tech fish tracking gizmos, which sadly serve mainly to chronicle the slow decline of these magnificent fish toward extinction.

Jeff Curtis
Pacific Salmon Director
Trout Unlimited
Portland, Ore.

Martha Euthanized After Injury (WP)

By Sandhya Somashekhar
The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Martha the bald eagle, whose struggle to recover from an attack by a rival and return to longtime mate George generated national headlines, was euthanized yesterday afternoon at a bird rehabilitation center in Delaware. She was at least 13 years old.

The beloved bird of prey was found Friday with a dislocated elbow in her right wing, a serious injury because of the strength and flexibility required to fly, specialists said. They speculate that she flew into a tree branch or power line during a recent storm.

Veterinarians who examined her determined that her injuries were so severe and had been left untended for so long that she would never fly again and that as a wild creature who spent her life in the trees, she could not flourish in captivity.

"George and Martha were mascots, if you will, of the Wilson Bridge Project, so it is a really sad day for the project," said John Undeland, a spokesman for the Woodrow Wilson Bridge expansion.

George and Martha, who were named by bridge workers, had lived on Rosalie Island on the Maryland side of the bridge since the 1990s. Together, they produced 16 eaglets that helped bolster the region's eagle population.

George has recently been spotted in the area, and it is believed that the two were still "bonded" when Martha's accident occurred.

Bridge workers had become accustomed to the birds' presence, watching in awe as they fished, soared and raised their young.

"Big tough crane operators, concrete guys, everybody just looked for the eagles," said Jim Nichols, a tugboat operator for one of the project's contractors.

The pair's story captured national attention in April, when Martha was attacked by a rival female whom some workers have labeled "Charlotte the harlot."

While George protected the eggs, Martha engaged in a midair battle that left her broken and bloodied. Bridge workers shooed away the intruder and whisked the injured bird to Tri-State Bird Rescue and Research in Delaware, where she recovered in a few weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0074823

A short while after she was released into the wild in Delaware, the nation cheered to learn that she had made her way back to the nest and to George.

On Friday, workers at the nearby National Harbor project noticed an eagle flapping and hopping around in a field. It was Martha, who was quickly returned to the Delaware center.

Veterinarians considered sending Martha to Minnesota for an operation. But surgeons would have had to break the bones and fuse them, rendering her unable to fly, bridge officials said.

Martha's remains will be sent to a U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service facility in Colorado, where they will be given to researchers, American Indians or others who hold permits to possess eagle remains.

Washington Wire (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

October 3, 2006, 8:04 pm

Hastert Says Resignation Wouldn't Help Party

Hastert

Amid new signs that Republicans' political woes are deepening, House Speaker Dennis Hastert rejected conservative calls for his resignation over the Mark Foley-congressional page scandal. But for the first time, there appears to be a real chance the Illinois Republican could opt to step down after next month's election even if his party retains power.

In an interview late Tuesday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert said he would be willing to resign if he thought it would help the party but isn't convinced this is the case. "If I thought it would help the party, I would consider it, but I think just the opposite," he said.

Any abrupt departure could disrupt the rest of the leadership in the final weeks of the campaign. And one of the Republicans' weaknesses now is they have no clear transition figure. If the party were to lose power, Hastert is already expected to step out of the leadership. He said Tuesday that if the party retains power, it is still his intention to run for speaker in the next Congress but "you have to count the votes." Read the full article. – David Rogers

Earlier in WashWire: WSJ/NBC News Poll Shows Slip Among Voters for Bush, Republicans

WSJ.com Question of the Day: Should Dennis Hastert resign as House Speaker because of his handling of the Foley scandal?

Read more: Global, Congress

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 6:38 pm

What to Do With Foley's $2.8 Million

A new report from the Center for Responsive Politics shows that former Rep. Mark Foley has nearly $2.8 million in his campaign committee. The nonpartisan center, which tracks campaign contributions, also said that Foley's campaign and political action committee have contributed about $190,000 to more than 100 other Republicans since 1995, and has donated $550,000 to House Republicans' campaign committee.

Races facing voters in Foley's district in Florida

The center points out that Foley, whose sexually explicit computer messages to teenage congressional pages prompted his resignation Friday and left Republican leaders trying to contain the fallout, has a number of options when it comes to disbursing the $2.8 million. He could donate it to political party committees on the local, state or national levels, or to candidates, within federal limits. Or it could be returned to the donors or given to charity. Yet another option, according to the center: "Foley could argue to the Federal Election Commission that his remaining cash should go toward his legal bills, which could be substantial as the FBI investigates whether his behavior violates any of the child exploitation laws that Foley championed in Congress."

While lawmakers can use campaign funds to cover the expenses of holding office, "the connection between Foley's official duties and his behavior with former pages is tenuous. The FEC has allowed candidates to defend themselves from legal issues that could affect their campaigns, but Foley's political career is almost certainly over."

Graphic: A look at the issues and matchups in nine congressional districts from Las Vegas to Seattle — to Foley's district in Florida.

Read more: Global, Congress, Campaign Journal

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 6:30 pm

WSJ/NBC Poll: Iraq, Scandal Hit Bush, Republicans

President Bush and his party have lost the political initiative at a critical point in the midterm election campaign, according to a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll. The survey — taken as Americans focused on the House sex scandal and the war in Iraq — shows voters less favorable toward continued Republican control of Congress. It also shows a decline in President Bush's job approval rating to 39% from 42% earlier this month. Read more on the poll.

DOJ_NMG_0074824

Graphic: Bush's approval ratings across multiple polls

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006

Permalink | Comments (3) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 6:30 pm

Blame Canada (Drugs) No More

Under pressure from Congress, U.S. Customs and Border Protection scrapped its 11-month-old policy of seizing prescription drugs imported through the mail from Canada. The practice, implemented last November, had come under fire from congressmen from both parties for depriving tens of thousands of American seniors of their drugs and protecting the high prices charged by pharmaceutical companies in the U.S. At the behest of Sen. Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs was investigating the new Customs policy. Read the full article. – John Carreyrou

Read more: Global, Domestic Policy, Business

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 6:09 pm

Foley's Lawyer Cites Past Abuse – of Foley

Rep. Mark Foley's attorney, David Roth, said the disgraced congressman "never any inappropriate sexual contact with a minor" and blamed his behavior, including the sexually explicit computer messages that led to his resignation Friday, on Foley's abuse as a teenager.

Foley

Roth said that between the ages of 13 and 15, Foley was molested by a clergyman, something Foley kept to himself though he had sought treatment in the past. This time, Foley will remain in treatment this time for at least 30 days, beginning last Sunday when he checked into a rehab clinic. The attorney refused to name the clergyman or his religious affiliation. "Finally," Roth said, wrapping up his prepared statement before taking questions, "Mark Foley wants you to know he is a gay man."

Read more: Global, Congress

Permalink | Comments (13) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 4:01 pm

Bush Visits George W. Bush Elementary

The White House was worried enough about the scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley to schedule a surprise stop for President Bush at a school, and not just any school – but one named for him, the George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton, Calif. It's believed to be the first public school named for a sitting president.

"Frankly I was a little emotional when I pulled in" and saw his name outside the door, Bush said at a brief appearance. Of the library, named for Laura Bush, he added, "It's just a blessing to be there." (Read Bush's full remarks.)

Bush, in town for a fund-raiser for Rep. Richard Pombo, went on to say he was "dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior" in sending sexually explicit computer messages to teenage male congressional pages. Bush added that he was "disgusted by the revelations and disappointed that he would violate the trust of the citizens who placed him in office." At the same time, he offered a vote of confidence for embattled House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

The president also noted that he had instructed federal officials to search for a response to the recent spate of school violence, capped by the shootings at a one-room schoolhouse in Amish country near Lancaster, Pa. Coincidentally, Stockton was the scene of a 1989 school shooting in which a mentally ill man with a semi-automatic rifle opened fire on a playground killing five children and wounding 29 others and a teacher. – John D. McKinnon

Read more: Global, Domestic Policy

Permalink | Comments (1) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 2:56 pm

North Korea Musical Draws Stellar Audience, Concerns

A host of senior Bush administration officials have confirmed their attendance at Wednesday's Washington opening of "Yoduk Story," a musical set in North Korea's notorious prison camp. But Christopher Hill, the U.S.'s current point man on nuclear talks with Pyongyang, isn't among them, according to event planners.

South Korean officials have voiced their concerns in recent months that the nearly three-hour play, which graphically depicts rape and torture inside North Korea's gulag, could only further exacerbate tensions with Pyongyang's leadership. North Korea announced today that it was preparing to conduct its first nuclear test in response to what it says is Washington's "threat of a nuclear war and sanctions."

Among those who'll be in attendance, according to event planners, are Jay Lefkowitz, President Bush's special envoy on North Korean human rights; Sandy Vershbow, U.S. ambassador to South Korea; Richard Lawless, deputy undersecretary of defense for Asia-Pacific affairs; and Barry Lowenkron, assistant secretary of State for democracy, human rights and labor. –Jay Solomon

Recent Article: New Script on North Korea? (09/30/06)

DOJ_NMG_0074825

Read more: Global, Foreign Policy

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 11:58 am

Fishing for Support

President Bush was sounding environmentally friendly themes today as he ordered U.S. diplomats to push for a global ban on deep sea trawling and signed the Partners for Fish and Wildlife Act.

The practice of deep-sea trawling, a bottom-scraping fishing technique, is destroying coral reefs, sponges and other habitat for many species of fish and other sea life. In a statement, the White House said it supports preparations for a United Nations ban on fishing, which may come before the General Assembly next month.

The move was hailed by scientists and conservation groups. "This could be the single most important action in protecting marine habitat in history," said Josh Reichert, environmental director for the Pew Charitable Trust, which has been one of the leading groups calling for a ban on the high seas, an unregulated area that covers about 67% of the world's oceans. Spain, Russian and Japan are the leaders in deep sea trawling, which uses heavy steel-reinforced nets to drag the ocean bottom. One of the main targets of the fishing boats is orange roughy, a commercial fish that sometimes schools on undersea mountain tops that are raked by the nets.

The White House announcement came as Bush, in California for a series of political fund-raisers, signed the fish and wildlife bill, which helps landowners rehab and manage habitats on their property. It was sponsored by House Resources Chairman Richard Pombo, who often opposes environmental measures. Pombo hosted Bush at a fund-raising breakfast expected to collect $400,000. – John J. Fialka

Read more: Global, White House, Business

Permalink | Comments | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 10:59 am

Republican Leaders Fight Back in Foley Case

After a blunt call from the conservative Washington Times to step down as House speaker, Rep. Dennis Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner are going on conservative radio shows to get out their message that they weren't aware of the sexually explicit instant messages involving former Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley and male congressional pages.

Foley

Hastert, meantime, rejected this morning's Washington Times editorial, that "House Speaker Dennis Hastert must do the only right thing, and resign his speakership at once." The Times went on to say that "Either he was grossly negligent for not taking the red flags fully into account and ordering a swift investigation, for not even remembering the order of events leading up to last week's revelations — or he deliberately looked the other way in hopes that a brewing scandal would simply blow away. …Mr. Hastert has forfeited the confidence of the public and his party, and he cannot preside over the necessary coming investigation, an investigation that must examine his own inept performance."

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean responded that Hastert "has and will lead the Republican conference to another majority in the 110th Congress," according to the AP. On Sean Hannity's radio show yesterday, Boehner suggested the investigation should focus on who knew about the explicit instant messages. "That is the real issue here," he said. On WLW in Cincinnati this morning, Boehner pointed his finger at Hastert: "It's in his corner, it's his responsibility," he said.

The FBI has begun its investigation, interviewing former pages. Foley resigned on Friday and checked into an alcoholic rehab program over the weekend.

Update: President Bush, in California on a political fund-raising swing, praised Hastert as a "father, teacher, coach," and said he is confident Hastert "will provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement in this investigation." Bush spoke in the courtyard of the George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton.

Read more: Global, Campaign 2006, Congress

Permalink | Comments (15) | Trackbacks October 3, 2006, 8:25 am

Scandal May Alienate GOP Blocs

The Foley page scandal means Republicans have new reason to worry about two key constituencies: Christian conservatives and suburban soccer moms.

Conservatives are already turned off by high federal spending, illegal immigration and inaction on a number of social issues. Suburbanites, meanwhile, complain of a party agenda that is too beholden to the conservatives on issues such as federal funding for stem-cell research. Now the Foley fallout has united both Republican voter groups in anger.

"It's one of the worst congressional scandals ever. A top House Republican who denounced sex predators as 'animals' stands accused of acting like one," Cliff Kincaid, editor of the conservative Accuracy in Media Report, wrote in an editorial circulated by the pro-Republican Web site GOPUSA.com.

DOJ_NMG_0074826

"I think there's more pain to come" for Republicans, says party pollster Tony Fabrizio. With clients among House, Senate and gubernatorial candidates in places such as suburban Philadelphia and swing-state Minnesota, he adds, "I'm very much watching how these things play out."

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win a House majority and six seats in the Senate. Read the full article. – Jackie Calmes

Interactive Graphic: Look at local issues facing voters in nine congressional districts nationwide - from southern Connecticut to suburban Seattle to Mark Foley's Florida district.

Sigourney Weaver Seeks Ban To Destructive Fishing Practice (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

(AP) - UNITED NATIONS-Sigourney Weaver urged U.N. members on Tuesday to impose a moratorium on a destructive fishing practice called high-seas bottom trawling, warning that the world's oceans are at risk.

Weaver, appearing with several environmental activists and U.N. ambassadors, said that new technology has brought remote and fragile ecosystems within the reach of bottom-trawlers, which rake giant nets equipped with wheels, chains and metal doors across the sea floor to scoop up fish.

"The high seas belong to no single country and they most certainly do not belong to the owners of these large industrial fishing corporations," Weaver said. "They belong to all of us and it is time for us to take them back."

Starting Wednesday, the 192-member U.N. General Assembly will meet to discuss whether to impose a moratorium on bottom-trawling. Environmental groups say the practice is killing little-known coral ecosystems and the species that dwell in them, and must be suspended so the remote areas can be studied.

In 2004, the General Assembly passed a nonbinding resolution urging nations to consider temporary bans on bottom trawling. Japan, Iceland, Spain and other nations whose fishing fleets do much of the world's bottom trawling opposed a larger moratorium.

Weaver, an animal-rights and endangered species activist, said people should not assume that the U.N. is doing something to protect deep-sea ecosystems or that the world's oceans will be safe.

She appealed to ambassadors to "stop this uncontrolled clear-cutting of ancient corals."

"Do the right thing for the seas and for future generations both human and aquatic who will thrive on the bounty of the oceans if given half a chance," Weaver said.

Weaver's screen credits include the "Alien" movies, "Gorillas in the Mist" and "The Ice Storm."

A Better Diesel (NYT)

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

When Europeans think of diesel, they think of the very cars — small and smart — that half of them are driving now. When Americans think of diesel, they think of semis and buses and pickups and, perhaps, one of the lumbering Oldsmobiles that did so much in the 1980's to poison the promise of diesel technology here. Europeans and Americans differ in almost nothing more than they differ in diesel, including different emissions standards and different fuel quality. But in the next few years, as the rules on air quality tighten, Americans need a diesel engine that can meet the stricter standards.

Diesel engines offer more torque and greater fuel efficiency than gasoline engines, and they emit less carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas. The drawback is that they also emit more particulate matter and nitrogen oxide, which contributes to smog. Honda recently unveiled a new engine that solves that problem, using a special catalytic converter that turns harmful nitrogen oxide into simple nitrogen. Honda plans to introduce this engine in the United States in 2009, which just might give us time to improve the poor quality fuel that keeps diesels here from being as clean and as popular as they could be.

It's always tempting to hope for a futuristic solution — like the new fuel-cell car Honda also demonstrated the other day — for the very immediate problems of auto emissions and fuel efficiency. But the answer is going to lie in a mix of vehicles — hybrid cars, more efficient gasoline engines, and highly improved diesels. The answer is also going to come from recognizing that strict limits on emissions and mileage penalize only those companies that are too sluggish to compete.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Agents Arrest 15 In Raids On Major Marijuana Club (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074827

Federal agents went after a major Bay Area marijuana club Tuesday, raiding eight locations in San Francisco and Oakland, arresting 15 people including the group's leader and seizing nearly 13,000 plants.

The target of the raids, which prompted swift criticism from some medical marijuana advocates, was New Remedies Cooperative and its 36-year-old leader, Sparky Rose. The San Francisco resident is well-known in medical-marijuana circles and has been under investigation for several months.

The group, formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers, ran a dispensary in the Mission District, a pair of cultivation warehouses on Polk and Tennessee streets, and a temporary-employment agency for pot growers called Potent Employment Solutions, said Javier Peña, who heads the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Francisco office.

Rose, whose convertible Porsche Carrera was one of four cars seized by federal agents, was arrested at his home on suspicion of conspiring to distribute marijuana and laundering proceeds, Pena said. In addition to the plants, federal agents seized $125,000 in cash Tuesday.

"Make no mistake, the defendants were in the business of dealing dope," Peña said in an interview. "They were using the pot clubs as facades to make millions of dollars. We're trying to show the public these aren't for the sick or ill. (The goal) is to pocket drug proceeds."

The raids prompted a group of protesters to gather outside the New Remedies club on Mission Street near 14th Street, where federal agents used sledge hammers to break up ATM machines inside the business. Authorities said marijuana was being grown inside the dispensary, one of an estimated 30 to 40 medical-marijuana clubs in San Francisco.

Representatives of the New Remedies Cooperative and Rose were unavailable for comment. But other advocates of the medicinal use of marijuana said the raids were uncalled for.

"This is an outrageous waste of resources," said Shona Gochenaur of Axis of Love San Francisco, a medical marijuana advocacy group.

San Francisco Supervisor Chris Daly said he was concerned about a raft of recent federal raids on pot clubs in Northern California.

"Generally speaking," Daly said, "swooping in is not helpful in terms of the safe distribution of medical cannabis to those who need it."

Under Proposition 215, passed by state voters in 1996, it is legal in California to use medicinal marijuana with the recommendation of a doctor. Federal anti-drug laws, however, contain no such exemption for cannabis. Drug Enforcement Administration spokeswoman Casey McHenry said Tuesday that "everyone that sells marijuana or cultivates marijuana is at risk."

New Remedies continued to operate even though the government moved in November to seize $1.5 million in assets, records show. The company, which has operated more than a half-dozen storefronts around the state as a nonprofit enterprise, bought marijuana from growers and distributed it from Oakland by courier vans, the government alleged in that civil action.

Prosecutors said the club's patients were given the names of doctors willing to prescribe medical marijuana and would then receive a prescription without being given a physical examination. One doctor saw 49 patients in one day, at $150 each, prosecutors said.

Besides Rose, those arrested Tuesday were James Daley, 56, and Sean Anderson, 22, of San Francisco; Johnny Seto, 32, Mark Miller, 53, and Tracy Smith, 32, of Alameda; Kevin Ellis, 28, and Jason Matthewson, 29, of Pinole; Alfaro Munoz-Bebullida, 33, and Steven Navarro, 35, of Richmond; Mistalee Chiame Wang, 25, and Jaime Perreira, 26, of San Leandro; Ben Blair, 31, of San Pablo; Irene Matsuoka, 27, of Crockett; and Amber Froiness, 26, of Berkeley.

Feds Launch Crackdown Against Area Pot Dispensaries (BCNS)

Bay City News Service, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Federal authorities raided eight different Bay Area locations Tuesday associated with growing, prescribing and dispensing medical marijuana, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Drug enforcement agents and federal police seized 12,743 plants, more than $125,000 in cash, cars, computers and manicured marijuana from at least eight locations, five in San Francisco and three in Oakland, all associated with New Remedies Cooperative and Potent Employment Solutions.

Sparky Rose, the executive director of the organizations, was one of 15 people arrested. All are expected to be arraigned Wednesday in federal court.

The raids were a collaborated effort by at least three different federal agencies. The sheriff's offices of both Mendocino and Santa Clara counties also helped in the investigation, which culminated in the raid of dispensaries, grow sites, at least one personal residence, administrative offices and a storage area.

DOJ_NMG_0074828

At 1760 Mission St., federal police and drug enforcement agents boxed up marijuana and hashish inside a medical-marijuana dispensary that also served as a grow site.

The raid started at noon and went on for an hour as federal agents used a sledgehammer to pound open two automated teller machines inside the front office.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan was at the scene but left around 12:30 p.m. DEA Special Agent in Charge Javier Pena said at the time that the raid was part of a "large-scale trafficking" operation and part of an ongoing investigation.

Outside, at least 20 protesters marched with colorful signs and chanted, "DEA, go away" and "patients rights."

Shona Gochenaur, executive director of Axis of Love San Francisco, said several of the people arrested were patients.

"This is despicable and atrocious," Gochenaur said. "I saw them take out an elderly man who was shaking."

Three San Francisco police officers and a sergeant were at the scene of the Mission Street raid to provide a "safety zone" for the federal agents.

Several blocks away in the Potrero Hill neighborhood, another operation was also underway at 790 Tennessee St. Federal agents were inside the warehouse until at least 2 p.m.

Also in Oakland at least two people were taken away in handcuffs from an administrative office located at 1710 Franklin, According to Dolphin, who also said all three locations were affiliated with New Remedies, which was formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers.

DEA spokeswoman Casey McEnry said she did not know of any patients under arrest. She also said the search warrants are sealed and she could not release any more information on specific locations targeted.

Javier Pena, who directed the raid, said the people arrested Tuesday are nothing but drug dealers, in the business to make money.

"Federal drug laws prohibit the cultivation and sale of marijuana." Pena said in a statement. "Anyone who breaks these laws to run a lucrative drug trade, buy fancy cars, boost their bank accounts, and exploit vulnerable citizens is not compassionate, they're criminal."

Computers, Boxes Labeled `MJ' Seized In S.F. Pot Clinic Raid (BCNS)

Bay City News Service, October 3, 2006

Federal police and drug enforcement agents loaded into a van computers, printers and boxes labeled ``MJ & Hash'' around 1 p.m. today after raiding a medical cannabis dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District.

According to a federal agent who did not give his name, but who drove away with U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, the raid was part of a ``large-scale trafficking'' operation and also part of an ongoing investigation.

Kevin Reed, the owner of the now-defunct Green Cross medical marijuana dispensary and who was at the raid, said that several patients were lined up and taken away in handcuffs.

``At least half of the dispensaries in San Francisco are closing down because of (this) raid,'' he said.

At least 20 protesters and members of the community stood outside and chanted ``DEA, go away!'' and ``Patients rights!'' outside the Mission Street facility.

San Francisco police officers stood outside the door to the dispensary to create a ``safety zone'' for the federal agents.

Copyright © 2006 by Bay City News, Inc. -- republication, re-transmission or reuse without the express written consent of Bay City News, Inc. is prohibited.

15 Arrested In Bay Area Pot Club Raids (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - Federal drug agents raided eight Bay Area locations connected to a medical marijuana club Tuesday and arrested 15 people, including the club's operator, authorities said.

The raids took place at buildings in San Francisco and Oakland belonging to New Remedies Cooperative LLC, formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers, and its temporary employment agency for pot growers, Potent Employment Solutions.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents confiscated 12,743 marijuana plants, computers, four vehicles and a total of $125,000 in cash and three bank accounts belonging to operator Sparky Rose, 36, and the two businesses, authorities said.

Medical marijuana advocates who witnessed some of the raids said agents targeted New Remedies' growing facility, administrative offices and the pot club itself located in San Francisco's Mission District.

"Obviously, the DEA is on a little bit of a rampage this week," said advocate William Dolphin, citing other pot club crackdowns in Granada Hills, San Fernando Valley and Modesto.

Rose and the 14 others arrested were scheduled to appear in court Wednesday.

Medical marijuana has been legal in California since voters approved Proposition 215 in 1996, but the drug remains illegal under federal law.

"Federal drug laws prohibit the cultivation and sale of marijuana. Anyone who breaks these laws to run a lucrative drug trade, buy fancy cars, boost their bank accounts, and exploit vulnerable citizens is not compassionate, they're criminal," DEA Special Agent in Charge Javier F. Pena said in a statement Tuesday.

There are currently an estimated 30 to 40 clubs in San Francisco, according to city officials.

Feds Raid Med Pot Club In S.F. Mission, Elsewhere (KPIX-TV)

KPIX-TV/BCN, October 4, 2006

(CBS 5 / BCN) SAN FRANCISCO Federal Drug Enforcement Agents said they raided a medical cannabis dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District Tuesday afternoon along with grow sites, homes, offices and storage areas in San Francisco and Oakland -- seizing thousands of marijuana plants, several cars, computers and large sums of cash.

Fifteen arrests also stemmed from the eight raids, five in San Francisco and three in Oakland, that took place around the noon hour -- the most notable of which occured at Mission Caregivers at 1756-1760 Mission Street in San Francisco.

Shona Gochenaur, executive director of Axis of Love San Francisco, said several patients were among those arrested and taken away in handcuffs.

"This is despicable and atrocious," Gochenaur said. "I saw them take out an elderly man who was shaking."

Kevin Reed, the owner of the now-defunct Green Cross medical marijuana dispensary and who was also at the Mission Caregivers site, claimed he too witnessed patients being arrested.

However, DEA spokeswoman Casey McEnry said she did not know of any patients placed under arrest.

Agents said among those arrested was Sparky Rose, 36, of San Francisco. Authorities said Rose owned and operated the Mission Caregivers dispensary, which also served as a grow site.

The dispensary raid lasted for about an hour as federal agents used a sledgehammer to pound open two automated teller machines inside the front office. The building was then padlocked by agents after they boxed up marijuana and hashish found inside.

Rose operated his medial cannabis business under the names New Remedies Cooperative LLC, Compassionate Caregivers and Potent Employment Solutions, according to federal authorities.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan maintained Rose ran a "large-scale trafficking" operation and said he was the target of a long-term investigation by the DEA.

At least 20 protestors and members of the community marched with colorful signs and chanted "DEA, go away!" and "Patients rights!" on the street outside Mission Caregivers as San Francisco police officers stood at the entrance to create a "safety zone" for the federal agents.

According Gochenaur, city supervisors Ross Mirkarimi and Chris Daly were among those who voiced support for the protestors.

Several blocks away in the Potrero Hill neighborhood, federal agents spent a couple hours inside a warehouse at 790 Tennessee Street that was said to belong to Rose.

"At least half of the dispensaries in San Francisco are closing down because of (this) raid," Reed said.

In Oakland, at least two people were observed being taken away in handcuffs from an administrative office at 1710 Franklin that agents said was connected to Rose's operations.

Despite California and San Francisco laws which allow for medical marijuana, the DEA defended the raids.

“Federal drug laws prohibit the cultivation and sale of marijuana. Anyone who breaks these laws to run a lucrative drug trade, buy fancy cars, boost their bank accounts, and exploit vulnerable citizens is not compassionate, they’re criminal,” said DEA Special Agent in Charge Javier F. Peña. “Make no mistake – these defendants were in the business of dealing drugs, and DEA is in the business of arresting drug dealers."

In all, authorities said they confiscated 12,743 marijuana plants, 4 vehicles including a Porsche Carrera convertible and a total of $125,000 in cash.

In addition to Rose, the others arrested on Tuesday included:

· Alfaro Munoz-Bebullida, 33, of Richmond
· Steven Navarro, 35, of Richmond
· Johnny Seto, 32, of Alameda
· Mark Miller, 53, of Alameda
· Tracy Smith, 32, of Alameda
· Mistalee Chiame Wang, 25, of San Leandro

DOJ_NMG_0074830

· Amber Froiness, 26, of Berkeley
· Jaime Perreira, 26, of San Leandro

All those arrested faced Wednesday appearances in federal court on charges related to the illegal distribution of marijuana, authorities said.

Feds Raid Medical Cannabis Dispensary In SF (KCBS)

KCBS, October 3, 2006

San Francisco, CA (KCBS) -- Federal police and drug enforcement agents raided a medical cannabis dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District Tuesday.

The raid took place at the New Remedies Cooperative. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration loaded into a van computers, printers and boxes around one p.m.

Showna Gochenaur, executive director of the medical marijuana advocacy group Axis of Love San Francisco was at the scene. She told KCBS' Henry Mulak, "almost every car that pulled up, there were more DEA agents."

"They've been here for over three hours," she said. "We saw them take out what looked to be an elderly patient in handcuffs."

Kevin Reed, the owner of the now-defunct Green Cross medical marijuana dispensary, was at the raid. He said several patients were lined up, cuffed, and taken away.

"At least half of the dispensaries in San Francisco are closing down because of (this) raid," he said.

According to a federal agent who did not give his name, but who drove away with U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, the raid was part of a "large-scale trafficking" operation and also part of an ongoing investigation.

At least twenty protestors and members of the community stood outside and chanted "DEA, go away!" and "Patients rights!" on the street outside Mission Caregivers, at 1756 Mission St.

San Francisco police officers stood outside the door to the dispensary to create a "safety zone" for the federal agents.

Reason Behind Record Pot Seizures A Mystery (KPIX)

KPIX-TV, October 3, 2006

(CBS 5) More marijuana has been seized in raids around the state so far this year than all of last year combined. And it's not over yet.

"We're expecting to be looking for growers and eradicating them all the way through November and possibly into December," said Serg Palanov of the Santa Clara County Sheriff's Office.

Most of the pot grown for sale in the US comes from the southeast and west, with California, alone, accounting for about a third of it. And within the state, national forest and county park lands see the greatest number of large scale outdoor farms.

But new indoor farms are on the rise. Drug agents say a San Francisco-based Asian crime syndicate is responsible for dozens of growing operations discovered in Sacramento area homes this summer. The DEA says Asian gangs are moving into the wholesale marijuana business in a big way.

A pound of domestic marijuana costs as little as $500 in Sacramento and as much as $6,000 dollars in San Jose, with the average price around $2,500 dollars. Mexican-grown pot prices average about a $1,000 a pound, but range from a low of $100 in Bakersfield to $1,400 in San Francisco.

Drug agents believe the big increase in seizures has reduced the supply on the street, but there is evidence a little pot is going a much longer way. Marijuana potency levels have nearly tripled over the past twenty years as cultivation techniques improved, rising from less than 3 percent of the active agent THC in 1985, to about 8 percent today.

Intense cultivation can bring the THC level to more than 20 percent, but big commercial growers find the effort to achieve that potency to be not cost effective.

Drug agents can only speculate why pot seizures have doubled in some counties this year. Better helicopter surviellence is one possibility. More tips is another.

"Our team has educated the public along with hunters and hikers on what to look for if they do see anything," Palanov said.

Chargers' Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Felony Drug Charges (KGTV)

KGTV, October 4, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- A Chargers player accused of shipping Codeine-based cough syrup by FedEx to his home state of Texas pleaded not guilty Tuesday to five felony drug charges.

Terrence Kiel, a 25-year-old safety for the San Diego team, faces a maximum of seven years and four months in state prison if convicted of all the charges, said Deputy District Attorney James Fontaine.

DOJ_NMG_0074831

Kiel, who is free on $160,000 bail, is charged with three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance and two counts of transporting a controlled substance.

The defendant -- dressed in a brown dress shirt and blue jeans – answered "yes" when Judge David Szumowski asked him if he waived his speedy trial rights so his preliminary hearing could be scheduled for Dec. 5.

A readiness conference was set for Nov. 14.

Defense attorney Bob Grimes said Kiel -- who did not suit up for the Chargers' loss at Baltimore last weekend -- is practicing with the team as it prepares for a game at Qualcomm Stadium on Sunday against the Pittsburgh Steelers.

A second-round draft pick out of Texas A&M in 2003, Kiel's official status with the team was not known.

He was arrested last Tuesday, after federal agents showed up at team practice and searched his car and locker.

On June 2, management at FedEx conducted an audit of a parcel that contained 15 vials of Prometh with Codeine, considered a controlled substance, according to a search warrant affidavit.

FedEx employees know Kiel because he makes shipments regularly using his FedEx account, according to the affidavit.

Although they gave DEA Special Agent Dean Henderson a general description of the shipper of the parcel, they couldn't positively identify him because it had been a month since the package had been sent.

On Sept. 21, the manager of a FedEx office called Henderson when Kiel shipped a parcel similar to the one shipped on June 2, this one containing three pints of Codeine, according to the affidavit.

The return address on the parcels showed an address on Santo Road, not Kiel's real address, and the return name on the shipping label was not the athlete's, the affidavit states.

Kiel paid cash to ship the parcel, even though he has an account with FedEx, according to the document.

Henderson said it is common for drug smugglers to use a different name than their own to avoid detection by law enforcement.

Bottles of Codeine-based cough syrup sell for up to $325 on the street in Texas, where people are known to mix the drug with soft drinks and refer to it as "lean," according to the DEA.

Both the June and September parcels were being shipped to Texas, where Kiel was previously arrested for aggravated assault on a public servant, theft and evading arrest, according to the affidavit.

Employees at FedEx copied the license plate of the vehicle Kiel was driving, and a DMV record check showed it was registered to the football player at a residence on Juneberry Court in San Diego, according to the affidavit.

Kiel admitted knowing that it was a controlled substance he was sending by FedEx, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

According to another search warrant affidavit, Henderson said he spoke with DEA drug diversion investigators who told him the bottles of Codeine in question contained numbers which indicated they came from a medical care facility and all indications were they were stolen or otherwise misappropriated.

The investigators told Henderson the Codeine in the bottles can only be legally distributed by prescription and a licensed provider would rarely prescribe a pint of the liquid but rather, it would be dispensed to patients in smaller prescription bottles, the affidavit states.

Fontaine said outside court that the amount of cough syrup with Codeine that Kiel allegedly shipped was not "personal-use quantities."

Kiel's case was the second headline-grabbing, off-the-field incident involving a Chargers player last month.

Linebacker Steve Foley was shot three times outside his Poway home Sept. 3 during a confrontation with an off-duty Coronado police officer. He will miss the entire season.

Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges (SDUT)

By By Brent Schrotenboer, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 3, 2006

Chargers safety Terrence Kiel pleaded not guilty in San Diego Superior court Tuesday to five felony charges involving the shipment and possession for sale of codeine-based cough syrup.

At Kiel's arraignment Tuesday, his trial readiness date was set for Nov. 14 and his preliminary hearing was set for Dec. 5.

Kiel, who is free on a $160,000 bond, was arrested last week after being accused of shipping the cough syrup, a controlled substance, to his native Texas.

The bottles of codeine in question “contain numbers which indicated they came from a medical care facility and all indications are they were stolen or otherwise misappropriated,” according to an affidavit signed by Dean Henderson, a special agent with the Drug Enforcement Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0074832

Kiel Back With Team; Drug Hearing Today (SDUT)

By Brent Schrotenboer, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 3, 2006

Chargers safety Terrence Kiel will plead not guilty today to five felony charges filed yesterday involving the shipment and possession of codeine-based cough syrup, his attorney said yesterday.

The San Diego County District Attorney yesterday filed two charges of transporting a controlled substance and three charges of possession for sale of a controlled substance against Kiel, who was arrested last week and is free on $160,000 bond.

Kiel's attorney, Bob Grimes, declined to comment on the merits or facts of the case except to say the bail was set at $160,000 only because a judge didn't yet have the opportunity to review which controlled substance was involved.

If a judge had been able to review that the case involved cough syrup and not cocaine, for example, “I think the bail would have been a lot lower,” Grimes said.

If convicted, Kiel, 25, could face five years in state prison. At his arraignment today in Superior Court, he will make his plea and court dates will be set. After starting the Chargers' first two games, Kiel did not play in Sunday's 16-13 loss at Baltimore.

Kiel returned to work with the team yesterday and is expected to resume practicing when the Chargers begin preparations tomorrow for Sunday's game against Pittsburgh. Kiel was paid for last week and will face no penalties from the team, according to General Manager A.J. Smith.

It is expected the league will refer Kiel to evaluation and possible counseling as part of its drug program.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents intercepted two FedEx packages containing 18 pint bottles full of the drug, plus more bottles in Kiel's Serra Mesa condo. The two packages each drew a charge of transporting a controlled substance and possession for sale. The bottles in his condo also drew a possession-for-sale charge.

Agents said a bottle of the cough syrup sells for up to $325 on the street in Texas, where the bottles were being shipped, and where it is popular to mix with soda to make a drink called “purple drank” or “lean.”

Kiel, who grew up in Lufkin, Texas, and played at Texas A&M, has faced financial difficulties in the past year, including a Sept. 7 notice of default seeking payment of $16,610 from a $591,634 mortgage.

Kiel is making $460,000 this season, his fourth in San Diego.

DEA spokesman Dan Simmons and prosecutor Damon Mosler said the investigation involved only Kiel.

“I have not heard at all that it goes beyond Terrence Kiel,” Simmons said.

One of the packages was addressed to a “Rick Jones” in Tyler, Texas, but it is not known whether that is the intended recipient's real name.

Chargers Safety Terrence Kiel Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) - Chargers safety Terrence Kiel pleaded not guilty on Tuesday to charges he shipped bottles of codeine-based cough syrup to Texas.

Kiel, 25, a starter with the Chargers, faces a maximum of seven years and four months in state prison if convicted of all five felony drug counts against him, according to Deputy District Attorney James Fontaine.

Kiel was arrested Sept. 26 in the locker room after authorities turned up at Chargers headquarters. Drug Enforcement Administration officials said Kiel admitted to shipping at least two parcels of prescription cough syrup to Texas via FedEx.

The agency has found widespread abuse in Texas of codeine-based cough syrup mixed with soft drinks or drugs and referred to as "lean."

Fontaine said the district attorney's office is still investigating where Kiel got the cough syrup.

Kiel's lawyer, Robert Grimes, said his client was cooperating with the investigation.

According to an affidavit for a search warrant, FedEx managers searched a package Kiel mailed with his FedEx account in June and found 15 bottles of Prometh prescription cough syrup in the box. A boarding pass found inside the box led DEA agents to an address Kiel used to register a car. Three bottles of Prometh were seized last week at that address.

Kiel paid cash to send a second package to Texas in September, prompting a FedEx manager to contact the DEA, according to the affidavit.

Kiel, free on $160,000 US bail, didn't accompany the team to its game in Baltimore last Sunday. His status for this Sunday's game against Pittsburgh hasn't been determined.

Kiel is making $500,000 this season, his fourth with the Chargers.

Bonds' Trainer Wants To Withdraw Plea (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds' personal trainer wants to withdraw his guilty plea because prosecutors based their steroid distribution case on an illegal recording, his lawyer said Tuesday in a court hearing.

Greg Anderson, who is jailed for refusing to testify before a grand jury probing whether Bonds committed perjury, already served a three-month prison sentence after pleading guilty to the steroid charge.

But attorney Mark Geragos said Tuesday that an illegal tape recording of Anderson was the basis for the federal case against him in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative scandal. A federal prosecutor acknowledged having a tape of Anderson discussing Bonds and undetectable performance-enhancing drugs at least a month before the trainer's guilty plea last year, but said Geragos' claims were "ludicrous and speculative."

"That's speculation by Mr. Geragos. He's wrong," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeff Nedrow.

The claim was the latest effort by Geragos to get a federal judge to free Anderson, who is being held for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating whether Bonds lied when he told a grand jury in 2003 that he never knowingly used steroids.

Anderson served three months in prison and three months of home confinement after pleading guilty to distributing steroids and laundering money in the BALCO case. He served 15 days in prison in July for refusing to testify to a grand jury about Bonds, and was jailed again Aug. 28 for refusing to testify before a new grand jury.

Authorities have refused to release the tape to Anderson. Nedrow maintained Tuesday that the recording was legal and said he first learned of it in 2004 from the San Francisco Chronicle.

Nedrow said prosecutors didn't get access to the tape until a month before Anderson's plea deal. But Geragos suspects investigators had it all along and used the tape as an illegal roadmap to build a case against Anderson.

It has not been publicly revealed who made the recording. The government said the recording was made of a face-to-face conversation, while Anderson suspects it was made of a telephone call.

On the tape, according to the Chronicle, Anderson said: "The whole thing is, everything I've been doing, it's all undetectable. The stuff I have, we created it. You can't buy it anywhere else, you can't get it anywhere else."

Four other men also have pleaded guilty in the BALCO scandal for participating in the distribution or manufacturing of undetectable steroids to elite athletes.

Geragos said authorities only recently revealed the tape so they could build a perjury case against Bonds.

"The strategy is a perjury trap, obviously," Geragos said.

Geragos did not say when he would seek to withdraw Anderson's plea.

U.S. District Judge William Alsup, who jailed Anderson a month ago for refusing to cooperate, said the tape is "as worthless a piece of evidence as I've ever seen."

An unshaven Anderson, who was in court wearing brown jail garb, contends he should be released and should not have to testify in front of the Bonds grand jury for the same reasons he should be allowed to withdraw his plea in the BALCO case.

Anderson could remain at the Federal Correctional Institution in Dublin, near San Francisco, for more than a year if he continues his refusal to testify.

Latinos Debate Forming Regional Force (AP)

By Julie Watson, The Associated Press

AP, October 3, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Latin American defense ministers debated forming a regional peacekeeping force Tuesday, while the top U.S. defense official urged nations at a hemispheric conference to work together to combat drug trafficking and terrorism.

Guatemalan Defense Minister Gen. Francisco Bermudez said the ministers discussed forming a regional force for international peacekeeping missions and disaster relief.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez has proposed members of the Mercosur trade bloc _ Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Paraguay _ link their militaries to guarantee the region's security.

Chavez has been lobbying for allies to counterbalance what he says is U.S. domination in the region.

Bermudez said the force would be to help the United Nations in peacekeeping and in "no moment have we talked about creating another force for other means."

"We believe that we can support, as a region, the strengthening of world peace, democracy and respect for human rights, as our fundamental mission," Bermudez said. Guatemala already has 218 soldiers in Congo, Haiti, Burundi and other countries on humanitarian missions.

The debate came during a gathering of defense ministers from more than 30 Latin American and Caribbean nations at the seventh Western Hemisphere's Defense Ministers Conference, which ends Wednesday.

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld stressed the importance of regional cooperation at a news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0074834

"Almost every problem we face is a problem that cannot be solved by a single nation. Whether it's counternarcotics or gangs or hostage taking or counterterrorism, all of those problems require very close cooperation among nations, many nations," said Rumsfeld.

Coordinating efforts, Rumsfeld said, is vital to the drug war in Latin America, where smugglers migrate to other nations once there is a crackdown.

In the past few years, drug violence has spiraled throughout the region as gangs battle for routes left open following the arrests of top cartel leaders. Smugglers have turned more vicious in Mexico, where in Acapulco a half dozen police and rival smugglers have been beheaded. One head washed up near the tourist resort's popular beaches.

In Managua, Central American ministers said they asked Rumsfeld for more U.S. aid in their fight against Colombian and Mexican drug traffickers using their impoverished nations as a funnel for U.S.-bound shipments of cocaine and marijuana. A day before the ministers arrived for the conference Sunday, Nicaraguan officials seized 6,600 pounds of cocaine after a shootout on the Pacific coast, the country's largest drug seizure to date.

Bermudez said the region is trying to consolidate its efforts under a plan known as the Meso-American Strategy to combat organized crime.

IMMIGRATION:

Justices Hear Case On Immigrant Drug Offenders (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

The Bush administration urged the Supreme Court to declare that legal immigrants can be deported for drug offenses that are felonies in some states but only misdemeanors under federal law, as the court heard its first oral arguments of the new term yesterday.

At issue are provisions of the 1996 immigration law that require any noncitizen guilty of an "aggravated felony" to be sent back to his country of origin, with no chance to ask for leniency. The law defines "aggravated felony" to include any drug-trafficking offense that is a "felony punishable under" federal drug laws.

Federal appeals courts, however, have differed as to that language's precise meaning. Some have upheld deportations based on state felonies, such as simple drug possession, that would not be felonies under federal law.

The seemingly technical dispute could have real-world consequences for thousands of green-card holders. In 2005, the United States deported about 77,000 immigrants with criminal records, of whom about 9.5 percent had arrests for drug possession, according to the Justice Department.

A Justice Department lawyer, Edwin S. Kneedler, said the court should read the statute to require deportation for felony state drug-possession convictions.

"Because the petitioner's underlying conduct here was punishable under [federal law], and was a felony under state law, they were properly found to have committed aggravated felonies," he told the justices, according to a transcript of the argument released yesterday by the court.

It was the first time the court has released same-day transcripts of oral argument on its Web site, http://www.supremecourtus.gov , under a policy announced last month.

But several justices asked Kneedler whether that was a strained reading of the statute.

"[I]t must give you pause that your analysis is of a term, 'drug-trafficking crime' or 'illicit trafficking,' and your theory leads to the conclusion that simple possession equates with drug trafficking," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said.

Kneedler replied that "a lot of state statutes dealing with drugs do not, are not patterned directly after the federal statute, and there is no reason why Congress would have insisted that they do so in order for this statute to operate sensibly."

The case is an appeal by Jose Antonio Lopez, a Mexico native who entered the United States illegally 20 years ago to pick tomatoes. He became a legal resident in 1990 and later opened two small businesses in South Dakota.

In 1997, state prosecutors there indicted him on charges of cocaine distribution and of aiding and abetting cocaine possession. He pleaded guilty to the possession charge and served 15 months of a five-year sentence. Since his release from prison, federal authorities have been trying to deport him under the aggravated-felony law.

Lopez, who has a wife and two U.S.-citizen children, voluntarily left for Mexico earlier this year. But his case is not moot, because if he wins, he would be permitted to seek a cancellation of his deportation order and return legally to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0074835

Lopez's attorney, Robert A. Long Jr., told the court that the administration's position would undermine the uniformity of national immigration rules, because "what it is arguing is that states can banish noncitizens and can do so by enacting drug laws deciding to make a simple possession offense a felony."

Justices Ponder Conditions For Automatic Deportation (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — The intersection of federal criminal law and immigration law is a perilous place for the millions of legal residents of the United States who are not citizens: one slip, one criminal conviction, can mean deportation.

The justices of the Supreme Court struggled, during the first argument of their new term on Tuesday, to understand exactly how the two statutory frameworks intersect.

The question, posed by two separate cases that were consolidated for a single argument, was whether immigration officials can treat an immigrant's state-court conviction for possession of a small quantity of illegal drugs as an "aggravated felony" as long as the crime is considered a felony under the state law, even if federal law treats the same conduct as only a misdemeanor.

Conviction of an "aggravated felony" has dire consequences for a noncitizen, including automatic deportation without the usual rights of appeal and a permanent bar against returning to the United States.

Congress added the category of aggravated felony to federal immigration law in 1988, and it includes a number of specific offenses. Among them is a "drug trafficking crime" that in turn is defined as "any felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," the basic federal drug law. Does a particular drug crime that is a felony under the law of a state become a "felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," even if federal law would treat it only as a misdemeanor?

Although the government's position has shifted over time, its current view is that the answer is yes. The law of the "jurisdiction of conviction," Deputy Solicitor General Edwin S. Kneedler told the court, is what determines whether the crime is an aggravated felony.

Lawyers for two lawful permanent residents caught up in this statutory maze argued the opposite. "State felonies are not themselves punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," Robert A. Long Jr., representing José Antonio López, told the court. "It is not a federal crime to violate state law," he added.

Mr. López, a native of Mexico who became a permanent legal resident in 1990, pleaded guilty in a South Dakota court in 1997 to "aiding and abetting possession of cocaine," a felony under South Dakota law for which he served 15 months in prison. Under federal law, a first offense of possessing cocaine is a misdemeanor.

At the time, the Board of Immigration Appeals took the position that a drug crime that was not a federal felony could not be considered an "aggravated felony." While the non-aggravated-drug conviction made Mr. López deportable, it left officials with the discretion to treat him leniently, including granting him a "cancellation of removal."

But while his case was pending before an immigration judge, the Board of Immigration Appeals changed its position and ruled that a state-law drug felony was an aggravated felony. Mr. López lost his final appeal last year before the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis. He was deported to Mexico in January. His Supreme Court appeal is López v. Gonzales, No. 05-547.

The other case before the court, Toledo-Flores v. United States, No. 05-7664, was brought by another Mexican, Reymundo Toledo-Flores. He was convicted in Texas of possession of 0.16 grams of cocaine, less than six one-thousandths of an ounce, a felony under Texas law. He lost an appeal before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, and was deported in April.

As is often the case with questions of statutory interpretation, the argument on Tuesday was dense, dry and technical. But the human dilemmas created by the government's current interpretation have drawn considerable attention to the case.

Dozens of civil rights and criminal defense groups signed briefs on the immigrants' behalf, as did the American Bar Association and three men who served as general counsels of the Immigration and Naturalization Service under Presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush.

The former officials' brief said that "because the 'aggravated felony' categorization has such sweeping consequences and essentially eliminates the capacity of the immigration enforcement system to differentiate among individual circumstances," it should apply only when Congress has been completely clear.

Several justices found the language less than clear. Referring to the phrase "any felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," Justice Stephen G. Breyer said to Mr. Kneedler, the government's lawyer, "I could look at those words a thousand times and not have a clue" whether the law covers state felonies that are only federal misdemeanors.

DOJ_NMG_0074836

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg observed that "it seems to me unseemly" that "because of the happenstance of the states in which they were convicted," one immigrant could be "barred from ever coming back" while another who committed the identical offense would not be.

Mr. Long, the lawyer for Mr. López, agreed with the observation. He said the government's interpretation would permit individual states to "banish" immigrants by labeling minor offenses as felonies.

Part of the argument was spent debating whether, for technical reasons, Mr. Toledo-Flores's appeal was moot, as the government argued. His lawyer, Timothy Crooks, said the case was not moot because under the conditions of his "supervised release" in Mexico, Mr. Toledo-Flores must observe certain rules, including abstention from alcohol.

Justice Antonin Scalia replied that this was not a burden with sufficient real consequences to keep the case alive.

"Nobody thinks your client is really, you know, abstaining from tequila down in Mexico," Justice Scalia said.

Justices Open Term, Hear Case About Drugs, Deportation (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court heard its first arguments of the 2006-07 term on Tuesday in a spirited session that focused on whether foreigners who are in this country legally should be deported automatically if they are convicted of drug possession.

All of the justices except the typically silent Clarence Thomas jumped into the discussion, which revealed some of the ideological divisions on the nine-member court.

The case tests provisions of anti-drug and immigration laws and could have significant consequences for legal permanent residents, or "green card" holders, who are found guilty of relatively low-level crimes. If the justices rule that drug possession could amount to an "aggravated felony," it would cause many convicted immigrants to be routinely deported, and prevent them from appealing to an immigration judge.

Tuesday's dispute involves legal immigrants, but it arises against a backdrop of concern over policies related to border security and illegal immigration.

The question for the justices is whether a drug-possession offense that is a felony under state law but would be a misdemeanor under federal law rises to the level of illicit trafficking, making it an "aggravated felony" and requiring mandatory banishment for a legal immigrant who is not a U.S. citizen.

Jose Antonio Lopez, a Mexican national, was convicted in South Dakota of aiding and abetting possession of cocaine. Reymundo Toledo-Flores, also from Mexico, was convicted in Texas of possessing cocaine. Federal appeals courts ruled that their offenses could be considered aggravated felonies for deportation purposes, based on the respective states' laws. Other appeals courts, however, have ruled the opposite, saying that an offense qualifies as an "aggravated felony" only if it would be punishable as a felony under the federal Controlled Substances Act. Drug possession is a misdemeanor under the act.

Attorneys for Lopez and Toledo-Flores argued that Congress did not want possession of a drug to be regarded as an aggravated felony for deportation purposes. They stressed the importance of uniform standards tied to federal law, rather than to state codes that would cause some legal immigrants who had committed the same offenses to be automatically deported in some states, but not in others.

Deputy U.S. Solicitor General Edwin Kneedler argued that Congress intended "any felony" to trigger the automatic deportation provision, whether under state or federal law. He said Congress sought to cover large categories of state criminal conduct.

The court's more liberal justices appeared most skeptical of that argument.

"It seems to me unseemly in the immigration context," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said, "to say that two people who have committed the identical act" can be treated differently "because of the happenstance of the states in which they were convicted."

Justice David Souter questioned whether Congress would have written laws that classified drug possession as a misdemeanor, but then allowed it to be termed an "aggravated felony" for deportations. "The problem here is that state and federal laws are at odds on determining the gravity of the offense," he said.

The court's newest conservative justices, Chief Justice John Roberts and Samuel Alito, joined Justice Antonin Scalia in appearing most sympathetic to the government's position.

Roberts suggested by his questions that the automatic deportation provision could be triggered by state or federal felonies. Alito, beginning his first full term on the bench, said Congress could have wanted the term "illicit trafficking" broadly interpreted "so that it can include mere possession offenses."

Scalia's Tequila Remark Launches New Term (CNN)

DOJ_NMG_0074837

By Bill Mears, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Justice Antonin Scalia opened the Supreme Court's new term Tuesday by questioning whether a man deported to Mexico after a drug conviction would be "abstaining from tequila" for fear of violating his U.S. parole terms.

The remark came as justices heard an immigration case involving a Texas man, Reymundo Toledo-Flores, who was deported in April after being convicted of illegally entering the United States.

At the time, Toledo-Flores was under supervised release, a form of parole, for a 2002 cocaine possession conviction. He served seven months in a Texas prison on that charge and was deported after serving his time.

Attorney Timothy Crooks argued to the justices that his client's supervised-release terms left him under U.S. jurisdiction even while on Mexican soil, technically leaving him vulnerable to deportation back to the United States if he violated his parole.

Scalia responded with incredulity.

"No one thinks your client is abstaining from tequila for fear of being deported," he said. Supervision "is impossible once he leaves the country," he added. "This is an ingenious exercise of the conceivable."

Neither Crooks nor the other justices reacted visibly to Scalia's remarks, and there was no immediate reaction from immigrant rights activists, many of whom were in the courtroom.Other justices skeptical

Several colleagues, including Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice David Souter, were equally skeptical of Crook's arguments. Souter noted that Toledo-Flores "would have to violate the law by reentering the U.S." to face any penalty.

Scalia's remarks and actions have provoked controversy in the past.

In March, he made an Italian hand gesture when confronted by a reporter outside a Boston church. Some interpreted him as using his middle finger, which he did not, but both gestures are considered vulgar in some quarters.

The 70-year-old jurist refused to recuse himself from a case involving Vice President Dick Cheney, despite going duck hunting with the vice president in 2003 when the court was considering an appeal involving Cheney's energy task force.

And he told a 1996 audience that many Christians in the United States attract the "scorn of the sophisticated world" for believing in religious miracles.

Scalia had a man who was heckling him removed during a 2004 speech in Washington. That same year, a U.S. marshal guarding the justice confiscated a reporter's tape recorder and erased comments made at a Mississippi school. The Justice Department found the marshal had violated the law, and Scalia apologized, but denied ordering seizure of the device.

Tuesday's arguments came in appeals by Toledo-Flores and another man, Jose Lopez, who is facing deportation after a 1997 conviction for aiding and abetting the possession of cocaine in South Dakota. State, federal conflict

Their cases highlight a conflict between state and federal laws over the seriousness of drug crimes involving immigrants. (Case summary)

Lopez entered the United States illegally in 1985 and later gained permanent residency. He and his wife, a legal resident, have two children, both U.S. citizens. He was ordered deported in 1998, but that order was stayed pending the high court's ruling.

Under federal law, the charges against both men are misdemeanors. But the federal Board of Immigration Appeals concluded they committed "aggravated felonies" and were eligible for deportation.

Arguments by the government's lawyer met with skepticism from justices as well.

Deputy Solicitor General Edwin Kneedler countered that the court should look to various state laws, where the majority of criminal cases are prosecuted, not some "supposed" uniform standard of federal statutes. Souter called the Bush administration's position "very strange."

"The problem is that state law and federal law are at odds over the gravity of the offense," he said.

The high court's new term officially began Monday, but no arguments were held because of the Yom Kippur holiday.

Scalia's 'Tequila' Remark Raises Eyebrows During Immigrants' Rights Argument (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 4, 2006

During oral arguments Tuesday in an immigrants' rights case, Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia made a reference to one of the parties, a Mexican man who has been deported back to his country, as someone unlikely to keep from drinking tequila on the chance he could return to the United States.

The comment raised eyebrows in the audience and offended some who were told about the remark afterward on the grounds that it perpetuates stereotypes about Mexicans. Lawyers directly involved in the case could not be reached or declined to comment publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0074838

The comment came during arguments in Lopez v. Gonzales and Toledo-Flores v. United States, challenges to the government's interpretation of the federal law that allows deportation of immigrants who commit aggravated felonies.

The question before the Court is whether the law covers those who are convicted of crimes that are felonies under state law but only misdemeanors under federal law. The case could affect thousands of immigrants with relatively minor drug offenses on their records.

One issue is whether one of the cases is moot -- Reymundo Toledo-Flores has already been deported back to Mexico because of his conviction in Texas for possession of 0.16 grams (about 0.005 ounces) of cocaine.

His lawyer, Assistant Federal Public Defender Timothy Crooks, told the Court that the case is not moot because even though his client is in Mexico, he is still subject to the U.S. District Court's jurisdiction and could face adverse consequences if he commits further offenses in Mexico or tries to return to the United States to visit his children, who are U.S. citizens.

Scalia dismissed that argument as "an exercise in the conceivable" and added, "Nobody thinks your client is really, you know, abstaining from tequila down in Mexico because he is on supervised release in the United States."

Carlos Ortiz, former president of the Hispanic National Bar Association, was not in the audience but reacted strongly when told of the comment. "Justice Scalia is supposed to be very smart, but anyone who is supposed to be so smart would not and should not say something that insensitive. It is a really terrible comment, and he should be called on it."

Ortiz, who has long lobbied for the appointment of a Hispanic justice and more Hispanic law clerks to the high court, added, "This is the kind of incident that makes it so clear that the Court needs more diversity."

Scalia declined to comment on his remark.

One lawyer who was in the audience, Benita Jain of the Immigrant Defense Project of the New York State Defenders Association, said the reference was unfortunate because most of the immigrants who could be affected by the case are "lawful residents who have been here since they were young." She said those who face deportation if immigrants lose in the cases before the Court have been U.S. residents for an average of 14 years.

Jain, who was part of a team that filed an amicus brief on behalf of the immigrants in the case, declined to comment further on Scalia's remark except to say guardedly that he is "known for being colorful. It's Scalia."

Border Security, Job Market Leave Farms Short Of Workers (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

CLOVIS, Calif. -- Bins of Granny Smith apples towered over two conveyor belts at P-R Farms' packing plant. But only one belt moved. P-R Farms, like farms up and down California and across the nation, does not have enough workers to process its fruit.

"We're short by 50 to 75 people," said Pat Ricchiuti, 59, the third-generation owner of P-R Farms. "For the last three weeks, we're running at 50 percent capacity. We saw this coming a couple years ago, but last year and this year has really been terrible."

Farmers of all types of specialty crops, from almonds to roses, have seen the immigrant labor supply they depend on dry up over the past year. Increased border security and competition from other industries are driving migrant laborers out of the fields, farmers say.

Earlier this year, many farmers were optimistic about finding a solution in the Agricultural Job Opportunity, Benefits and Security Act, or AgJobs. The bill, proposed by Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), would allow undocumented agricultural workers already in the United States to become legal permanent residents and would streamline the current guest-worker program. In March and September, hundreds of growers traveled to the Capitol to lobby for the bill.

But deep divisions within the Republican Party have stalled immigration reform. Although legislation to build a 700-mile fence along the border passed the House and Senate, the AgJobs proposal has languished.

As the border tightens, Mexican workers who once spent part of each year in American fields without a work permit fear that if they go back to Mexico, they will be trapped behind the border, farmers say. Instead, they stay in the United States, taking year-round jobs that pay more and are less backbreaking than farm work, such as cleaning hotels or working in construction in cities on the Gulf Coast devastated by last year's hurricanes.

"Frequently you hear, especially from California, complaints about construction companies actually recruiting workers from the sides of the fields," said Craig Regelbrugge, co-chair of the Agriculture Coalition for Immigration Reform. Other industries that depend on immigrant labor, such as landscaping and construction, "are also concerned about the overall availability of labor given demographic trends," he said, adding: "But agriculture is the warning sign, if you will, of structural changes in the economy."

DOJ_NMG_0074839

The problem is now reaching crisis proportions, food growers say. As much as 30 percent of the year's pear crop was lost in Northern California, growers estimate. More than one-third of Florida's Valencia orange crop went unharvested, Regelbrugge said. In New York, apples are rotting on the trees, because workers who once picked the fruit have fled frequent raids by Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents, said Maureen Marshall, an apple grower in Elba.

Michael Keegan, a spokesman for the federal agency, said he could not confirm any specific targets for raids. But he said it now takes a more proactive approach to work-site enforcement, seeking to build criminal cases against employers instead of issuing fines. The agency focuses work-site raids on "critical infrastructure," he said, such as airports and chemical plants, including food processing facilities.

Critics say increased wages would keep workers in the fields. Growers contend that their wages, often minimum wage plus a piece rate, are as high as they can pay and still remain profitable. Ricchiuti echoed many growers when he said local people "don't want to do the work at any price."

Farmers also contend that an existing guest-worker program is not usable. Although some industries, such as Maryland crab pickers, rely on the H-2B program to provide foreign labor, farmers argue that the equivalent program for agriculture, known as H-2A, is too complex and has onerous requirements, such as providing housing for workers. Nationwide, only 2 percent of agricultural workers use H-2A visas, Regelbrugge said.

"We explored [H-2A], and it was so cumbersome, it just would not meet our needs," said Ricchiuti of P-R Farms, who grows apples, nectarines, nuts and grapes in California's fertile San Joaquin Valley. "It's so specific; you agree to hire so many people at this time. What if the season is two weeks late? I have to have work for them. Or pay them to do nothing."

Some farmers said they have invested in machines to take the place of workers, though some tasks, such as picking soft fruit, cannot be mechanized.

Others are worrying about credit. In August, Tom Brown, president and chief executive of Fresno Madera Farm Credit bank in California, testified at an immigration forum hosted by Rep. George Radanovich (R-Calif.) that he was worried about the impact of the labor shortage on farmers' ability to repay loans.

Some food growers, who as a group tend to vote Republican, now find themselves fighting hardest against leaders in their own party.

"So many of the farmers here are conservative, but they're finding themselves kind of at odds, not so much with Republicans in this area but with Republicans on the East Coast who have no idea what's going on in the San Joaquin Valley and California," said Daniel Jackson, a California fruit grower. "Something could happen in Washington, D.C., tomorrow, and all the farmers in the San Joaquin Valley would be out of work."

Ricchiuti has a framed photo of President Bush and first lady Laura Bush on his office wall and a pile of "Re-Elect Arnold" signs supporting Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R-Calif.) at his processing plant. But he grew agitated when he talked about the GOP's handling of immigration.

"What's wrong with the Republican leadership?" he demanded. "They control the House and the Senate. I would have thought it would be a slam-dunk.

"Certain Republicans are very closed-minded," he continued. "They're prejudiced, and they're concerned about people taking their jobs. Well, you know what? You won't do those jobs. You might stick your head up the grapevine once or twice, but you won't do it a third time."

Hopes for the AgJobs bill are now on hold until after the midterm elections, said Barry Bedwell, president of the California Grape and Tree Fruit League. Bedwell has made four trips already this year to Washington to lobby for immigration reform.

"Even from our best friends and allies in the San Joaquin Valley on the Republican side, they were saying, yes, they understand. But they were trying to explain the political reality of an election year," he said. "Boy, I will be happy to get by the election, where we can start talking reason."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Disaffected Republicans May Sit Out Vote Following Foley Scandal (AFP-Y)

By Charlotte Raab

AFP, October 3, 2006

A roiling sex scandal that led to the resignation of a prominent Republican lawmaker has left the party fearing conservative voters may sit out next month's crucial midterm elections, as President George W. Bush said he was "disgusted" by the affair.

Bush said he supported House Speaker Dennis Hastert's call for a law enforcement probe into the e-mails and text messages sent by US Representative Mark Foley to young, male congressional pages.

DOJ_NMG_0074840

"I was dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior," Bush said during a visit at an elementary school in Stockton, California.

The shocking revelations that the veteran Republican lawmaker sexually harassed underage congressional aides before resigning in disgrace last week could leave many conservatives feeling like they might not want to go to the polls, and could be the tipping point that returns control of Congress to opposition.

Conservative voters, who often are moved to turn out in force at the polls to vote on "values issues" such as abortion and banning gay marriage, reportedly are disgusted by the news.

Joe Negron, chosen by Florida's Republican leaders to replace Foley on the ballot, conceded that it might be an uphill fight to hold onto voters in his district, although he is holding out hope that he can convince voters to stick with his party.

"Everyone in this district is shocked and angered by what happened," Negron said.

"The system needs to work: let the chips fall where they may. If people knew about this in Congress and didn't take appropriate steps, they need to be held accountable," he told Fox television.

"I'm asking voters to give me a chance."

The conservative Washington Times newspaper on Tuesday said Dennis Hastert, the speaker of the House of Representatives should follow Foley's lead and relinquish his post for not being more proactive in preventing and punishing the lawmaker's misbehavior.

"Resign, Mr Speaker," blared The Times, saying Hastert "dissembled, to put it charitably," before acknowledging that he had known for months that Foley had sent inappropriate e-mails to underage male aides.

"Either he was grossly negligent ... or he deliberately looked the other way," the daily charged.

Foley, a Republican who represents parts of tony Palm Beach county in Florida, abruptly resigned his seat Friday amid questions surrounding his sexually explicit e-mails to a former male page.

His resignation further jeopardizes an already endangered Republican majority in Congress, with Democrats favored to win the lion's share of House seats in November's midterm election according to many polls.

Foley had been favored to win reelection against Democratic challenger Tim Mahoney in the November 7 legislative contest.

He was known in Congress as a tireless champion of children's rights, especially against abuse and sexual predators. He co-chaired the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children and recently introduced legislation to crack down on Internet child pornography sites.

Mahoney, who now is expected to coast to victory, also has expressed moral outrage since the allegations were made known.

"I think that his admission disqualifies him from public office," he told US television Tuesday.

Democratic leaders in Washington were also quick to jump on the scandal as a symbol of moral and ethical shortcomings in the Republican leadership.

"Speaker Hastert again failed to answer the question that every mother and father in America is asking: how could Republican Leaders choose partisan politics over protecting children?

Meanwhile, several top Republicans were running for cover.

House majority leader John Boehner suggested that his hands were clean, since oversight of the page program fell to Hastert.

"My position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility," he told an Ohio television station.

But conservative US senator John Cornyn said it would be unjust if Republicans paid a price for Foley's misbehavior.

"No one has ever suggested with any of the scandals in the past that they somehow should be made a political football and blame an entire political party for the acts of an individual person," he said Tuesday.

"I think what's an overreach is to somehow try to blame Republicans in general or to blame those who did not know about the content of these e-mails for somehow knowingly allowing this to happen."

Foley Scandal Is The Nail In The GOP Coffin (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, October 4, 2006

In a curious way, the former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) scandal will be to the Republican congressional leadership what the Monica Lewinsky imbroglio was to the Clinton presidency.

After all the boring scandals — Whitewater, Hillary's investments, Paula Jones, Travelgate, the FBI files, the Rose Law Firm's billing records — the Lewinsky scandal seared into everyone's consciousness. Those who failed to read the many volumes of Whitewater documents published by The Wall Street Journal or who despaired of following the paper trail that led to the Travel Office firings could easily grasp the simple facts of Clinton's dalliance with Monica. Nothing complicated. Nothing subtle. Easy to understand. And so the Clintonian penchant for scandal became universally known and has been an enduring part of his legacy.

DOJ_NMG_0074841

Now, after the lobbyist travel scandal and the Abramoff favors for legislators and the growth of earmarking and the financial scandals that have faced Reps. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.), Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and a host of others, there is finally a simple sex scandal for everyone to focus upon. Nothing complicated about this one either.

It is not that the voters believe that all congressmen are child molesters, nor is it the details of what Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) knew, and when he knew it, that makes this scandal so important. Its centrality stems from the sheer arrogance and hypocrisy it demonstrates both on the part of Foley himself and his colleagues who hushed up the affair until it burst onto the public stage.

One more pious member of the Moral Majority, one more legislator who makes a career out of fighting for "values" and crusading to protect children turns out to be a hypocrite and an abuser himself!

One more congressman, a sponsor of legislation to help children, a member of the caucus on abused and exploited children, has abused and exploited them himself. The gap between what Foley professes and what Foley did is so huge that you can sink the entire Republican majority in both houses into the gap.

And once again, the arrogant leaders of the Congress circled the wagons and looked the other way to avoid investigating or even recognizing the child abuser in their midst.

The details don't matter much. Who really cares if Hastert only knew that Foley had asked a kid for his photograph or if he knew more about the e-mails that were flying around. And who cares if the Democrats had their own part in the scandal by taking no action and protecting a colleague until right before the election?

None of that really matters.

What is important is that all of the venality and hypocrisy, so evident when congressmen hire their wives or freeload on trips paid for by lobbyists or cram the budget with unjustified earmarks or encourage their sons and daughters to become highly paid lobbyists cashing in on their special access — all of those misdeeds, have suddenly acquired a poster boy: Rep. Foley!

Rep.Tom Delay's (R-Texas) misdeeds are far too boring, in the same way that Whitewater was boring. The paper trail is hard to follow and the accusations murky.

But there is nothing murky about what Foley did and the voters will find the story interesting and easy to follow. Despite this, however, it is not Foley who is sinking his party. Its own misdeeds have already sunk it.

Bill and Monica. Foley and the pages. What we are watching now is the vindication of Karl Marx' comment that history repeats itself — the first time as tragedy, the second time as farce.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race."

GOP Faces 'Inconvenient Truth' (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

Chicago Tribune, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republicans consolidated power in the George W. Bush era by building a foundation based largely on the pillars of moral clarity and accountability.

Now comes what Al Gore might call an "inconvenient truth." The scandal over alleged sexually predatory behavior that triggered the resignation of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) undermines those core GOP strengths, and with the approaching midterm elections, at the worst possible time, even prompting some calls from prominent conservatives Tuesday for the resignation of House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for his handling of the matter.

Republicans in power find themselves in a vise, squeezed of course by newly energized Democrats, but perhaps more important by their most fervent supporters on the right, the very voters who cast their ballot based on social issues.

It was those voters—stoked brilliantly by Karl Rove's surgical support for amendments to ban gay marriage in swing states, among other strategies—who provided Bush with the bare majority he needed for a second term, and that Republicans needed to maintain control of the House and Senate. Whether the GOP can count on those voters to show up in November is now in some doubt.

Economic conservatives had sounded their own complaints about the Republican regime earlier, angered by record congressional spending. Some foreign policy conservatives oppose the war in Iraq as an unwise—and un-conservative—attempt to remake the world. So in several significant ways, the coalition that had once seemed so solid in fact had been cracking for the last several years.

DOJ_NMG_0074842

And Washington now seems to again be engaging in its tribal ritual of assigning blame. On the plank for the moment is Hastert, who is being accused of inattention at best for his reaction to the Foley mess, and trying to cover up a scandal at worst. The Washington Times, whose editorial page was an intellectual midwife to the Republican revolution of 1994, called Tuesday for Hastert to resign. Also facing scrutiny are House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), who was aware of the Foley emails months ago, and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), one of the House members in charge of the page program.

The intensity of the focus on Foley has served to blunt one of the few positive periods that the Republicans have enjoyed in this election season. The president's aggressive post-Labor Day push on fighting terrorism, coupled with the sharp drop in gasoline prices, had seemed to halt a long slow slide. The Foley controversy now dramatically and negatively reshapes the race for Republicans, leaving them with diminishing hopes of maintaining control of the House chamber that they so famously wrested from Democrats in the midterm elections of 1994.

Hastert moved quickly over the weekend to call for a Justice Department investigation, which had the benefit of high-mindedness but also raised the prospect that the probe would not be finished by Election Day and would leave troubling questions hanging.

Bush offered his support for the Speaker during an appearance in California on Tuesday, reminding Americans of Hastert's prior life as a teacher and coach as measures of Hastert's concern for the well-being of children. The speaker clearly needed to hear the strong backing of the president in the face of mounting calls for his ouster.

Even that backing might not be enough. "There will be dramatic change," said one Republican consultant with ties to some of the House leadership. "It will either be imposed by a new set of leaders in the party or it will be imposed by the voters.

"The political environment today is such that Republicans feel defeated, all of America feels defeated and under siege at this point," he added. "You don't feel in control of your life. I think Republicans have felt the burden especially heavily because this is their president and their Congress. There hasn't been a lot of good news."

Indeed, there is an increasingly gallows view among Republicans about what November will bring. As several noted, things were not going well even before the news of Foley's salacious electronic messages. Congress essentially closed up shop for the term without major accomplishments on issues that voters said they cared deeply about, such as immigration.

The energy that brought the Republicans to power in 1994 seems to have given way to near exhaustion. And now, one of the central issues that solidified their power—a perception of holding the moral high ground—has been turned inside out.

"There is just a general disgust across the board," said one Republican lobbyist who is also heavily involved in campaign fundraising. "We hold huge amounts of fundraisers for members of Congress, and they all come by and tell us how they will maintain control of the House. But not one person in the last four or five or six months has said we are going to win because we have better ideas than the Democrats. I just think they have lost their way."

Hastert Faces Intense Pressure As Foley Mess Roils Republicans (WSJ)

By David Rogers And John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

With Republicans' woes deepening, House Speaker Dennis Hastert is holding fast against calls for him to resign over the congressional-page scandal. But there appears to be a real chance that the Illinois Republican could step down after next month's election even if his party retains power.

A new poll shows voter support for the party slipping, and Mr. Hastert and his divided leadership face immense pressure to respond more emphatically to the stream of revelations about former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit cyber-communications with teenage former pages.

"We have to do something different, more dramatic," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R., Ill.). "This is a political mess and what we've done so far is not working. Somebody has to take responsibility for this. It is on our watch."

At a news conference yesterday evening in West Palm Beach, Fla., Mr. Foley's attorney announced that the former lawmaker is gay and said Mr. Foley, a Catholic who attended Catholic schools, had been molested between the ages of 13 and 15 by a clergyman. But the lawyer, David Roth, said his client had never engaged in physical sexual relations with a minor despite the nature of his online contacts.

The pattern followed by Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican who resigned abruptly on Friday, was to pursue pages after they had ended their tenure at the Capitol. ABC News, for example, posted new communications yesterday in which Mr. Foley appears to have interrupted a vote on the House floor in 2003 to engage in Internet sex with a teenager who was still in high school but no longer a page.

The Foley news is just the latest in a hailstorm of unfavorable publicity that has hit the Republicans and President Bush in recent weeks, costing the party the initiative at a critical point in the midterm-election campaign. Party leaders had hoped to run the final weeks of the campaign with the spotlight on what they consider their strength: battling terrorists. Instead, they are playing defense on everything from the sex scandal to dispiriting reports about Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0074843

The damage was evident in a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, showing that, by 41% to 18%, Americans say that news they "have seen and heard over the past few weeks" has made them less favorable toward continued Republican control of Congress. By 34%-23% they called themselves more favorably inclined toward Democratic control. The survey, conducted last weekend, also shows a decline in Mr. Bush's job-approval rating to 39% from 42% earlier this month.

With the elections just over a month away, on Nov. 7, there is mounting pressure on Republican House leaders to try to limit fallout from the Foley scandal. In an interview late yesterday, Mr. Hastert said he would be willing to resign if he thought it would help the party but isn't convinced this is the case. "If I thought it would help the party, I would consider it, but I think just the opposite," he said.

For Mr. Hastert and other House leaders, it is a Hobson's choice. Do they risk allowing the scandal to fester without a top-level official taking responsibility, or do they appease critics with a high-profile resignation that could invite "chaos," as Mr. Hastert put it. Any abrupt departure could also disrupt the rest of the leadership in the final weeks of the campaign. And one of the Republicans' weaknesses is that they have no clear transition figure.

Mr. Hastert and other leaders don't have as much control over their party as when former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R., Texas) helped keep the troops in line. Conservative social activists are openly upset by Mr. Foley's actions -- and the leadership's response. "The fact that they just walked away from this, it sounds like they were trying to protect one of their own members rather than these young boys," activist Richard A. Viguerie said on Fox News yesterday, in calling for Mr. Hastert to step down.

Meanwhile, a new crop of conservatives could seize the moment to push the party to do more to cut government spending, for example. Among this group, Rep. John Shadegg (R., Ariz.) last night defended Mr. Hastert, saying he should not be "railroaded out of office." Another, Rep. Mike Pence (R., Ind.) has been quieter.

If the party were to lose control of the House, it is expected that Mr. Hastert would step out of the leadership. He said yesterday that if Republicans retain power, it is still his intention to run for speaker in the next Congress but "you have to count the votes." Close associates of Mr. Hastert don't rule out that, weary of the fray, he could opt to step down after Nov. 7 even if his party keeps its House majority.

The damage from the scandal complicates the picture because the office of the speaker is elected by the full House. If Republicans lose seats, any small block of conservatives unhappy with the party's leadership would gain more say in deciding who is speaker.

Mr. Bush came to the speaker's defense yesterday: "I know Denny Hastert... I know that he wants all the facts to come out," the president said. And stung by a "Resign, Mr. Speaker" editorial in the conservative Washington Times, which described his performance as "inept," Mr. Hastert spent the day on radio talks shows trying to tamp down the anger against him.

Mr. Hastert's aides trumpeted a letter last night from Pat Robertson's Christian Coalition supporting their boss. And appearing with conservative radio-show host Rush Limbaugh, Mr. Hastert sought to shift blame to Democrats, saying the opposition is orchestrating the leaks of explicit instant messages between Mr. Foley and former pages.

"We have a story to tell, and the Democrats have -- in my view have -- put this thing forward to try to block us from telling the story. They're trying to put us on defense," Mr. Hastert said.

But the ABC News reporter who broke the original story yesterday said some of the pages themselves stepped forward with some of the most damaging emails. (See related article9).

The page program offers teenagers academic and work experience in Congress. The pages, who stay one or two semesters and live in a dorm, run errands and help deliver documents, among other things. Republicans have discussed ending the program entirely or appointing a high-profile attorney to review the situation.

"We have to act quickly," said House Rules Committee Chairman Davie Dreier (R., Calif.), a Hastert confidant. And the speaker said he wants to create a blue-ribbon panel to assess the situation and what more could be done to better protect those in the program both during their participation and after they leave Washington.

"When they leave Washington we don't have much control over it," Mr. Hastert said. "We're trying to put something together that would help."

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has said it is investigating the Foley case, but it isn't clear what kind of legal threat he might face, if any. An FBI official familiar with the Foley investigation said three separate cyber-crime units looked at emails in July and found no evidence of broken laws. "They were vanilla," the official said. Agents are looking to see if new emails that have surfaced explicitly suggested meetings with the juveniles crossing state lines for sex. Other potential laws include exchanging of pornographic material with minors. "Right now, we still don't know what, if any, federal statutes have been broken," the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0074844

Still, the graphic nature of the instant messages adds to their impact on voters. "This isn't a lobbyist moving money around for favors. This is pretty easy to understand what's going on here," said one Republican leadership aide. And Mr. Hastert says he has felt blind-sided by the recent revelations, saying that the sexual content goes far beyond the "red flag" Foley e-mail his office became aware of last fall, which requested a page's photo but included no overt sexual advances.

Nonetheless, the speaker suffered from the fact that he went home to his farm in Illinois on Friday night as the scandal was breaking. It wasn't until Saturday night that the leadership produced a united statement on the crisis, and associates worry the press-shy speaker will be typecast as a Washington version of Cardinal Bernard Law, who was faulted for not doing more to address child abuse by priests in the Boston Archdiocese.

As speaker, Mr. Hastert is most responsible for the page program, and when parents of a Louisiana teenager were upset by an August 2005 Foley e-mail to their son, a former page, the complaint was taken to Mr. Hastert's staff last fall. But Mr. Hastert says he wasn't fully informed by his aides until recently, and even now he often mistakenly speaks of the issue being handled by the House Page Board, when in fact most of the six member panel were excluded from knowing of the complaint.

Instead, Rep. John Shimkus (R., Ill.), the board's chairman and a Hastert ally, chose to deal with the issue without informing Democrats and simply going to Mr. Foley directly and warning him to stop. Mr. Foley, whose political committees have contributed more than $700,000 to fellow Republicans in the past five elections, had some modest clout in the House. But the expedited, discreet handling of the affair most illustrates fears that if the complaint became public, it could hurt Mr. Foley and the party by reawakening public speculation about his being gay. Mr. Foley and party leaders were concerned such a revelation could cost him the support of voters.

"It was commonly known that Mark was gay," said Rep. LaHood. And Rep, Barney Frank, an openly gay Democrat from Massachusetts, said the whole handling of the initial complaint appeared driven by Mr. Foley's political situation. "Knowing as they did that Mark was gay -- and was conflicted about how to handle it -- made this more sensitive politically," Mr. Frank said.

Beyond the Foley scandal, the latest Journal/NBC poll suggests even more problems for Republicans' campaign positions, showing the signs of momentum that the party had enjoyed in early September -- from the president's political offensive calling voters' attention to the broader war on terrorism -- have halted.

The poll was conducted over the weekend amid a double-barreled dose of bad news for Mr. Bush's party, from disclosures about Mr. Foley to questions about progress in Iraq. The survey didn't ask specifically about the sex scandal or recent assessments of the war.

A 46% plurality of Americans now say the war in Iraq is hurting the nation's ability to win the fight against terrorism. That is up from 32% earlier this month when Americans were nearly evenly split on whether the war is helping, hurting or not making a difference in fighting terrorism.

"No incumbent party wants to run an election on these sorts of issues," says Bill McInturff, a Republican pollster who helps conduct the Journal/NBC survey. Mr. McInturff predicted a renewed Republican effort to focus on terrorism. But Democratic counterpart Peter Hart calls it "a moment of crystallization" in the battle to determine whether the Republicans keep the House and Senate for the last two years of Mr. Bush's term. The survey of 805 registered voters, conducted Sept. 30-Oct. 2, has a margin for error of 3.5 percentage points.

The survey shows Democrats -- who need a net gain of 15 House seats and six Senate seats to recapture control of Capitol Hill -- holding a nine-percentage-point edge, 48%-39%, on the question of which party voters want to control Congress after the election. That is unchanged from early this month.

The Foley matter comes as voters have already been souring on incumbents in general, and the Republican-led Congress in particular. In the poll, voters, by 45%-38%, said it is time to give a new person a chance rather than re-elect their incumbent member of Congress; in early September, voters split on that question.

By 57%-37%, voters say America's safety from terrorism doesn't depend on success in Iraq, which has been a central assertion of Mr. Bush and Republican congressional candidates. And by 61%-29%, voters say Iraq is now in a state of civil war -- a conclusion the White House has tried to forestall in the belief it would further erode support for Mr. Bush's policy there. Even Republicans, by 47%-39%, share that assessment.

The poll also contains signs that the congressional Republican strategy of "localizing" elections to take the spotlight off a politically weakened Mr. Bush isn't working. Fully two-thirds of voters now say their decision for Congress will be a signal for the Bush administration-with 39% signaling opposition and 28% signaling support. In April, only about half of Americans called their vote a signal for the administration.

The poll's best news for Republicans is what Mr. McInturff calls a "lessening of economic tension and pressure" as gasoline prices have fallen and the stock market has flourished. Voters now split, at 22% apiece, on whether the economy will get better or worse over the next year. In June a 40% plurality of voters predicted the economy would get worse.

DOJ_NMG_0074845

Foley Case Shakes GOP (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The unfolding Capitol Hill sex scandal has upended the political world only five weeks before the midterm elections, escalating GOP worries that the party will lose control of one or both chambers of Congress.

Most immediately, Republicans have been plunged into a wrenching debate about whether heads need to roll in order to persuade voters that they are taking the case of former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) — who sent explicit messages to male congressional pages — seriously.

Republicans fear that the case could demoralize conservative supporters and undercut the party's claim to be a defender of morality.

As events continued to unfold Tuesday, Foley's lawyer said in a news conference that the lawmaker, who resigned Friday, had been molested by a clergyman when he was a boy. The lawyer also said that Foley was gay but denied that Foley ever had "inappropriate sexual contact with any minor."

President Bush — campaigning for Republicans in California — said he was "disgusted" and "dismayed" by the Foley case, which already seemed to be having an effect on voters.

A Wall Street Journal survey released Tuesday found that two issues — the House sex scandal and the war in Iraq — had made Americans less favorable toward continued GOP control of Congress. It also showed a decline in Bush's job approval rating to 39% from 42% earlier this month.

Some conservatives are calling for J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to resign as speaker of the House, charging that he failed late last year to adequately investigate a complaint about Foley that at the time might have brought his behavior to light.

But other Republicans rallied behind Hastert on Tuesday, and warned that a leadership upheaval would make matters worse.

Hastert, who was elevated to his post during the turmoil caused by the sex scandal involving President Clinton, on Tuesday shrugged off calls to quit. "I'm not going to do that," he said during an appearance on conservative commentator Rush Limbaugh's radio show.

Bush did not answer reporters' questions about whether Hastert should resign. But he said, "I'm confident he will provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement" looking into whether Foley committed any crimes.

The question of how the GOP should respond to the revelations is particularly vexing for religious conservative leaders who are straddling their roles as crucial electoral allies of the party and representatives of a constituency undoubtedly outraged by the revelations.

"You have to keep in mind that the leaders of the Christian conservative groups … have folks back home who are going to be asking some tough questions," said Jim Guth, a political scientist at Furman University in South Carolina who specializes in religion and politics. "And if they don't take action, they are going to suffer some consequences in their own constituency."

For Democrats, the scandal has provided an opening to revive a campaign theme that seemed to have fallen flat earlier this year: their claim that the GOP has brought a culture of corruption to Washington.

Still, political strategists warn that Democrats have to be careful not to overplay their hand — especially since their party has had its own scandals, such as a bribery investigation of Rep. William J. Jefferson of Louisiana.

"I'm not convinced that Democrats are going to be able to paint [the corruption-in-Washington theme] as a Republican problem," GOP pollster Whit Ayres said.

The Foley case and questions about how House GOP leaders handled it compounded problems that were already bedeviling Republicans as they struggled to keep control of the House and Senate. Democrats need to pick up a net 15 seats to gain control of the House, and six seats to win a Senate majority.

"This is very hurtful for Republicans; there is no other way to put it," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.).

Noting that the GOP's fortunes had seemed on the upswing as Bush spent much of September focusing on the threat of global terrorism, LaHood added, "This decimates all the things we've been doing."

Across the country in recent days, especially in competitive House races, Democratic candidates have lambasted GOP incumbents for their ties to Foley — and Republicans have tried to distance themselves from the scandal.

In Pennsylvania, Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach canceled a Monday fundraiser with Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, one of the GOP leaders who has been criticized for his response to early warnings of Foley's misconduct. Gerlach also returned donations from Foley.

Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) did the same. But her Democratic challenger, state Atty. Gen. Patricia Madrid, sought to keep the spotlight on the story, calling on Wilson to join those pushing for Hastert's resignation.

DOJ_NMG_0074846

A heated debate over Hastert's status continued among conservative activists, who were divided over whether it would help or hurt the GOP for him to step down.

Richard A. Viguerie, a pioneer in direct-mail fundraising for conservative causes, was among those calling for Hastert to resign. He charged that the speaker and others were not aggressive enough last year in pursuing a complaint about the e-mails Foley sent to a former page, which the leaders recently characterized as "overly friendly."

The e-mails were not sexually suggestive, but Viguerie said the leadership's decision to simply warn Foley to cease communication with the page was "only the most recent example of Republican House leaders doing whatever it takes to hold onto power."

The Washington Times, a leading conservative newspaper, gained wide attention in Washington on Tuesday with an editorial urging Hastert to quit as speaker.

Paul M. Weyrich, a conservative strategist who helped to found the Moral Majority, also was sharply critical of Hastert and said he believed the speaker and other GOP leaders should give up their posts because of their handling of the Foley case.

Weyrich said that although he believed Hastert's explanation that he was unaware of the sexually explicit messages Foley sent to pages that have surfaced in the last week, he still wondered why the speaker had not dug deeper when he dealt with the initial complaint late last year.

"That's the real question, and that's what has the movement people very angry," he said.

But there was no consensus among conservative leaders that Hastert or other House GOP leaders should step down.

Limbaugh, during his show Tuesday, charged that much of the furor over Hastert was fueled by Democrats who wanted "to suppress conservative turnout" in November.

Other prominent conservative voices, including Focus on the Family and the Wall Street Journal editorial page, rejected the idea that any GOP leader should resign.

The Arlington Group, a coalition of leading social conservative groups, backed away Tuesday from issuing a tough statement urging changes in the leadership.

Weyrich said that after a conference call among him and other members of the group's executive committee Monday, he produced a draft statement that called for the resignation "of anyone involved" in handling the Foley case, including Hastert and Boehner.

But after the draft was reviewed by the seven-member executive committee, the final statement did not directly criticize the response of any House leader or call for any to quit.

The statement asserted that House Republicans may have failed to sufficiently investigate Foley because they feared "a backlash from the radical gay rights movement."

*

janet.hook@latimes.com
ronald.brownstein@latimes.com

*

Begin text of infobox

Chronology

Sometime in 2003 — Former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) has a sexual conversation with a former House page via a computer instant-messaging program.

May 8, 2003 — The New Times of Broward-Palm Beach writes that Foley, favored to win the GOP nomination to succeed retiring Sen. Bob Graham in Florida, is gay.

May 22, 2003 — Foley tells several reporters in a conference call that speculation that he is gay is "revolting" and "unforgivable," and he begs for privacy.

Sept. 5, 2003 — Foley drops out of the race, citing his father's cancer.

Aug. 30, 2005 — A different page contacts the office of Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) with texts of e-mail exchanges with Foley. In one, Foley asks the former page for a photo of himself.

Shortly thereafter, Alexander's chief of staff contacts the office of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and asks for guidance to prevent contact between Foley and the ex-page. Hastert's staff contacts the then-House clerk, Jeff Trandahl, whose office runs the page program. Alexander's chief of staff declines to show Trandahl the e-mail, saying the boy's parents wish to keep the matter private. Trandahl is told the message is "overly friendly" but not sexual.

Trandahl and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chair of the board that oversees the page program, tell Foley to have no further contact with the former page. Foley denies any impropriety.

DOJ_NMG_0074847

November 2005 — Reporters from the St. Petersburg Times and the Miami Herald obtain copies of the e-mail exchange that led Shimkus and Trandahl to caution Foley, but do not write stories because the former page and his family refuse to go public.

Spring 2006 — After hearing about the 2005 e-mails, prominent Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) expresses concern to Hastert. Hastert says later that he does not recall the conversation, but does not deny it took place.

Sept. 24, 2006 — The blog http://www.stopsexpredators.blogspot.com posts four of Foley's 2005 e-mails.

Sept. 28, 2006 — ABC News posts a story about the 2005 e-mail messages on its website.

Sept. 29, 2006 — ABC News obtains the sexually explicit instant-message exchange from 2003 and asks Foley to comment. Within hours, he resigns.

Oct. 2, 2006 — In a statement, Foley says he has been admitted into a program for alcoholism and other problems. ABC News releases a new message exchange in which Foley appears to be setting up a rendezvous with a former page.

Oct. 3, 2006 — Some conservatives and the editorial page of the Washington Times call for Hastert to step down; other conservatives, President Bush and Republican members of Congress rally behind him.

In a statement issued by his lawyer, Foley says that he is gay and that he was molested by a clergyman as a teen, and denies having engaged in inappropriate activities with a minor.

— Maura Reynolds
Los Angeles Times

Bush In Favor Of Foley Investigation (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann
AP, October 3, 2006

President Bush said Tuesday he was "dismayed and shocked" at disgraced lawmaker Mark Foley's behavior and supports House Speaker Dennis Hastert's call for a full investigation.

"This investigation should be thorough and any violation of the law should be prosecuted," Bush said while campaigning for Republican lawmakers in California.

Some, including a Washington newspaper, have called for Hastert to resign, but Bush expressed confidence in the speaker's ability to resolve the matter, calling him a "father, teacher, coach."

"I know Denny Hastert. I meet with him a lot. He is a father, teacher, coach who cares about the children of this country," Bush said. "I know that he wants all the facts to come out."

Bush took no questions. And as he stepped toward his motorcade, the president ignored a shouted question directly asking whether Hastert should resign.

The president spoke after Hastert brushed aside any suggestion of resignation Tuesday as House Republican leaders struggled to contain the fallout from an election-year scandal involving sexually explicit messages from the disgraced former Florida Republican lawmaker to underage male pages.

"I know that he wants all the facts to come out and he wants to ensure that these children up there on Capitol Hill are protected," the president said. "I'm confident he will provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement in this investigation."

"I was dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior," Bush told reporters.

"I was disgusted by the revelations and disappointed that he would violate the trust of the citizens who placed him in office," Bush said. "Families have every right to expect that when they send their children to be a congressional page in Washington that those children will be safe."

The president spoke in a courtyard of the George W. Bush Elementary School. Inside, the president visited young children practicing their reading in the school library named after his wife, Laura. The school has 858 students in grades kindergarten through seventh grade.

Bush's comments on the Foley scandal came as he also addressed a string of deadly attacks in schools in the past week. He said Americans have a responsibility to protect their children.

"Our school children should never fear their safety when they enter into a classroom," the president said.

"Laura and I were saddened and deeply concerned, like a lot of citizens around the country, about the school shootings that took place in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Wisconsin. We grieve with the parents and we share the concerns of those who worry about safety in schools," Bush said.

On Monday night, the White House announced a conference of education and law enforcement experts on how the federal government might help communities prevent violence and deal with its aftermath. No date has been set and it was unclear whether Bush would attend.

DOJ_NMG_0074848

Hastert Fights To Save His Job In Page Scandal (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — Backed by measured words of support from President Bush, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert opened an intense drive on Tuesday to hold on to his post, but behind the scenes senior Republicans weighed whether he could survive the scandal surrounding former Representative Mark Foley.

Among the options being considered by senior Republicans is for Mr. Hastert to announce that he will stay on as speaker through this year but not seek re-election to the post assuming Republicans retain control of the House, said people on and off Capitol Hill who were involved in the discussions. They said the advantage of such a step would be to postpone a disruptive leadership fight until after Election Day.

Mr. Hastert, who stayed on as speaker after 2004 at the urging of Mr. Bush, has been involved in some of the discussions about how to proceed, but it was not clear how seriously he was considering not seeking the speakership next year, said the Republicans, who asked not to be named because they were discussing internal deliberations. Mr. Hastert returned home to Illinois on Tuesday.

In a round of interviews with right-leaning radio shows after the conservative editorial page of The Washington Times called Tuesday for his resignation, Mr. Hastert vowed he would not quit. He accused political opponents of stoking the furor over Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, in an effort to influence the coming elections and strip Republicans of Congressional control.

"If they get to me, it looks like they could affect our election as well," Mr. Hastert said in an interview on Rush Limbaugh's radio show.

But across Washington, Republicans debated whether the party could begin putting the matter behind it without some gesture to acknowledge the political uproar and demands for accountability, including changes to the House leadership.

At a news conference in West Palm Beach, Fla., Mr. Foley's lawyer, David Roth, acknowledged publicly for the first time that Mr. Foley is gay. Mr. Roth also said that the congressman, who resigned Friday after being confronted with sexually explicit messages he had sent to teenage Congressional pages, had been molested from ages 13 to 15 by a clergyman. Mr. Roth said Mr. Foley had not had any sexual contact with minors. [Page A26.]

Mr. Bush, in his first public comments on the matter, spoke outside a school in California, supporting Mr. Hastert's call for a full investigation and saying he was confident that Mr. Hastert would "provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement in this investigation."

"He is a father, teacher, coach, who cares about the children of this country," Mr. Bush said of Mr. Hastert, a former high school teacher and wrestling coach from Illinois. "I know that he wants all the facts to come out, and he wants to ensure that these children up there on Capitol Hill are protected."

Though Mr. Bush stopped short of saying explicitly that he wanted Mr. Hastert to keep his job, White House officials said the president wanted to return the loyalty Mr. Hastert had shown the administration. But they said the White House was resigned to more political damage as the Foley case played out no matter what Mr. Bush and the House leadership might do or say.

Republican lawmakers said privately that Mr. Hastert's fate would ride on developments in the coming days. There appeared to be no organized effort now to push for the speaker's ouster, and in public many backed Mr. Hastert, saying the full facts of the case were not yet known.

"I think it is a rush to judgment to say that he should step down," said Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York.

But even as Mr. Hastert pushed back against criticism that he had failed to act assertively enough to deal with Mr. Foley after an initial report of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley and a page, there were signs of continued tension within the House leadership team.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, said in a radio interview on Tuesday that he discussed Mr. Foley's communication with a page with Mr. Hastert last spring, joining Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York in insisting they had raised the matter directly with Mr. Hastert. Mr. Hastert has said he had no recollection of the Foley matter before it exploded last week.

Mr. Boehner, who said earlier that he was not sure he had discussed Mr. Foley with the speaker, said resolving the matter was Mr. Hastert's responsibility.

"I believe I told the speaker and he told me it has been taken care of," Mr. Boehner told a Cincinnati radio station. "In my position, it is in his corner, it is his responsibility."

DOJ_NMG_0074849

Later Tuesday, Mr. Boehner sent a letter in support of Mr. Hastert to The Washington Times, and aides to Mr. Boehner said the majority leader was not trying to undercut the speaker. But his comments fed an impression that House leaders were trying to make certain they were not blamed for the consequences of the Foley case.

Federal investigators who have interviewed several former pages have unearthed instances of conduct by Mr. Foley that will almost certainly lead to a full criminal investigation, including grand jury testimony, to determine whether the former lawmaker violated federal sex crime laws, government officials briefed on the matter said Tuesday. They spoke on the condition that they not be named because they were discussing details of an investigation.

Prosecutors have yet to issue subpoenas or search warrants but have discussed ways to safeguard evidence in the case, the officials said, possibly issuing what are known as preservation letters, directing government agencies or private entities, like Internet providers, not to destroy any electronic data that might be relevant.

On Tuesday, ABC News disclosed a text-message conversation from April 2003 in which Mr. Foley and a page exchanged sexually explicit messages as the lawmaker waited to vote; in another exchange, Mr. Foley seemed to invite a teenage page to drink alcohol with him at his home in Washington.

Mr. Hastert's allies sought to rally rank-and-file lawmakers behind the speaker, and a letter of support was being circulated by Representative John Shadegg, Republican of Arizona, who was trying to round up signatures. The speaker's office was also trying to tamp down outrage from the right and released a letter of support from the Christian Coalition.

But other Christian conservative groups, a pivotal variable in Republican turnout for the midterm elections, condemned the lack of earlier action by Republican leaders.

"It is clear someone knew," said a statement from the Arlington Group, a coalition of major Christian conservative organizations including Focus on the Family, Concerned Women for America and the American Family Association. "We are very concerned that the whole truth concerning this episode be reported, including when House leadership or other members from either party knew of this situation."

Phil Burress, president of the Cincinnati group Citizens for Community Values, said that among Christian conservative voters, the Foley scandal "just sows more contempt for Congress as it becomes nothing more than a playground for sexual perverts."

Republicans said they were increasingly concerned that the matter would dominate the final weeks of the midterm elections. One lawmaker in a difficult race in Pennsylvania, Representative Jim Gerlach, canceled a fund-raiser with Mr. Boehner.

"The reaction's been fairly slow on this," said Vin Weber, a former Republican congressman from Minnesota who served as chairman of the president's Plains States Campaign Committee in 2004. "I have not detected a clear Republican strategy for dealing with this, which is not adequate."

In regard to calls for Mr. Hastert's resignation, Mr. Weber said, "The president is not going to toss overboard a guy who has been a good, faithful ally of his."

The first television advertisement to refer directly to the page scandal was broadcast Tuesday in Minnesota, where a Democratic Congressional candidate, Patty Wetterling, is running for an open seat against a Republican state senator, Michele Bachmann. "Congressional leaders have admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman who used the Internet to molest children," the commercial declared.

Bush Backs Hastert's Handling Of Sex Scandal (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

President George W. Bush sought to end Republican disarray on Tuesday over the handling of the sex scandal involving congressman Mark Foley, defending House Speaker Dennis Hastert against calls for his resignation.

At a campaign event in California, Mr Bush said he was "disgusted by the revelations" about Mr Foley, a Florida Republican who resigned from his seat on Friday after the publication of explicit electronic correspondence with under-age male pages who worked on Capitol Hill.

Mr Hastert has come under fire for failing to investigate fully less lurid e-mails from Mr Foley that had come to his attention earlier this year. On Friday he had initially said he did not "explicitly recall the conversation" and made conflicting statements on when he had known of the concern. On Monday he said he had been "duped" by Mr Foley.

An editorial on Tuesday in the Washington Times, a conservative newspaper, called for Mr Hastert to resign, arguing he was either "grossly negligent for not taking the red flags fully into account and ordering a swift investigation, for not even remembering the order of events leading up to last week's revelations, or he deliberately looked the other way".

DOJ_NMG_0074850

Mr Hastert said he would not resign, while senior Republicans appeared to try to distance themselves from him. On Friday Tom Reynolds, the head of the House Republican congressional committee, said he had told Mr Hastert about the earlier e-mails this spring. John Boehner, the House majority leader, said in an interview quoted by AP: “I believed I talked to the speaker and he told me it had been taken care of.” A few hours later, however, he sent a letter to the Wash-ington Times criticising its editorial.

In his first expression of support, Mr Bush called Mr Hastert, “a father, teacher, coach, who cares about the children of this country”.

Social conservatives have been horrified at the damage to the credibility of a party that prides itself on family values. The Arlington Group of leading pro-family groups called for the resignation of any member who had acted “improperly in this matter” and called for the leadership to investigate aggressively any further rumours of misconduct.

James Thurber, the director of the centre for congressional and presidential studies at American University, said the Republican leadership’s failures were part of a wider pattern of not addressing a series of ethics scandals. “They just don’t get it. They try to shut things down and forget about them. Look at the leadership of the ethics committee. They have not had a single hearing on any of these lobbying issues, such as with Tom Delay [former House majority leader] or Bob Ney [a former congressman].”

Bush Backs Hastert To Keep Job (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

President Bush and other Republicans defended House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert yesterday against Democrats and conservatives who have called for his resignation over the handling of sexually explicit Internet messages former Rep. Mark Foley wrote a teenage boy who had worked as a congressional page.

"I know Denny Hastert, I meet with him a lot," Mr. Bush said yesterday. "He is a father, teacher, coach, who cares about the children of this country."

Mr. Bush said he was "disgusted" by Mr. Foley's behavior and said he supports Mr. Hastert's call for a full investigation. "I'm confident he will provide whatever leadership he can to law enforcement in this investigation," he said.

Earlier this week, several conservatives called for Mr. Hastert's resignation because, they said, Mr. Hastert and other leaders did not act aggressively enough when they first learned last year of a separate set of "overly friendly" e-mails that Mr. Foley had sent to another teenage former page.

"[N]o one in the leadership, including Speaker Hastert, had any knowledge of the warped and sexually explicit instant messages that were revealed by ABC News last Friday," Majority Leader John A. Boehner wrote yesterday in a letter to The Washington Times, whose editorial board called on Mr. Hastert to step down.

"Had Speaker Hastert or anyone else in our leadership known about Mr. Foley's despicable conduct, I'm confident the speaker would have moved to expel Mr. Foley immediately and turn him over to the appropriate authorities," the Ohio Republican said.

Bush spokeswoman Dana Perino said the president has not personally spoken to Mr. Hastert in "the last few days," although the White House and the speaker's office are in "regular contact."

Asked what the president thought about the calls for Mr. Hastert's resignation, she replied that Mr. Bush wants to know all the facts.

"The speaker called for the investigation, the president supports that, and one is under way. And so let's let that play out," Mrs. Perino said.

As House Republicans worked to show unified support for Mr. Hastert, new "instant messages" between Mr. Foley and a former page surfaced.

"Former Congressman Mark Foley (R-FL) interrupted a vote on the floor of the House in 2003 to engage in Internet sex with a high school student who had served as a congressional page," ABC reported on its Web site yesterday. The network did not include the exact exchange, for reasons of taste, but said it occurred during the April 2003 House vote to provide $78.5 billion in emergency spending for military operations in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Those messages were among 52 new ones obtained by the network between a teenage boy and Mr. Foley, who used the handle "Maf54" -- Mr. Foley's initials followed by the year of his birth.

In another instant message, Mr. Foley invites the boy to his house near the Capitol for alcohol. "We may need to drink at my house so we don't get busted," he writes in one.

DOJ_NMG_0074851

In Florida, meanwhile, Mr. Foley's attorney, David Roth, held a press conference last night to announce that Mr. Foley had been molested by clergy in his early teens. The lawyer did not specify what religion the clergyman was, but Mr. Foley is Roman Catholic. The lawyer also made the first public acknowledgment that Mr. Foley is a homosexual.

Mr. Foley is "recovering" in a clinic for alcoholism, though friends and staffers have told reporters that they were unaware that the six-term congressman had a drinking problem.

The former congressman is a "closet drinker," Mr. Roth said. "This is part of his recovery."

In Washington, Democrats and some conservatives continued their assault on Republican leaders for the scandal and many lower-ranking House Republicans did all they could to distance themselves from leadership and the whole sordid mess.

"Mark Foley is a pedophile who should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law," Rep. Jim Gerlach, Pennsylvania Republican, said emphatically yesterday. "Additionally, there needs to be a full and complete FBI investigation into this matter immediately. If it is found that any member of leadership, Republican or Democrat, or any member of Congress knew of the inappropriate conduct and did nothing to stop it, they should immediately resign from Congress."

Mr. Gerlach, who faces a tough re-election campaign, also postponed a scheduled fundraiser with Mr. Boehner "because he felt it was inappropriate to move ahead with it as planned." The Republican also donated $1,000 in campaign contributions from Mr. Foley to a local crime victims group.

Hastert Says He's Not Going To Quit (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And David Jackson

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Dennis Hastert rebuffed calls Tuesday for him to resign over his handling of the Mark Foley scandal. His fellow Republicans tried to contain damage to the party a month before elections.

At issue is whether Hastert and other House Republican leaders were aggressive enough in their investigation of alleged sexually explicit instant messages and e-mails between Florida congressman Foley and House pages.

One newspaper and some conservatives called for Hastert to step down. He told radio host Rush Limbaugh he has no intentions of quitting. “I'm not going to do that,” said Hastert, who has been speaker since 1998. “We took care of Mr. Foley.”

Hastert got a nod of support from President Bush hours after The Washington Times, a newspaper influential among conservatives, called on Hastert to “resign his speakership at once.”

Bush told reporters traveling with him in Stockton, Calif., “I know Denny Hastert, I meet with him a lot. He is a father, teacher, coach, who cares about the children of this country.” Bush, making his first comments about the scandal, said he was “disgusted by the revelations” of Foley's “unacceptable behavior.”

The Internet communications were first reported last week by ABC News. The network reported Tuesday on instant messages that allegedly show Foley having Internet sex with a page during a House roll call vote. None of the communications has been independently verified by USA TODAY. Foley resigned Friday.

Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz., sent a letter to his colleagues saying calls for Hastert's resignation are “unwarranted and fundamentally unfair.” Shadegg said Hastert “deserves to be treated fairly, not railroaded out of office.”

Hastert has said he does not remember being told about a complaint from the parents of a 16-year-old Louisiana boy, a former page, who alerted Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., about Foley's e-mails to their son. Two top Republicans, Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and campaign chairman Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, have said they discussed the issue with Hastert months ago.

The e-mails to the Louisiana boy were not sexually explicit. The liberal-leaning group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said it turned over those e-mails to the FBI in July. It also said the bureau did not pursue an investigation.

Conservative leaders had mixed reactions to the actions by Hastert and the GOP leadership. Hastert got support from the Christian Coalition and Republican strategist Grover Norquist, who dismissed calls for the speaker's resignation as “a handful of conservatives desperate to get attention and press.” Tony Perkins, head of the Family Research Council, and Wendy Wright, president of Concerned Women for America, said such calls were “premature.”

Richard Viguerie, a conservative strategist, called for the resignation of the entire House leadership team.

Perkins warned the scandal would cut election turnout Nov. 7 of conservative “values voters” who tend to support Republicans. Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C., who supports Hastert, agreed. “It doesn't help our chance to retain the House,” McHenry said. “That's for sure.”

Gingrich Says Hastert Shouldn't Resign Over Handling Of Page Scandal (AP)

By Jeffrey McMurray

AP, October 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074852

LEXINGTON, Ky. - Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said Tuesday that his successor, Dennis Hastert, appropriately handled the aftermath of a scandal involving a Florida congressman and salacious, explicit instant messages to underage male pages.

Gingrich on Tuesday dismissed a call for Hastert's resignation by The Washington Times, a conservative newspaper whose editorial page editor is Gingrich's former press secretary, Tony Blankley.

"I do not agree with that, and I think it's very premature and very inappropriate," said Gingrich, who was in Lexington to give a speech to the University of Kentucky's Sanders-Brown Center on Aging Foundation.

Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., abruptly resigned Friday after news reports surfaced that he sent inappropriate instant messages to teenage boys who once worked as House pages.

On Tuesday, House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said Hastert told him last spring that a Louisiana page's complaint about Foley had "been taken care of."

Gingrich, a Republican who represented a district in Georgia, said it appeared Hastert did all he could by sending another congressman to confront Foley about the charges. Beyond that, Gingrich said, the information he had at the time wasn't "actionable."

"You look him in the eye," Gingrich said. "You say, 'This is dangerous. It's inappropriate. You can't do it.' And, in this case, we now know that U.S. Rep. Foley lied. Now, when you catch him in the lie, you then take stronger action. But until you catch him, you can't presumptively do that."

Gingrich suggested there is a double standard that Republican scandals reflect badly on all Republicans while Democratic scandals, such as Bill Clinton's relationship with Monica Lewinsky, don't affect other Democrats. He also questioned the timing of the release of the information, just a few weeks before the midterm elections.

Even if there was suspicion about Foley, Gingrich said, there is little that could have been done legally.

"You just had the Democrats vote against wiretapping for the purpose of getting terrorists, but it's OK to wiretap for the purpose of getting Republicans?" he said. "I don't understand the double standard."

As a freshman member of Congress in 1983, Gingrich took a hard line approach against two congressmen who were accused of having sexual relationships with congressional pages. Gingrich tried to get the congressmen forced out of office, but the House voted to censure them instead.

He said treatment of the Foley situation is a testament to how far the country has come in child protection cases.

"The mood was that it was almost a joke," Gingrich said. "I'm glad the House, in fact, is taking this much more seriously. I think it's a healthy sign for the country that we realize that these kinds of behaviors are dangerous and that we are prepared to protect young people."

Hastert Rival Sees Surge In Support (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's Democratic rival to represent the 14th District of Illinois says he got into the lopsided race because he opposes the war in Iraq, but now sees people supporting his candidacy because of what they see as Mr. Hastert's slow response to the "Foleygate" scandal.

"I hope people elect me for the qualifications I have for [charting] a new direction in Iraq, not because the speaker covered up for a dirty old man in Congress," John Laesch, 32, said yesterday, referring to accusations that former Florida Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, sent sexual computer messages to teenage boys serving as congressional pages.

No one is predicting Mr. Laesch, a political newcomer, will defeat Mr. Hastert in the overwhelmingly Republican district west of Chicago, where the top House Republican got 69 percent of the vote in 2004.

Ed Patru, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee laughed yesterday when asked if the Foley scandal might adversely affect Mr. Hastert in the Nov. 7 election.

"This is a two-day story," Mr. Patru said. "It will have no effect at all."

Illinois Republican leader Dennis Wiggins agreed.

"The speaker is very well-respected in this district, and he is trusted, as he is in Congress," said Mr. Wiggins, chairman of both the Kane County Republican Central Committee and the 14th District Republican Central Committee. "The calls I'm getting say he should hang in there and stay steadfast. There are two investigations going on [in the Foley scandal], and it behooves everyone to sit back and wait for the results."

Mr. Laesch describes Mr. Hastert as "the most powerful guy up for re-election in 2006." But the Democratic challenger says his campaign has been "energized" by inconsistences between what Mr. Hastert and others have said about when he first learned of inappropriate e-mail messages Mr. Foley sent to male pages.

Fallout from the Foley scandal "has had a huge impact on my campaign," Mr. Laesch said in a telephone interview yesterday. "Since Friday, we've raised $25,000 without lifting a finger." That's on top of $100,000 he had already raised.

"I realize Dennis Hastert can raise millions of dollars at the drop of a hat," Mr. Laesch said.

In addition, he said, between 30 and 40 people showed up at his campaign office Monday afternoon, asking for yard signs or to volunteer their help. "These people came to express their concern about having a silent speaker, who did absolutely nothing" to protect teenage males from a sexual predator, said Mr. Laesch.

"Even though I am a 32-year-old underdog, I have put a dent in" Mr. Hastert's campaign, the challenger said. He said his assets "include strong organizational skills" and he predicted conservatives will like the fact that his parents were missionaries in West Africa.

A Hastert spokesman said Mr. Laesch is "making reckless accusations" against the 10-term incumbent.

Mr. Hastert "was born and raised here, raised a family here, taught high school here and coached teams here," said Brad Hahn, a spokesman in Mr. Hastert's district office in Batavia, Ill.

"Denny Hastert is a lifetime part of this community, and he represents the values of this district," said Mr. Hahn.

Hastert Rejects Calls To Give Up Leadership (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) yesterday rebuffed calls to resign his leadership role, which have come from conservatives and liberals alike, but public ruptures in the ranks of the House Republican leadership continued to surface in the wake of a page scandal.

Hastert and fellow House Republicans stressed that they will contain the fallout from revelations that senior GOP leaders had known for months about the inappropriate communications between former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and at least two teenage male pages. But several conservative organizations, including the editorial board of the Washington Times, have now called on Hastert to step down, charging that he was derelict in not investigating the "over-friendly" e-mails that his staff had been aware of since late 2005.

A public show of support for the speaker by many House members masks fears that Hastert's hands-off management style since 1999, when he ascended almost accidentally to one of the highest offices in the land, may finally end his career. Just five weeks before midterm elections, most House members said Hastert will almost certainly not step down before voters go to the polls. But a GOP political disaster in the wake of the Foley revelations could usher him out of the post and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) into the speakership.

"I think Speaker Hastert's done a pretty good job under trying circumstances regarding our members. He has stepped up," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a close ally of Hastert's. But he added that the ultimate responsibility rests with Hastert. "The truth is, if you want to be a page, you have to be appointed by the speaker. This is the speaker's program."

Hastert's critics say the Foley episode is the latest in a long line of Republican leadership failures. Hastert largely stood on the sidelines last year as legal peril mounted for his top lieutenant, then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). Then he intervened to try to save DeLay, first by trying to change House rules to allow an indicted member to maintain his leadership post, then by helping to purge the House ethics committee of members and staffers who had challenged DeLay's bare-knuckled tactics. Neither effort worked.

It took months for Hastert to respond to the influence-peddling scandal triggered by convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and, even then, his personal pledge to tighten the rules governing congressional lobbying did not produce significant legislation. House GOP leaders seemed to have been blindsided when Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) pleaded guilty to accepting millions of dollars in bribes. And after pleading guilty to corruption charges, Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) remains in the House.

Hastert continues to say that his staff's failure to thoroughly investigate the initial e-mails from Foley to a 16-year-old Louisiana boy was understandable, given the vague, friendly nature of the exchange. But others see a pattern. "I think what has been revealed about the way in which the Republican leadership, and Hastert in particular, has handled this matter is fully consistent with his prior behavior as speaker," said Thomas E. Mann, a scholar on Congress at the Brookings Institution and author of a critical new book on the decline of Congress's role in governance." This is a man who has never taken seriously his institutional roll as a constitutional officer of the United States and the head of the whole House, not just the head of the Republican Party."

In a round of interviews with conservative talk show hosts, Hastert said he intends to lead a Republican majority in the next Congress. Fellow House Republicans fell in line. "For a normal political leader, it would be difficult to withstand this, but Hastert is seen as a grandfatherly figure in the House. He's seen as having our best interests at heart," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.).

DOJ_NMG_0074854

"We've been through far worse," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the vice chairman of the House Republican Conference. "This is not a problem. This is not anything that's going to tear up the leadership."

Still, such tears are growing increasingly evident. Last week, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said in an interview with The Washington Post that he told Hastert about Foley's inappropriate behavior last spring and was told that the issue was being dealt with. Boehner then sought to deny that he had said it. Yesterday, he returned to his original contention, emphasizing Hastert's responsibility for the page program.

"I believe I talked to the speaker, and he told me it had been taken care of," Boehner told a Cincinnati radio host. "And my position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility. The clerk of the House who runs the page program, the page board -- all report to the speaker. And I believe it had been dealt with."

At issue, say some former Republican leadership aides, may be Hastert's leadership style. Affable and approachable, Hastert emerged seemingly from nowhere to become speaker in 1999. Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) had been drummed out of Congress after a disastrous election season, and his heir apparent, Rep. Bob Livingston (R-La.), resigned amid allegations of an extramarital affair. DeLay, who was then majority whip, engineered Hastert's rise from chief deputy whip to speaker.

From the start, Hastert, 64, took on the role of father confessor, a shoulder to cry on as DeLay knocked heads and kept the House moving. But two former House leadership aides, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of hurting their relationship with the speaker, said DeLay's undoing may have been Hastert's -- and, in retrospect, may have allowed Foley's alleged behavior to go unchecked.

Under indictment and out of the leadership, DeLay was fighting for his political career when Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) brought Foley's suspicious e-mails to the leadership in November 2005. That same month, Cunningham pleaded guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes.

With DeLay gone and Rep. Roy Blunt (Mo.) serving as both majority whip and majority leader, the House leadership simply lacked the bodies to forcefully take on the Foley issue, the former aides said. The page program was the speaker's domain, but the speaker, already disposed toward delegating responsibility, was getting tired of all the scandals.

"The speaker has been preoccupied and distracted for more than a year," one former leadership aide said.

"Frankly," said the second, "he was tired."

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean disputed that assertion. Hastert was unaware, until last week, of the sexually explicit instant messages that set off the firestorm, Bonjean said, and when they surfaced, the speaker immediately condemned the behavior, called for a criminal investigation and set up a hot line for pages and former pages. As for the previous scandals, Bonjean said: "People want to go into hindsight, to armchair-quarterback, but the fact of the matter is, the speaker has successfully navigated members through a very, very difficult Congress."

A Few Conservative Voices Still Speak For The Speaker (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert woke up yesterday morning to find his Republican conservatives in mid-mutiny.

"Resign, Mr. Speaker," advised the Washington Times at the top of its editorial page. In the Mark Foley scandal, the conservative paper posited, Hastert either (a) "was grossly negligent" or (b) "deliberately looked the other way."

Hastert's loyal deputy, Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), told a hometown radio station that the blame was all Hastert's. "I believe I talked to the speaker and he told me it had been taken care of," Boehner said. "And my position is it's in his corner, it's his responsibility."

Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), the man leading House Republicans' campaign efforts, was also blaming "supervisor" Hastert for failing to act earlier to protect boys in the congressional page program from Foley's overtures. "I heard something; I took it to my supervisor," Reynolds said.

Before long, the august National Review had found Hastert and his team guilty of "serious sins of omission," while the magazine's Larry Kudlow joined the mutiny and called Hastert "an ineffective leader."

In the last few days, Hastert, a genial former wrestling coach from Illinois, is proving the axiom devised by former senator/philosopher Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.): "One day you're the toast of the town, the next day you're toast."

Four months ago, Hastert was feted as the longest-serving Republican speaker, earning tributes from all segments of the party. "He's done a great job, and he's been a great partner to me and a great mentor to me," Boehner said then.

And now, he's a great fall guy, too. "The clerk of the House, who runs the page program, the Page Board -- all report to the speaker," Boehner declared yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0074855

It was time for Hastert to take action to put down the mutiny. So he called Rush Limbaugh. And Sean Hannity. And Hugh Hewitt. And Lars Larson. And Roger Hedgecock. Even Neal Boortz, who said Hastert should find a "better excuse" for his inaction on Foley. "We're going to do them all," said Hastert aide Ron Bonjean.

Limbaugh, taking Hastert's call early in the afternoon, got right down to business. "The Washington Times' admittedly conservative editorial page has asked for you to step down," he pointed out.

"Well, yeah, I'm not going to do that," Hastert said casually, as if the Washington Times had suggested he order grapefruit for breakfast.

Limbaugh set about making the case for Hastert. Democrats and the media, he said, are making the speaker look more "interested in holding the House rather than protecting children."

"Yeah" was the entirety of Hastert's reply.

"I like what you said yesterday," Limbaugh continued, when Hastert "asked for an investigation into who knew what when."

"I don't think you could ask anybody better than the FBI," Hastert concurred. Limbaugh encouraged Hastert to change the subject to the economy and national security. Hastert dutifully responded with a few remarks about the economy and national security.

Eventually, Limbaugh closed with the warning that Democrats and the media would press the issue "even though you've dealt with it, even though he's gone, even though the mistake has been corrected."

Hastert again agreed. "They're trying to put us on defense," he said.

If that was the goal, it seems to have worked. Even nudists were gloating about the Foley scandal, telling the St. Petersburg Times that the lawmaker had been "very hypocritical" in attacking their skinny-dipping. Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah), according to the Deseret News, was driven to declare some of Foley's mannerisms "irritating," adding: "You don't need 'gaydar' to understand he has certain dispositions."

Even as Hastert was on the air with Limbaugh, ABC News was publishing more instant messages Foley had sent to former pages. Clearly, Hastert needed more help. Bush, traveling in California, told the cameras that Hastert "is a father, teacher, coach who cares about the children of this country."

When even that proved insufficient, Hastert turned at 5 p.m. to Hannity's radio show, "the last beacon of truth in a troubled time."

Hannity had spent two hours accusing the Democrats of "dirty tricks" and "hypocrisy" and taking issue with the Washington Times' call for Hastert's head.

"I was shocked at the Washington Times today," he told Hastert, then got down to the questioning. "As you said, this is all brand new to you as of Friday?"

"Right," Hastert agreed.

Hannity asked if Hastert's foes had the Foley messages but "sat on them for political reasons."

"I just think it's awful strange," the speaker agreed.

Hannity, invoking Democratic sex scandals involving then-Massachusetts Rep. Gerry Studds (1983), Massachusetts Rep. Barney Frank (1990) and President Bill Clinton (1998), asked: "Do you think there's a double standard?"

"Yes, it appears there's a double standard," the speaker agreed.

Hannity was not finished. "In all seriousness, how would you be responsible for what another congressman does on an instant message? How could you possibly know this kind of thing was going on?"

"We don't know," the speaker agreed.

Milbank is writing a book. Washington Sketch will appear on a reduced schedule until early next year.

Dems Sit Back And Watch The Republican Meltdown (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, October 4, 2006

House Democrats largely held their fire Tuesday as the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) escalated into a seriously damaging liability for beleaguered House Republicans just weeks away from a pivotal election.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) did not join calls from some conservatives for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to step down for failing to take more action to protect pages last year when he reportedly was informed that Foley sent inappropriate e-mails to a former page.

A spokeswoman said Pelosi instead was focused on ensuring that the ethics committee moves forward with its investigation.

“We’re keeping pressure on the Republican leadership to find out what happened, what they knew and when they knew it,” the spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0074856

The House voted Friday to direct the ethics committee "to immediately appoint" an investigative subcommittee to handle the matter and to present a "preliminary report" within 10 days, according to a resolution offered by Pelosi.

That 10-day time period is up on Monday. At press time, two sources said the ethics committee will convene tomorrow morning.

From a political perspective, the timeline allows Democrats to keep the scandal on the front page even if political pressure on Republican leadership wanes, said Democratic sources. If the investigation moves slowly, Democrats can charge that the Republicans are fearful of revealing details of a potential cover-up. If the probe moves quickly, the results will offer a new opportunity to showcase the Republican leadership's alleged missteps.

The expected FBI investigation will likely take much longer, stretching beyond the Nov. 7 elections.

House Democratic lawmakers and candidates largely followed Pelosi's lead yesterday, perhaps wary of overplaying their hand by calling for Hastert's head too early. Instead, they issued statements demanding that their opponents return Foley's campaign donations or linking Foley to a Republican "culture of corruption."

Patsy Madrid, however, who is challenging Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.), did demand Hastert's resignation.

"It is time for a change," she said in a statement. "Speaker Hastert needs to resign and the Republicans need to take responsibility for this scandal and for their attempted cover-up."

But the vast majority of House Democrats said nothing at all.

"I suspect that the Democrats don't really feel a need to say anything — the story speaks for itself," said a House Democratic aide. "The whole thing is absolutely outrageous. I have never seen my boss so angry and disgusted."

Encountered in a Capitol hallway yesterday, Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) said he was not ready to ask Hastert to step aside.

"I think anyone who knew about this and did nothing should step down, [but] we'll have to see all the facts," Schiff said. "The fact that [Foley] remained as chair of the Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, I think is terrible."

A Democratic strategist argued that staying out of a Republican scandal was the best political move Democrats could make right now.

"Don't get in the way when the other side is doing a fine job hanging themselves," the strategist said.

On the Democrats' campaign website, a listing of Foley news clips was topped with an unequivocal heading: "We. Are. Winning."

In an e-mail yesterday to potential donors, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee called the Foley scandal "a betrayal of trust" and said Democrats are in the best position in over a decade to win a Democratic majority in Congress.

Still, signs emerged yesterday that Republicans were beginning to go on the offensive, implying that Democrats were behind the leak of the original set of messages between Foley and a page.

"We also need to know why these messages surfaced only last week, on the final day of legislative business before the November elections," wrote House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) in a letter to the editor of the Washington Times, which called yesterday for Hastert to resign.

The House Republicans' usual attack dog, Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) was back in the saddle yesterday.

"Who would turn over the instant messages to ABC News rather than the police?" McHenry said in a statement. "In my mind, this person, group or political organization is as sick as Foley himself."

A watchdog group run by former Democratic aides, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), had a copy of Foley's original messages as early as July. The group forwarded the messages to the FBI, but did not pass them on to any other entities, said spokeswoman Naomi Seligman Steiner.

The messages appeared earlier in September on the website stopsexpredators.blogspot.com and ABC News picked them up on Thursday.

"We weren't the source. ABC did not the get the emails from us," Steiner said.

Unlucky GOP Candidate Depends On Votes For Foley (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, October 4, 2006

State Rep. Joe Negron (R-Fla.) started the first day of his congressional campaign to succeed Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) as an alternative juror in a two-week-old murder trial.

The trial ended yesterday when the jury convicted the defendant and the sentencing phase of the trial began. But that appears to be the least of Negron's concerns after winning the party's nod last weekend.

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) told conservative radio host Sean Hannity on Monday that Republicans losing the seat in November was already a foregone conclusion.

DOJ_NMG_0074857

"To vote for this candidate, you have to vote for Mark Foley," Boehner said, referring to ballot procedures that require Foley's name to remain on the ballot. "How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?"

Negron disputed Boehner's characterization that Tim Mahoney, the Democratic candidate, would win the seat.

"I certainly respect [Boehner's] opinion, but I strongly disagree and so does Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) who carried this district by 60 percent," Negron said in a call from the courthouse. "Just because Mark Foley has engaged in reprehensible conduct does not mean there will be a coronation for the Democratic candidate."

Unlike Boehner, as of Monday, the National Republican Congressional Committee was at least paying lip service to the idea that Negron had a real chance to keep the seat in GOP hands, sending out a memo arguing that the race would be competitive.

Negron said he would run his campaign on keeping taxes lower and federal spending down and supporting President Bush in his efforts to fight terrorism. But he quickly attacked his opponent, calling him a "John Kerry Democrat."

Foley won 58 percent of the vote in 1994 and never received less than 60 percent after his first term. President Bush won 54 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential election. But political handicappers, including Chris Cillizza at WashingtonPost.com, have said the seat is more likely to switch hands in November.

Negron said he would have less of a challenge building a campaign infrastructure because he has served for three terms in the Florida legislature. He plans to transfer $600,000 of his own money — which he set aside for his failed bid to become Florida's attorney general — to jump-start his congressional campaign. He has two staffers working for him and yesterday was expecting a potential campaign manager with D.C.-ties to fly-in for an interview. He said he didn't even know the job seeker's name.

Negron also noted that members of Florida's congressional delegation have offered him support, including Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) and Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.). He said he has not talked to Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee or anyone else at the party committee directly, but added that there have been "staff-level contacts."

"I can't imagine that the national party would walk away from a strong Republican district," Negron said.

Jeb Bush told reporters yesterday that, "I've never felt you should underestimate voters," but added that Negron faces an "an extraordinary challenge."

Meanwhile, Democrats are excited by the possibility of being able to put a seat in the win column that they weren't expecting. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) put Mahoney on their "Red to Blue" list, which could give him a fundraising advantage in reaction to the scandal. The Florida Democratic Party also began running a vote-by-mail program in the district prior to Foley's resignation.

Mahoney's press secretary said his boss, a wealthy businessman and former Republican, did not want to discuss the Foley matter and stressed that any questions directed to him right now would have to focus on issues.

But during the interview, when pressed on hot topics in Florida such as healthcare, Mahoney said he did not want to get into specifics such as whether he would support an employer mandate to provide health insurance. Breaking his own press secretary's rules, he readily answered questions about Foley and managed to take a few digs at Foley and House GOP leaders.

"[Speaker] Dennis Hastert [R-Ill.] needs to take on this problem from the perspective as a parent and not as a politician," he said. "He needs to go out there and find out who did what."

Mahoney was scheduled appeared on MSNBC's "Hardball" with Chris Matthews Monday night and was scheduled to appear on "Larry King Live" last night. Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.), who helped recruit Mahoney into the race, was considering flying to Florida to offer advice and assistance, said two Democratic aides.

Mahoney has $343,000 in cash-on-hand and he is airing a television ad that shows him alongside former Sen. Bob Graham (D-Fla.).

Former Gov. Mark Warner (D-Va.) will raise money for Mahoney and state Sen. Ron Klein (D-Fla.), who is running against Rep. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) at a breakfast tomorrow, said Ellen Qualls, a spokesman for Warner's PAC.

Page Scandal Complicates Race For 'Mr. Clout' (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

AMHERST, N.Y., Oct. 3 -- Possessed of a pleasant smile and a sweet demeanor, 60-year-old Eleanore Klepser represents something of a nightmare for local Republicans.

She is a registered Republican and she has always -- always -- voted for her local congressman, Thomas M. Reynolds, a Republican. But she is following this scandal about the congressional pages, and she suspects Reynolds just might have covered up the actions of a fellow Republican congressman who sent suggestive e-mails to a teenager who had worked in the House.

DOJ_NMG_0074858

"Why didn't he do more? That's what I wonder," Klepser said as she walked down a street in her well-heeled suburb northeast of Buffalo. "Was he paying close enough attention? Was he covering something up?

"These aren't great questions to ask a month before an election."

Reynolds supporters would not argue with that. What appeared to be a political stroll for the Republican known locally as "Mr. Clout" has become a campaign sprint. And Reynolds's biggest headache is the role he played in the unfolding controversy around the teenage congressional pages. This spring, Reynolds, who is among the Republican leadership in the House, learned that Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had sent an inappropriate e-mail to a 16-year-old former page that troubled the teenager's parents.

When word of the that and other e-mails broke last week -- along with news of far more explicit online instant messages -- Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) at first denied knowing anything about the scandal. But Reynolds told the media that he had told Hastert of the initial e-mail this spring; Hastert has said he does not recall this conversation, but he also has not denied that it might have taken place.

Now many, including Reynolds's Democratic challenger, are asking why Reynolds did not follow up on the complaint. They are also raising questions about the role of Reynolds's chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, who used to serve as chief of staff to Foley. In the days leading up to Foley's resignation, Reynolds allowed Fordham to advise the Florida congressman. A recent local poll reports that the race in New York's 26th Congressional District -- which reaches from suburban Buffalo across farm country and into Rochester -- is too close to call.

Reynolds's Democratic challenger, Jack Davis, is a millionaire and former Republican who says he fell out with the GOP when Vice President Cheney's staffers tried to prevent him from talking with the media in 2003 during a fundraiser in Buffalo. Now he is tossing bales of his own money into the campaign furnaces in hopes of overtaking Reynolds. Davis, 72, has the outspoken cockiness that comes with not working for anyone else. Most days he talks about free trade, which he loathes, and illegal immigrants, all of whom he would deport, and the nation's steady loss of high-paying working-class jobs to "Communist China."

But on Tuesday, he made an exception.

"I want to beat Reynolds on my issues, but of course it's nice to have him screw up," Davis said as he paced the office in his factory in Akron, N.Y. "When Reynolds heard about the problems with the pages, he should have shown due diligence and investigated. This is all about power and all about money, and it stinks."

Reynolds remains no easy mark. He occupies a district tailored for Republicans, and he has directed tens of millions of dollars into the region, recently gaining a reprieve for an air base slated for closing. When he held a news conference Monday evening at Daemen College, reporters passed the Thomas Reynolds Center for Special Education, funded with $1.9 million from the politician.

He directs the National Republican Congressional Committee with a practiced hand and is mentioned as a possible future speaker of the House.

A lot of voters appreciate Reynolds's acumen, especially in this economically battered corner of New York. "We're losing a lot of jobs and industry, and we need someone who knows how to fight," said Sam Mairorana, a retired salesman in Williamsville. "A lot of folks I know are thinking about voting against Reynolds. I'm not sure we can afford it."

Reynolds returned to Buffalo on Monday and walked into a news conference affecting a jaunty air. He slapped a supporter's back, smiled at the 25 children whom his campaign aides had arranged around him, then turned to face the media and charges that he had helped cover up misconduct.

"I did what most employees do," he said. "I heard something, and I took it to my supervisor, the speaker of the House."

He could not remember when this conversation had taken place, however, nor what the speaker's reaction had been. As the questions kept coming, sweat beaded on his forehead, and he cut off questions. "I don't know what more I could have done," he said. Asked whether Hastert had done enough, Reynolds shrugged. "Look, I don't know. . . . You'll have to ask him."

Reynolds Deflects Questions About Top Aide's Role In Foley Storm (AP)

AP, October 3, 2006

AMHERST, N.Y. Congressman Thomas Reynolds today denied knowing what his top aide might have done on behalf of a disgraced lawmaker in the days before he resigned following revelations of sexually explicit messages sent to underage male pages.Reynolds' chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, a past chief of staff for former G-O-P Representative Mark Foley of Florida, advised his former boss as the scandal unfolded.After learning the sexually explicit nature of some of the exchanges, Reynolds has said he called for Foley's resignation, an effort in which his chief of staff was involved.That's in stark contrast with Reynolds' claims today that he knew nothing about his top aide's actions before Foley's resignation.Fordham did not respond to an e-mail request seeking comment and could not be reached by telephone.Reynolds, a four-term congressman, is involved in a heated re-election race against Democrat Jack Davis.

DOJ_NMG_0074859

Congressman Reynolds Facing Tough Questions On Foley (WIVB-TV)

WIVB-TV, October 3, 2006

(October 3, 2006) - - House Speaker Dennis Hastert is resisting calls for his resignation in the wake of questionable e-mails sent to a Capitol Hill page by the now-resigned Congressman Mark Foley. And Clarence Congressman Tom Reynolds faced more questions from News 4 Investigative Reporter Luke Moretti and others Tuesday in Amherst.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, Republican of Clarence, said, "I took that information to the Speaker."

Tom Reynolds says he first heard about overly-friendly e-mails sent by Mark Foley from a colleague, and then notified House Speaker Dennis Hastert.

Moretti: When and how did you tell the Speaker? Was it on the phone? Was it in person?

Reynolds: Well, first of all, it's a privileged conversation between two members, but I regularly meet with the Speaker, particularly as chair of the campaign committee, and I probably had a list of things.

Hastert doesn't deny talking to Reynolds, but says he doesn't remember it.

Hastert, Republican of Illinois, said, "I don't recall Reynolds talking to me about that. If he did, he brought it in with a whole stack of things."

It turns out the House reviewed the Foley e-mail controversy in November 2005, months before Reynolds learned of it.

Then, a second set of e-mails and instant messages surfaced on Friday, described as sexually-explicit.

Reynolds says he found about those from media reports.

Reynolds said, "I immediately began to work for his resignation."

According to a Florida newspaper, Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, who now heads Reynolds' Washington office, had been advising Foley in recent days.

Reynolds said, "We moved and worked to get Foley's resignation, and that was certainly obtained within hours. And Mr. Fordham was helpful in getting that resignation."

But when asked if his chief of staff should have been advising Foley in the first place, Reynolds responded this way:

Reynolds: I don't know what he counseled him on; you'll have to ask him.

Moretti: Will you make him available to us?

Reynolds: That's up to him.

We made that request with Reynolds' office Tuesday, and we were denied the interview.

You can see the entire Reynolds news conference by clicking the link in the left-hand column under "News 4 On Demand".

Wednesday, Tom Reynolds looks to get a campaign boost from the White House. First Lady Laura Bush will attend a luncheon for reynolds in Amherst.

Ex-Pages Brought Explicit Messages To Light (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former congressional pages themselves supplied some of the most damning emails in the scandal that forced the resignation of Rep. Mark Foley, stepping forward only after tamer messages were posted by ABC News on its Web site Thursday.

Several media organizations, along with law-enforcement and congressional officials, had seen the Florida Republican's tamer messages to male teenage pages months ago, but the messages didn't set off alarm bells, even at ABC, which didn't consider them worthy of its broadcast TV news, a reconstruction of events shows.

Brian Ross, chief investigative correspondent at ABC News, said a nonpartisan source provided the "tamer" emails that the network posted on its Web site "The Blotter." Within hours of that posting, "numerous" former House pages emailed ABC with additional allegations about Mr. Foley, Mr. Ross said.

Two former pages -- one who had been sponsored by a Republican member of Congress and one by a Democrat -- offered ABC texts of sexually explicit instant messages purportedly sent by Mr. Foley. Mr. Ross said the network then tracked down the original recipients of those messages, using a page yearbook, and got firsthand confirmation of their authenticity. Mr. Ross said he thinks one of the original recipients was a Democrat and the other a Republican.

Mr. Ross declined to identify any of the sources by name. He described the first tipster as a "Capitol Hill source" -- though not an aide or congressional official -- who was "aware of the pages' complaints" and "concerned about kids and pedophiles." This person, Mr. Ross said, is "involved in public-policy issues" but isn't affiliated with either political party.

DOJ_NMG_0074860

Mr. Ross's account sheds new light on a question that has vexed Washington insiders for days: Why did the story, which had circulated months before to several news outlets, break just five weeks before the election? The timing of the news, which emerged too late for the Republican Party to put a different candidate's name on the ballot in Mr. Foley's congressional district -- has led some Republicans to question whether the sources had partisan political motives.

Appearing with conservative radio show host Rush Limbaugh, House Speaker Dennis Hastert said the opposition was orchestrating the leaks of explicit instant messages between Mr. Foley and former pages dating from 2003. "We have a story to tell, and the Democrats have -- in my view have -- put this thing forward to try to block us from telling the story. They're trying to put us on defense," Mr. Hastert said.

Mr. Ross said that, in his opinion, ABC's path to the story was too convoluted to be part of a broader partisan conspiracy. "The chain of events that just doesn't hold up...in terms of being from a political party," Mr. Ross said. "I know how that works. This was not it."

The pages who provided information to ABC insisted on anonymity, in some cases because they were worried about the impact on their current or future political careers, Mr. Ross said. One of the former pages "is now involved in politics," he added. If his name surfaced "it would be extremely detrimental to him and to his candidate, who is a Republican."

ABC first heard about the tamer emails in August, but Mr. Ross said the network was focused on stories about the anniversaries of Hurricane Katrina and Sept. 11, 2001, and didn't immediately turn to it. He said he wasn't familiar with the Stop Sex Predators blog, which was launched in July. On Sept. 24, 2006, four days before ABC's posting, that blog posted emails from Mr. Foley to a former page that asked how the young man was weathering the hurricane and what he wanted for his birthday.

By that point, several other entities had been tipped to the emails, including the watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, which shared the information with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. Ross said CREW wasn't his initial source for the emails and that he wasn't aware that the group had them. Naomi Seligman Steiner, deputy director of CREW, said her group passed the emails on to the FBI and no one else after receiving them in July. She declined to identify the source of the emails, which the group posted on its Web site after ABC broke the story. The unidentified owner of the Stop Sex Predators blog didn't respond to a request for comment.

Like the other news outlets who had the emails -- and, for that matter, the Republican leaders and aides who were aware of them -- ABC didn't see them as a major story, Mr. Ross said. "It wasn't smoking-gun material," he said.

But posting them on the Internet allowed the network to tap what Mr. Ross described a "general outrage" among former pages about Mr. Foley. "We only got it because we ran the first kind of denial...For him to say he was overfriendly...that somehow aggravated them," Mr. Ross said. Yesterday, ABC, citing instant messages provided by former House pages, reported that in 2003 Mr. Foley interrupted a vote on the House floor to engage in Internet sex with a former page.

Woulda. Coulda. Shoulda? (NYT)

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

The more the House Republican leaders try to defend themselves on the Congressional page scandal, the worse it looks. They still do not seem to appreciate how serious this is, especially for a party that poses as the arbiter of morality. And they appear to be trying harder to deflect blame from themselves than to get to the bottom of what actually happened. The F.B.I. has begun investigating, but that will be a prolonged process, and the voters have to render a verdict in five weeks. There is evidence emerging that they should consider.

Dennis Hastert, the House speaker, is responsible for the page program, and for seeing that the recent improprieties are properly investigated. His performance has been disturbing. As late as Monday, he was still minimizing the scandal. He said he understood that the improper contacts between pages and Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who resigned last week, occurred after the pages left the program. “This was after the fact,” Mr. Hastert said, “and you know — would have, could have, should have.”

First, it’s not at all clear that events transpired after the pages left the program. And, in any case, why is that relevant? Surely preying on ordinary young Americans is just as vile as preying on pages.

Mr. Hastert hardly sounds like an effective leader who intends to investigate the allegations thoroughly, particularly now that the focus is shifting from Mr. Foley’s conduct to whether House leaders covered it up. His remarks struck the same dismissive tone as the White House spokesman Tony Snow’s references to “naughty e-mails.”

It is disturbingly difficult to straighten out the basics of who said and did what when. John Boehner, the majority leader, was saying late last week that he did not recall informing Mr. Hastert that there was a problem with Mr. Foley. Now he is insisting he did and trying to dump the mess in the speaker’s lap. Thomas Reynolds, the New York Republican who heads the National Republican Congressional Committee, insists he told Mr. Hastert this spring of his concerns about Mr. Foley. But Mr. Hastert says he does not recall being told.

DOJ_NMG_0074861

There are more unanswered questions. When John Shimkus, the Illinois Republican who is chairman of the House Page Board, learned of the Foley problem, he informed the House clerk, but not the Democrat on the committee, or anyone in the Democratic leadership. It is unclear why he withheld the information. The pages' well-being should have been his primary concern, not partisan politics.

Mr. Reynolds, who was one of the few members of Congress to know about the Foley problem early on, insists he did all he had to when he "took it to my supervisor," Mr. Hastert. But Mr. Reynolds is a key member of the House leadership, and his constituents need to know whether he knew enough to have done more than he did. We'd also like to know why, in the months when Mr. Reynolds was one of the few people to know of Mr. Foley's misconduct, Mr. Foley contributed $100,000 to Mr. Reynolds's Congressional campaign committee.

Every one of these political leaders is up for re-election next month. Voters should go into the booth with full information about how they all handled this challenge to their leadership.

Accountability In The House (WP)

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

THE HOUSE must name a trustworthy outside investigator to examine the conduct of its leaders and officials in the matter of former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.). The sooner Republican leaders recognize that this is the only responsible -- not to mention politically acceptable -- approach to the scandal, the better off they, and the country, will be. So far, though, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his finger-pointing colleagues have been resolutely resisting this obvious move.

First they called for the notoriously somnolent and dysfunctional House ethics committee to look into the matter. Then they sought to enlist the Justice Department. "This investigation should be thorough, and any violation of the law should be prosecuted," President Bush chimed in yesterday. Fine, but a criminal investigation can deal only with violations of criminal law. The indifferent response of House leaders to Mr. Foley's behavior may be criminal in a moral sense but not, most likely, in a legal one.

Other proposals smell more of a desperate desire to take action than of a considered response. Abolishing the page program doesn't seem advisable, and in any event it would not obviate the need for a reliable investigation. Nor would Mr. Hastert's resignation, particularly if the primary motivation is to have someone take the fall.

Instead, the speaker should instruct the ethics panel to appoint, with bipartisan agreement, an outside investigator to handle the matter -- a former federal judge or a figure with similar independent credibility. This person would need the power to compel testimony and subpoena records. In the interim, the speaker and other members of the leadership -- if they wish to retain any moral claim to remaining House leaders -- must provide a more detailed explanation of their conduct. Mr. Hastert's conflicting statements about whether he was informed about Mr. Foley's "overly friendly" e-mails, and his stated failure to remember any warning about the lawmaker's conduct, are neither convincing nor reassuring. If a colleague told you about such a problem with someone in your office, would you forget it? "I know that he wants all the facts to come out," the president said of Mr. Hastert. Not based on the evidence so far.

The irony here is that, were it not for their reflexive instinct for one-party governance, the Republicans could have spared themselves this scandal, or at least ensured that it was a bipartisan one. But their initial response to reports of a potential problem was to keep it inside the family -- not to inform, for example, the Democratic member responsible for overseeing the page program, Rep. Dale E. Kildee (Mich.). And it's telling that Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) took the problem to the head of the GOP's campaign arm, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), whose role is to get Republicans reelected. Was that the priority all along?

When The House Could Clean Itself (WP)

By Joseph A. Califano Jr.

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

The most troubling aspect of the Mark Foley scandal is not his conduct, disgusting as it was, but what the response of the leadership reveals about the rancid state of partisanship and the consequent decline of the House of Representatives. Speaker Dennis Hastert presides over a legislative body so infested with mistrust that it doesn't even have a functioning ethics committee. Since the House is incapable of washing its own dirty laundry and policing itself, the speaker has to turn over that responsibility to the attorney general and the executive branch of government.

Compare the current situation with the way Speaker Tip O'Neill and the House handled the last scandal involving sexual misconduct with pages, in the summer of 1982.

DOJ_NMG_0074862

On "The CBS Evening News With Dan Rather" that June, two former pages, their teenage faces silhouetted to hide their identity, claimed they were victims of sexual abuse by members of Congress. One described homosexual advances by members; the other shocked the nation when he said he had engaged in homosexual relations with three members and procured prostitutes for others. The CBS broadcast sparked a wildfire of reports and rumors about sexual abuse of pages and drug use by members and pages.

Within a week the House had authorized its ethics committee to conduct a full investigation of allegations of "sexual misconduct, illicit drug distribution and use, and offers of preferential treatment in exchange for sexual favors or drugs by Members, officers or employees of the House." House Speaker O'Neill and Minority Leader Robert Michel asked me to be special counsel to the ethics committee, co-chaired by Ohio Democrat Lou Stokes and South Carolina Republican Floyd Spence. I was allowed to select my own staff and given a commitment that I could follow the evidence wherever it led, because, as O'Neill and Michel said, "The integrity of the House is at stake."

Assistant Deputy Attorney General Rudolph Giuliani was the point man for the Justice Department and its grand jury investigation of the charges. We agreed to exchange all relevant information and that there would be no leaks. Allegations of sexual misconduct and drug use were raw meat for a voracious, scandal-hungry Washington press corps, and Giuliani and I came across rumors and fragments of information about many members of Congress. We shared them all with each other, and there were no leaks from him or me.

The big surprise came when the two pages whom CBS had put on its evening news show recanted. They testified under oath that they had lied and that CBS reporter John Ferrugia had put words in their mouths. But uncovering the lies of the pages and the reckless reporting of CBS didn't end our investigation. We had received a host of allegations of sexual misconduct and drug use and sale by other pages and House members. We interviewed, under oath, some 2,000 past and present pages, adults who had supervised and taught them, congressional staffers, and House members. We issued scores of subpoenas.

We found no evidence of widespread sexual misconduct. We did find that Rep. Daniel Crane (R-Ill.) had had a sexual relationship with a 17-year-old female page and that Rep. Gerry Studds (D-Mass.) had sexual relations with a 17-year-old male page and had made advances to other teenage male pages.

When I reported our findings to O'Neill and Michel, the dishonor that these members had brought on the House infuriated the two leaders. "Get it out," they said, "and let the committee recommend disciplinary action," which its four Democratic and four Republican members did, unanimously, in July 1983. Crane and Studds were censured by the House. Crane resigned his seat. Studds chose to stay on and was retained in office by his constituents for 13 more years.

But the ethics committee had done its job well, we believed. Our investigation found other misdeeds: House members -- two Democrats and a Republican -- had used drugs. And between 1978 and 1982 a number of House and Senate employees were involved in illicit use and distribution of drugs. All were named (Barry Goldwater Jr., who retired from the House; Fred Richmond, who admitted buying and using drugs and later pleaded guilty to tax evasion; and John Burton, who entered rehab and became a recovering addict with a productive career in the California state legislature). The employees were fired and prosecuted. The House adopted all the changes we recommended to provide far more attentive supervision of pages.

The course the House took in that scandal, and its reaction to the current one, show the difference between a leadership that saw a threat to the integrity of the House of Representatives and one that sees a threat to its continuing control of the institution. It's useful today to remember that there was a time when partisanship took second place to trust and the House leadership had the strength to wash its own dirty laundry.

The writer is president of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University. He was President Lyndon Johnson's assistant for domestic affairs and secretary of health, education and welfare in the Carter administration.

Dumping Denny Won't Do It (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

It is a mark of the sheer panic sweeping the ranks of Republican congressmen that one of their most levelheaded members, Ray LaHood of Illinois, has suggested that Congress abolish its page program altogether in the wake of the Mark Foley scandal.

What conclusion are we supposed to draw from LaHood's proposal? That members of Congress cannot be trusted in the company of adolescents? If so, why punish the adolescents? Whatever happened in the Foley case surely wasn't the fault of the pages to whom Foley came on electronically, much less every teenager who has worked, or would like to work, as a page.

If LaHood believes that pages pose an irresistible temptation to his peers, there are surely solutions straight out of the Republican playbook that wouldn't punish the victims. How about building a 700-foot fence around all Republican members of Congress?

DOJ_NMG_0074863

One thing is certain: Just dumping Denny Hastert as speaker, as many conservatives are demanding, won't clean up the Republican act. House Majority Leader John Boehner -- No. 2 in the House GOP hierarchy to Hastert's No. 1 -- now says that the failure to do anything about Foley since his e-mails first became known to the Republican leadership is Hastert's responsibility.

But we also know that Boehner and colleagues Tom Reynolds of New York, who heads the National Republican Congressional Committee; John Shimkus of Illinois, who heads the panel that oversees the page program; and Rodney Alexander of Louisiana, who received the first complaints about Foley, had the same information Hastert had, and presumably they noticed that Mark Foley still walked among them as a member of Congress.

We know that Shimkus neglected to bring up the Foley issue with Michigan's Dale Kildee, the one Democrat on the committee that oversees the page program. We know that all of them put their concern for avoiding a scandal that might damage their party's prospects over whatever fears they may (and should) have entertained about Foley's interactions with the Capitol's cadre of teenagers.

And should House Republicans toss Hastert overboard, then both their leaders in this session will have left the leadership in disgrace. Tom DeLay, after all, is soon to stand trial in Texas for abuses he is alleged to have committed in his drive to secure the House Republican majority by forcing through a mid-decade redistricting in his home state. And dissimilar as Hastert's inaction in the Foley case and DeLay's action in the Texas reapportionment may be, their motives were indisputably identical: elevating the retention of the Republican congressional majority over any concerns about the other consequences -- some legal, some moral -- of their acts.

There were, of course, other ways to ensure that majority short of such desperate expedients. Congressional Republicans might have bethought themselves to exercise some oversight on our war in Iraq, at least forcing the administration to articulate exactly what our strategy is.

They might have crafted a Medicare prescription program less to the drug companies' liking that didn't leave seniors having to fork over thousands of dollars for medications once the program's coverage ran out, as it has for many, at mid-year. They might have raised the minimum wage, something that, by the evidence of every recent poll, a vast majority of Republican rank-and-filers support. They might have raised revenue to cover the cost of the war and all the other programs they support. They might, in short, have made an effort to address the nation's needs.

Instead, the larger purpose of the Republican Congress has been to enrich the rich and to cling to power by all means necessary -- with the financial assistance of the grateful rich. Purging Hastert, like dumping DeLay, does not signal any shift in these priorities. Democratic candidates challenging Republican incumbents are well within their rights to note that their opponent voted to give control of the House to Hastert and DeLay in January of 2005 and to ask why anyone would think he or she would make a better choice next time. What would be different? After all, in not sharing what he knew about Foley with Kildee, Shimkus was merely following the Republicans' practice of cutting the other party out of all legislative deliberations and running the House of, by and emphatically for themselves.

And who are the Republican members of Congress who've opposed this? Who has voted for rules that allow Democrats to offer amendments to key bills from the floor of the House? Who among them would consider not just defenestrating Denny but also changing the way the Republican Congress does business? Nobody springs to mind.

So -- dump the pages? Come now. Let's just dump the Republicans.

Alito: Threat To Judicial Independence At Historic High (LAW)

By Michael Scholl, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 4, 2006

As he was gearing up for this week's start of the new term, the U.S. Supreme Court's newest member took time to stress the importance of judicial independence for a group of Nassau County, N.Y., judges and attorneys.

"I probably don't need to convince the people in this room how important it is for us to preserve our federal and state court systems, which have played such an important part in the government of our country, in the freedoms that we enjoy and in the prosperity that we enjoy," Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. said during a speech Thursday evening at the Mineola, N.Y., headquarters of the Nassau County Bar Association.

"I think this is one of the times in our history when there are some real threats to the federal and state judiciary, and I don't think I'm being too much of an alarmist to say that we could be not too far from the tipping point when an accumulation of things does real damage to these vital institutions," Alito added. "I hope that we can all work to prevent that from happening."

The day before Justice Alito appeared, former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor published a column in The Wall Street Journal decrying attempts by lawmakers and others to intimidate the judiciary.

DOJ_NMG_0074864

"While scorn for certain judges is not an altogether new phenomenon, the breadth and intensity of rage currently being leveled at the judiciary may be unmatched in American history," O'Connor wrote. "The ubiquitous 'activist judges' who 'legislate from the bench' have become central villains on today's domestic political landscape. Elected officials routinely score cheap points by railing against the 'elitist judges' ... . Several jeremiads are published every year warning of the dangers of judicial supremacy and judicial tyranny. Though these attacks generally emit more heat than light, using judges as punching bags presents a grave threat to the independent judiciary."

Among the threats to judicial independence that Alito cited in his half-hour speech is the use of unfounded ethical charges to impugn the integrity of judges and judicial nominees.

"This is extremely damaging," Alito said. "People who go into public service, people who go into a judicial career, cherish their reputations as ethical people."

The judge acknowledged that people who commit genuine ethical violations should be exposed and disciplined. But he added that "to use unfounded ethical charges, which a member of the judiciary is in a poor position to answer, as a weapon to defeat a nominee or to denigrate a sitting judge, is a tactic that ought to be condemned."

Alito said a second threat to judicial independence comes from some members of the news media who undermine public confidence in the judiciary by criticizing judges without just cause.

"The media should be held responsible for the way in which they criticize judges" he said.

Alito said members of the media who air and publish stories critical of decisions often do so without fully grasping the complexity of the rulings.

"To criticize a judicial decision or the conduct of a judge based on sound bites is irresponsible," he said, "and I think there is a danger of that happening and really damaging the institution."

Although he was highly critical of the press, Alito offered no solutions as to how media coverage of the judiciary can be improved. And he emphasized he believes in freedom of the press and that nothing should be done to limit that freedom.

"The First Amendment, I think, is the jewel of our Constitution," he said.

Alito's views were shaped in part by his own experiences with the Supreme Court confirmation process. He noted that, after he was nominated to succeed O'Connor last October, he was subjected to intense media scrutiny.

He said he was initially surprised last fall to find that he would be greeted by a pack of photographers and TV camera crews each time he went to Capitol Hill for pre-confirmation hearing meetings with individual senators last November.

"Eventually it occurred to me that they were waiting for the golden moment when I would fall down the steps," Alito in a comment that brought laughter from his 100-plus-member audience at the annual dinner for the Theodore Roosevelt American Inn of Court, a group of Nassau County judges and attorneys who meet regularly to participate in programs aimed at improving their skills, professionalism and ethics.

Alito said he became the subject of an unfounded ethics charge during his confirmation process when Internet bloggers accused him of lying about his father being born in Italy. Mainstream media outlets quickly began investigating the accusation, which turned out to be untrue.

"The Boston Globe thought this was very important and they hired a professional genealogist to investigate the history of my family, to see where my father was born, and they discovered that in fact he had been born in Italy," Alito said. "This is just an example of some of the things that go on in the media today with nominees, not just for the Supreme Court, but for other positions."

'Neither Force Nor Will, But Merely Judgment' (WSJ)

By William H. Pryor Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

Recently some leaders of the bench and bar -- including, on this page last week, retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor -- have decried what they describe as unprecedented threats to the independence of the judiciary. I respectfully disagree. Although the fringes of American politics offer a few disturbing examples of ignorance of the judicial function, I agree with Justice Clarence Thomas, who observed in 1999, "What is truly surprising about today's judiciary is how strong it really is." My disagreement with those who say that the independence of the judiciary is under siege is three-fold:

Contemporary criticisms of the judiciary are relatively mild. To charge that the current disappointment regarding judges is unprecedented is to diminish the sacrifices that earlier giants of the judiciary endured. During the civil rights struggle, the ostracism and abuses suffered by federal judges in the Deep South -- including Frank Johnson, John Minor Wisdom and Skelly Wright -- were far worse than the current criticisms of judicial activism. Other historical moments also provide provocative counterexamples. As Justice Stephen Breyer stated several years ago, "We run no risk of returning to the days when a president

DOJ_NMG_0074865

(responding to [the Supreme] Court's efforts to protect the Cherokee Indians) might have said, 'John Marshall has made his decision; now let him enforce it!'"

Many contemporary criticisms of judicial decisions by politicians are no more heated than the criticisms written by jurists in dissenting opinions. In Roper v. Simmons, Justice O'Connor protested that "the Court [had] preempt[ed] the democratic debate through which genuine consensus might develop." Justice Breyer warned, in what he called the "highly politicized matter" of Bush v. Gore, that "the appearance of a split decision runs the risk of undermining the public's confidence in the Court itself." Consider also the harsh words of Justice William Brennan in Oregon v. Elstad: "the Court mischaracterizes our precedents, obfuscates the central issues, and altogether ignores the practical realities . . . that have led nearly every lower court to reject its simplistic reasoning."

Some who complain about the current climate of criticism point to the bizarre example of Justice Tom Parker of the Alabama Supreme Court, who recently castigated his colleagues for following the ruling of the Supreme Court in Roper, which prohibited use of the death penalty for 16- and 17-year-old murderers, but there is a good ending to this story from my home state. Not only did the other members of the Alabama court faithfully apply Roper, with which many of them disagreed, but Justice Parker's political gambit failed miserably. He ran for chief justice of Alabama, aligned with his mentor, former Chief Justice Roy Moore, who ran for governor; both were trounced in the Republican primary. Their twisted ideas of opposing activist decisions by defying judicial decrees went nowhere, even in a state with a shameful history of defiance of federal authority. The Alabama justices who did their duty all prevailed in their primary contests. Alabama has come a long way since the days of Governor Wallace standing in the schoolhouse door.

There have been recent and reprehensible incidents of violence and threats against judges, but we should not forget that those kinds of terrible crimes have occurred before. I work, for example, in the former chambers of the late Judge Robert Vance, who was murdered by a mail bomber in 1989. These offenses typically involve disgruntled litigants or dangerous criminals, not harsh critics of the judiciary as a whole. I am grateful that Congress reacted swiftly to these recent threats by providing home security systems for federal judges, which suggests that the public still appreciates the need for an independent judiciary.

The judiciary has rendered some unjust decisions that deserved harsh rebuke. The judiciary is not perfect. The twin evils of slavery and segregation were, to say the least, exacerbated by two decisions of the Supreme Court. Justice John Marshall Harlan's dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson was prophetic: "In my opinion, the judgment this day rendered will, in time, prove to be quite as pernicious as the decision made by this tribunal in the Dred Scott Case." The judgment of history has been equally unkind to the decision in Korematsu v. United States.

Many who complain about criticisms of the judiciary concede that some criticism of judicial decisions is fair. That assessment is too mild. Occasionally criticism of judicial decisions is essential to the progress of our constitutional republic. That was true when Lincoln opposed Dred Scott, and it was true when Thurgood Marshall, as an attorney, urged the court to depart from Plessy.

Many Americans today believe that more recent decisions of the court are also terribly wrong. Some decry the flaws of criminal sentencing systems and the propensity to incarcerate low-risk offenders, while others lambaste sentences that appear to be lenient. On these fronts, citizens are more, not less, likely to respect the rule of law when they know that the law can be criticized and changed by ordinary political processes. Readers of this publication need no reminder about the potential for judicial abuse. Time and again, the business community has turned to Congress and state legislatures to reform tort laws, class actions and securities litigation, to name a few. These efforts are a healthy part of our democratic process and a recognition of the fallibility of the judiciary.

Judges must do more than respond to criticisms; we must exercise restraint. Judges have a unique responsibility to safeguard our independence. It is not too much for us to look in the mirror and ask whether some criticisms are fair. As Justice Harlan explained in Plessy, "[T]he courts best discharge their duty by executing the will of the lawmaking power, constitutionally expressed, leaving the results of legislation to be dealt with by the people through their representatives." Perhaps, even today, we sometimes fail in that limited duty.

Alexander Hamilton explained in Federalist No. 78 that judges exercise "neither FORCE nor WILL, but merely judgment." Hamilton's point was that we must depend upon the persuasiveness of our written opinions to command the respect of our fellow citizens. In that way, we have the foremost responsibility of safeguarding our independence.

Mr. Pryor is a member of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit. In 2003, while serving as attorney general of Alabama, he prosecuted and removed Roy Moore from his state judicial office based on his misconduct in defying a federal injunction.

In Wake Of Changes, Seniors Urged To Revisit Medicare Drug Plans (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The rollout of Medicare prescription drug plans for 2007 last week was heralded by federal officials as a trifecta of good news: low premiums, more choices and better coverage, particularly in the feared "coverage gap."

Health care analysts and consumer advocates have a different view: The lowest premiums, sought by healthy seniors who join the program to avoid future penalties, will rise exponentially. Additional choices mean that beneficiaries in all but two states will have to choose from more than 50 plans. And most of the "gap coverage" will be for generic drugs only. Currently, 94% of beneficiaries in the program face a gap from the time they have paid about $750 until they've paid $3,600.

For these and other reasons, millions of seniors and people with disabilities are being urged to re-examine the plan they chose for this year and compare plans again.

"The right plan for someone in 2006 might not be the right plan in 2007," says Tricia Neuman of the Kaiser Family Foundation, a health research organization. "The concern is that products are changing, but seniors won't."

Medicare officials unveiled details about the program's second year last week, including the number of plans to be offered, premiums, deductibles and types of coverage. They emphasized that average monthly premiums will stay below $24, far less than the $37 originally projected. At the same time, they said, companies are adding new forms of coverage.

"Competition is working," said Mark McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. "They are adding plans that people want."

Companies began marketing those plans Sunday. Further details, including the drugs covered and the co-payments, will emerge later this month. Enrollment begins Nov. 15 for the year beginning Jan. 1.

"There could be a lot of changes, and every Medicare beneficiary is going to have to go back and recalculate what is best for them," says Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm.

Among the changes that beneficiaries will need to watch out for:

·The lowest monthly premium is rising to $9.50 in New York, up from $1.87 in seven Midwestern states in 2006. (Puerto Rico will have a $1.90 plan.) Some states' lowest price will be close to $20.

·The number of plans will rise by 30%. Beneficiaries in most states will have between 50 and 60 to choose from. New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia will have more than 60. Only Alaska and Hawaii will have fewer than 50.

·Far more plans will cover some drugs in the coverage gap — about 15 such plans per state. Only 2% of plans, however, will offer complete coverage in the gap for all brand-name drugs, and the cost is going up. This year, monthly premiums for such coverage averaged $61. Next year, the average will be $100, with a high of $136.

And unlike this year, when such plans were offered in 46 states, only 37 will have them next year.

Karen Ignagni, president of the American Association of Health Plans, says seniors should "take a very close look at all of their choices."

Officials Scale Back Rx-benefit Outreach (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, October 4, 2006

With the next sign-up period for the Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit just weeks away, beneficiaries will not see an outreach campaign of the same scale as the effort employed by the Bush administration and the private sector during the program's inaugural year.

The onslaught of paid advertising, national news coverage and public events featuring President Bush and senior administration officials is not going to be repeated during this go around, according to federal Medicare representatives.

In addition, the broad coalition that bolstered the government's efforts to promote Part D does not plan to spend nearly as much on advertising and public relations this year.

Rather than introducing a brand-new benefit to Medicare's 43 million beneficiaries, the administration, healthcare groups and senior-citizens' groups such as the AARP will be applying more focused strategies, particularly targeting low-income beneficiaries who haven't signed up.

The poorest beneficiaries are eligible for comprehensive and practically free drug coverage but proved the hardest to sign up for 2006.

Administration officials insist that they have learned the right lessons from the first year. Yet critics caution that glitches might resurface.

The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) says it has enhanced the information that will be available to beneficiaries online and through its toll-free hotline.

DOJ_NMG_0074867

The federal government's outreach program "will be very broad and very deep," said Kathleen Harrington, the director of CMS's Office of External Affairs. Springboarding off of last year's major campaign "will certainly give us an opportunity" to use a more targeted approach, she said.

The enrollment period begins Nov. 15 and lasts six weeks, compared to the six months Medicare beneficiaries had to sign up for the first year of the program. Those who want to keep the plans they already have do not have to take any action.

The administration says that it will utilize the infrastructure that it established last year, which combined the government's resources with those of state authorities, senior-citizens' groups, pharmacists, physicians and others who regularly interact with older people.

CMS's budget for Part D outreach is about one-sixth of what it had to spend for the 2006 sign-up period, Harrington said. The agency does not plan to air any ads on national television, though it will buy print ads and will use radio spots to reach Hispanic and African-American audiences.

Like CMS, the Medicare Rx Education Network also plans to scale back its activities, spokespeople said. The group is a diverse coalition backed by the drug industry, physicians, disease-advocacy groups and organizations like the AARP.

"Our effort is clearly not as large as it was previously," said John Jonas, the senior partner at Patton Boggs who heads the firm's healthcare group and represents the network. Because the program has been in existence for a year already, outreach for 2007 "doesn't require the same effort," he said. Moreover, he said, there was "a lot of dollars last year [that are] not available now."

"It's less of 'Medicare Part D 101,'" observed Eugenia Edwards, a senior public policy specialist at Patton Boggs.

Jonas and Edwards emphasized that the network would concentrate its resources on the low-income population. "It's really important to find these people," Edwards said.

The AARP says it is poised to make an aggressive push to reach out to low-income beneficiaries. "We're redoubling our efforts to reach those who need this the most," said Mark Kitchens, AARP's director of media relations.

The group does not currently plan to run national television ads but will buy space in community newspapers in cities with high numbers of low-income Medicare beneficiaries, such as Miami, Houston and Chicago. The AARP also will publicize the enrollment period in its own magazine, which the group boasts has the highest circulation of any publication in the world.

AARP state offices will assist people in their communities, and the group has a telephone hotline, Kitchens added.

One organization that has consistently criticized the structure of the drug benefit and the administration's handling of its implementation believes that beneficiaries are still going to need a lot of help, a spokeswoman said.

Although the administration has a year of experience under its belt, the problems that surfaced last year should make beneficiaries cautious as they approach the program, said Maria Freese, director of government relations and policy at the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare.

Freese said that the biggest cause for concern is that CMS had difficulties last year providing accurate information about the drug plan options.

The "Medicare & You" handbook sent out last year contained errors, the CMS website used to compare drug plans was not always accurate, and the Government Accountability Office faulted CMS for the performance of its call center. The administration said at the time that all of those problems had been addressed.

Seniors need the best possible information to determine whether they are already in the most appropriate plan or to choose a plan for the first time. Last year's glitches "undermine[d] confidence in the system," Freese said. As for this year, she added, "You won't know until you get part way through the year and find out" whether the right choices were made.

Markets And Medicare (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

If you're looking for some good news from Washington, consider this semi-miracle: The Medicare prescription drug benefit is so far costing less than anticipated, while seniors are getting more insurance options at lower prices. Lesson: Maybe private competition works.

This doesn't mean we're changing our minds that the new drug entitlement was a policy mistake at an estimated long-term cost of $8 trillion, give or take a trillion. But now that the program exists, it matters whether it turns into another price-controlled, one-size-fits-all federal entitlement, or whether the seeds of market competition planted in the bill are allowed to grow.

The early returns are encouraging, on both price and choice. Over the weekend insurers began marketing their 2007 Medicare drug plans, and all states except Hawaii and Alaska have more than 50 private options available -- up from an average of about 40 in 2006. Seventeen insurers are selling nationwide plans, up from nine this year. That compares with the one or two that critics of including private plans predicted would be available in many markets.

DOJ_NMG_0074868

The average monthly premium that seniors pay is again $24, far lower than the $37 originally estimated by government actuaries. And while Democrats have hammered away at the idea that having seniors choose among competing drug plans is too "confusing," recent polls show satisfaction with the benefit in the 80% range.

All of this would also seem to rebut the current Democratic campaign theme that having drug prices "negotiated" -- i.e., dictated -- by government is an urgent priority. Democrats point to the drug coverage provided by the Veteran's Administration as a model. But the VA usually keeps costs down by refusing to pay for newer, more effective medicines. The VA drug formulary includes only 19% of the medicines approved by the FDA since 2000.

One of our fears about the drug program is that it will devolve into price controls, thus destroying incentives for research and development as European governments have done. It would be a cruel irony if the Medicare drug benefit were to have the effect of delaying the cure for, say, Alzheimer's. Yet this is where Democrats seem to want to go.

Which brings us to the private delivery of Medicare as a whole. For the moment, the bulk of such Medicare services as doctor and hospital visits are covered by a price-fixing bureaucracy no more efficient than any other system of socialized medicine. At some $600 billion, the Medicare budget is larger than the GDP of all but a few nations.

The better option is a so-called premium support model, in which the government would simply help seniors buy private insurance. Our main disappointment with the 2003 bill was the Republican failure to use the drug benefit carrot to reform Medicare along these lines. But at least the law did strengthen the existing private options in Medicare.

The old Medicare Plus Choice program has been renamed Medicare Advantage and is growing impressively. As of July about 17% of Medicare beneficiaries were choosing a comprehensive private insurance program under Medicare Advantage (rather than pay the hodgepodge of premiums for Parts A, B and D) -- up from about 14% late last year. Medicare Advantage also isn't merely an HMO program anymore; a growing number of plans offer see-any-doctor, out-of-network benefits.

Ideally, a future Medicare program would offer premium support so retirees can take the private insurance they have during their working years into retirement and through old age. A successful Medicare Advantage program will do a lot to help people understand why that's an attractive option.

However, this is also the reason that many Democrats hate Medicare Advantage. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi accuses it, inaccurately, of "catering to the HMOs," and the Clinton Administration tried to strangle its private predecessor in the crib by squeezing government payments. The government already pays for about half the health care delivered in the U.S., and those who favor European-style health care have been counting on the demographics of an aging population and an unreformed Medicare program to move America further toward that goal.

Mark McClellan, the Bush appointee who has done so well in supervising the Medicare drug launch, is about to step down, so the choice of his successor will be crucial to keeping this market momentum. All the more so if Democrats take the House or Senate, where Henry Waxman, Pete Stark and others wait to do whatever it takes to show that the free market can't work in health care.

We'd have thought Republicans would be trumpeting the success of market competition in producing more choices and lower prices in Medicare, but instead most of them are merely advertising the new entitlement. Even they seem not to understand the stakes in making competition in Medicare work.

Education Dept. Urged To Recoup $278 Million In Loan Subsidies (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

The federal Department of Education will have to decide whether to seek to recover hundreds of millions of dollars in student loan subsidy payments to a loan company that the department's inspector general has found were improper.

In a report released late last week, the inspector general recommended that the department recover $278 million paid to Nelnet, a student lender based in Lincoln, Neb. The payments were made under a program that guarantees a 9.5 percent interest rate on some loans regardless of prevailing market rates.

The subsidies were offered in the 1980's to support the federal student loan program at a time when market interest rates were higher. But as interest rates fell to historic lows in recent years, the subsidy program offered a way for lenders to earn higher-than-market returns.

Since some payments continue under the program, which has been criticized by lawmakers and student advocates, the report warned that the government might improperly pay $882 million more to Nelnet unless the department took action. The inspector general gave Nelnet 30 days to respond to the report.

Nelnet challenged the report's findings. Mike Dunlap, chairman and co-chief executive of the company, said, "We will continue to seek a resolution of this matter with the department and will also examine all other available remedies that prove the merits of our position."

DOJ_NMG_0074869

Katherine McLane, press secretary for the Education Department, said it was "reviewing the report and will consider Nelnet's response before issuing a decision."

An audit by the inspector general's office found that through a series of financing moves, Nelnet increased the size of its portfolio of loans eligible for the guaranteed interest rate to nearly $3.7 billion in June 2004, from $551 million in March 2003. The report found that the increased amount of loans "was ineligible to be billed under the 9.5 percent floor." Representative George Miller of California, the senior Democrat on the House education committee, said the department should recover the payments.

"We must be vigilant about ensuring that available tax dollars are used to provide affordable college loans to families, not to provide excessive subsidies to banks," he said.

Michael Dannenberg, director of education policy at the New America Foundation, a nonpartisan public policy research institute in Washington, said, "When a student loan company like Nelnet rips off taxpayers on college loans, students and families end up with less" financial aid.

Congress tried to eliminate the 9.5 percent guarantee in the early 1990's, but some lenders were allowed to keep collecting the higher interest rates.

"This is a typical story of a complicated program hidden from the scrutiny of taxpayers who are getting ripped off," said Luke Swarthout, higher education advocate at U.S. Public Interest Research Group in Washington. "To really solve this problem requires the Department of Education to stop payment on these illicit 9.5 percent loans and to demand repayment for subsidies that were wrongly charged."

Democrats Renew Efforts To Block Lawmakers' Pay Raise (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 4, 2006

Democrats are renewing their vow to impede the annual congressional pay raise until the minimum wage is increased, but their options for a successful block during the lame-duck session likely depend on the outcome of the Nov. 7 midterm election.

Senate Minority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) was the latest senior Democrat to reiterate his party's intention to oppose the cost-of-living increase lawmakers have received automatically for more than a decade until the minimum wage is raised for the first time since 1997.

"It's not a threat, it's a promise. Until minimum-wage workers get an increase in pay, Congress is not going to get an increase in pay," Durbin said at a press conference last Thursday sponsored by the AFL-CIO and ACORN (Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now).

Durbin was joined by Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), whose bill to tie future minimum-wage increases to congressional pay raises has attracted increasing Democratic focus since its spring introduction. Durbin declined to offer details of how Democrats plan to stave off members' 2 percent hike. Traditionally, it is thwarted only with an amendment to an appropriations bill.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), said in an e-mail that Democrats have not abandoned their pledge to fight members' raises despite the lack of progress on a minimum-wage vote before the election.

"Hard work still deserves fair pay, and Democrats still think Congress shouldn't get a raise unless the American people get one first," Manley said. "We will continue to pursue all our options in the lame duck."

The Democratic effort to tie member pay to the minimum wage even after the election signals to core allies in labor and community groups that Democratic leaders believe the issue transcends politics — that "it is in concrete how important this is to" them, in the words of Chuck Loveless, legislative director for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME).

Yet political considerations are likely to determine how far Democrats can take their quest to impede the pay raise, or if the issue gets addressed at all, appropriations experts and supporters of the effort said.

"If you know you're in the minority and you're going to remain in the minority, you've got few options for winning on the minimum wage," said Scott Lilly, a longtime Democratic staff director on the House Appropriations Committee and now a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress. "Tying this pay increase to it is more of a strategy you would be focused on if you thought you couldn't proceed for a straight increase in the minimum wage."

Conversely, Lilly added, a Democratic takeover of one or both houses likely would curtail the lame-duck session as Republicans turn their attention to new leadership elections. "If Republicans lose the House, they will probably be here in November for about a half-hour," he said.

James Dyer, a former GOP House Appropriations staff director turned Clark & Weinstock lobbyist, concurred with that prediction.

DOJ_NMG_0074870

"I think the bottom line is, they're going to wait and see how the elections go," Dyer said. "If Democrats took one or more houses, the process [of raising the minimum wage] could be booted to January."

Dyer recalled that senior Democrats and Republicans hailed the 1989 passage of the Ethics in Government Act that made lawmakers' cost-of-living increases automatic. Members gave up their limited ability to earn outside income as part of that agreement, he said, making any permanent changes to the pay raise process – such as the Clinton-Kennedy bill — a potentially dicey proposition on both sides of the aisle.

"This is a painful issue. It's not as black-and-white as whether you're going to provide folks with an increase in the minimum wage," Dyer said.

The House has considered an amendment from Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) to block the annual member raise, though a vote on Matheson's actual language was procedurally prevented. More Republicans sided with Matheson than did members of his own party, with 92 GOP members and 74 Democrats voting no in June.

The Senate has yet to address any challenges to the members' raise, historically done in the Treasury Department appropriations bill. One Senate Democratic aide said leaders are reluctant to tip their hand because they want to preserve their parliamentary options, not because they want to unleash a surprise strategy.

The aide mentioned the Senate's rarely invoked Rule 14, which allows any member to bring a bill straight onto the Senate's legislative calendar. The Clinton-Kennedy minimum wage bill remains under committee jurisdiction, but another bill calling for a straight minimum-wage increase has been on the Senate calendar since last year.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), who only agrees to accept pay raises after he is newly reelected, is proceeding with his plans to force a vote on the issue. "As I have done in the past, I will look for every opportunity to make senators vote on raising their own pay, and I will support any other efforts that will accomplish the same thing," Feingold said through a spokesman.

Feingold's bid to hold down member salaries saw surprising success last year, when senators agreed to forfeit their raises as a symbolic gesture after Hurricane Katrina, but the pay-raise block was stripped during conference talks.

House Democrats, meanwhile, continue to call on the 48 Republicans who pushed their leadership earlier this year for a vote on the minimum-wage increase to sign a discharge petition to force a vote on Rep. George Miller's (D-Calif.) wage hike bill. The only two GOP members on the petition, Reps. Christopher Shays (Conn.) and Jim Leach (Iowa), attached their names in July.

House GOP leaders still must address the minimum-wage increase attached to its Labor, Health and Human Services appropriations bill. Dyer offered a solution to that roadblock: "What Republicans could do, if they wanted to play hardball, is ask the Appropriations Committee to produce an omnibus that didn't have [the minimum wage] on it."

That move, in turn, could force Senate Democrats to filibuster an omnibus appropriations bill as part of any drive to block this year's member pay raise. AFL-CIO legislative director Bill Samuel recalled the narrow defeat of an early 2004 omnibus filibuster over new rules for overtime pay, another key labor concern.

"The question is if [the minimum wage and pay raise debate] comes down to filibustering an omnibus appropriations bill. It's difficult; we tried it," Samuel said. "But I think there will be a lot of energy behind [this year's fight]."

Senators Ask For Pension Agency Probe (AP-Y)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, October 3, 2006

Two senators are asking Congress to find out whether the federal agency that insures private pension plans for millions of Americans has enough money and the right approach to do its job.

Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, and the panel's top-ranking Democrat, Max Baucus, D-Mont., said Tuesday they want the Government Accountability Office to report back by early next year with preliminary information on the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., which insures traditional, defined benefit pension plans.

Bankrupt steel and airline companies that have transferred pension responsibilities to the PBGC have been a major factor in the growing demands placed on the agency and its swollen debt.

At the end of 2005, the agency recorded a deficit of $22.8 billion.

In their letter to the GAO, the senators said that 80 percent of all claims against the PBGC have come since 2000.

In 2000, the agency paid benefits of $900 million to 243,000 people. Five years later, PBGC was paying $3.7 billion in benefits to 698,000 people, the senators wrote.

"This rapid increase in participants, benefit payments and investments would be a challenge to any organization," the senators wrote. "We are particularly concerned in how PBGC is handling this challenge and whether legislative changes are needed in PBGC's structure, appropriations or law."

DOJ_NMG_0074871

President Bush in August signed a bill to help the nation's troubled pension system by shoring up funding for traditional pensions. Supporters hope the changes will prevent a costly taxpayer bailout of the PBGC.

PBGC's operations are financed by insurance premiums paid by companies that sponsor traditional pension plans. It also earns money from investments and receives funds from pension plans it takes over. The agency is not funded through tax revenues.

The fear, however, has been that a taxpayer-funded bailout could happen at some point if the private pension system wasn't overhauled by Congress.

Separately, PBGC said Tuesday that it has taken responsibility for a pension plan covering more than 1,600 workers and retirees of Levitz Home Furnishing Inc. of Woodbury, N.Y. The agency said that the takeover of the plan will have no material effect on its balance sheet.

___

On the Net:

PBGC: http://www.pbgc.gov/

Labor Board Eases Supervisor Rule (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

In three widely anticipated decisions, the National Labor Relations Board opened the door for some employers to classify more workers as supervisors and exclude them from union representation. The decisions outraged unions, but didn't go as far as business groups had hoped.

In the main decision, by a 3-2 vote, the five-member board said nurses who independently assigned staff based on such things as patient conditions, and were involved in such decision-making more than 15% of their time regularly, should be considered supervisors and exempt from collective-bargaining protections.

At issue in the cases, which stemmed from union organizing attempts, were U.S. labor-law provisions that state workers who use "independent judgment" in a "nonroutine" manner to assign or direct other employees, should be considered supervisors, even if they don't have employees who report directly to them. Supervisors aren't guaranteed collective-bargaining rights under the law. A broader interpretation could exclude more workers.

Labor experts said the decisions were likely to result in more nurses and other workers being classified as supervisors. But its application to other industries is difficult to predict, in part because the responsibilities of workers can vary widely across industries and even workplaces, said John Raudabaugh, a partner at Baker & McKenzie LLP in Chicago, who served as a board member from 1990 to 1993.

In other professions, such as movie production, certain factors not considered in the rulings, such as collaborative decision making, could be central to deciding who is a supervisor, he said. "I think it has great weight in health care, but it remains to be seen how it is applied in other industrial settings," he said.

The decisions, which were expected to favor employers at a board controlled by Bush administration appointees, could at a minimum hinder labor's chances of organizing workers in the fast-growing health-care sector. Business groups generally applauded the decision in the lead case, concerning nurses at Oakwood Healthcare Inc. in Taylor, Mich., saying the board clarified the standard it uses to determine such issues as what it means to use independent judgment when assigning work for other employees.

But in two cases, the board disagreed with employer arguments and found that nurses at a nursing home and lead workers at a manufacturer weren't supervisors because they either didn't have the authority to assign other workers or followed company policies in a routine manner when they directed other workers and didn't have the ability to discipline workers who performed poorly. "I'm pleased with the standard but disappointed in the result" of the other two cases, said Steve Bokat, executive vice president of the litigation center at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

In one case, the board found that nurses at Golden Crest Healthcare Center in Hibbing, Minn., didn't have the authority to assign other nurses. Similarly, in the third case, lead workers including load supervisors who work in the shipping department loading trucks at Croft Metals Inc., based in McComb, Miss., didn't use judgment deemed independent enough to qualify as supervisory, the board found.

Economists said it was hard to predict how the decisions might affect factors such as labor costs. If employers tried to make certain workers qualify as supervisors by creating new responsibilities for them, they would risk incurring other costs as a result of lost productivity should workers turn down such work, said Lonnie Golden, an associate professor of economics and labor studies at Penn State-Abington.

DOJ_NMG_0074872

The AFL-CIO and other labor groups blasted the board, saying the decisions opened the door for millions of workers to lose the right to join a union and imperiled the status of other workers who are already union members. Under labor law, the decisions can't be directly appealed, but the labor federation said it will litigate the same issues in other cases pending before the board and push for a legislative fix to the law.

Rose Ann DeMoro, executive director of the California Nurses Association, called the decisions "horrendous," and said it would cause nurses to turn down work as charge nurses and trigger protests by nurses across the country. "Ultimately what this has done is redefine a 'registered nurse,'" she said.

Board Redefines Rules For Union Exemption (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

In a decision condemned by unions but praised by business, the National Labor Relations Board issued a ruling yesterday that will exempt registered nurses — and many other workers — from union membership if they have certain kinds of supervisory duties.

Some labor experts predicted that the ruling could affect more than eight million workers who might also be deemed supervisors, including teachers who oversee aides. The board's 3-to-2 decision involved nurses overseeing shifts at a Michigan hospital.

But in two related cases, the board ruled that workers with limited supervisory duties were not supervisors.

Labor unions have long feared such a decision, so much so that, in an unusual move, they held demonstrations at the labor board's offices in July to urge it not to issue an expansive ruling that would exempt many workers from union coverage.

In the majority decision, the three Republicans on the board adopted a broad definition of supervisor, saying it included workers who assigned others to a location, shift or significant tasks, like a nurse overseeing a shift who might assign another nurse to a particular patient.

The majority ruled that workers should generally be deemed supervisors, exempt from union membership, if they oversaw another employee and could be held accountable if that subordinate performed poorly. The majority also ruled that workers could be deemed supervisors if they were assigned supervisory duties just 10 percent to 15 percent of their total work time.

In a stinging dissent, the two Democrats on the board, Wilma B. Liebman and Dennis P. Walsh, wrote, "Today's decision threatens to create a new class of workers under federal labor law: workers who have neither the genuine prerogatives of management, nor the statutory rights of ordinary employees."

The dissenters asserted that most of the nation's more than 20 million professional workers could fall into that category because many professionals, like a doctor overseeing nurses or a lawyer overseeing a secretary, could be deemed supervisors under the board's new guidelines.

The case focused on workers who did not perform functions like hiring, promoting or laying off workers, but rather assigning and directing other employees — functions in which the supervisory role was more ambiguous. The board's majority emphasized that to be considered a supervisor, workers had to exercise independent judgment, although it adopted a more expansive view of such judgment than previous labor boards had.

The majority comprised the chairman, Robert J. Battista; Peter C. Schaumber; and Peter N. Kirsanow.

Steve Bokat, general counsel for the United States Chamber of Commerce, said the decision did not go as far as business had wanted, adding that estimates that millions of workers would be exempted from union coverage were "outrageous numbers."

"I think it's a good test that the majority has laid out," Mr. Bokat said, "a reasonable test, one that employers and their counsel can apply."

John J. Sweeney, the president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., said the ruling "welcomes employers to strip millions of workers of their right to have a union by reclassifying them as supervisors, in name only."

Organized labor said the ruling continued a trend in which President Bush and the labor board had exempted groups of workers from union coverage, including graduate teaching assistants, disabled workers and many Defense Department employees.

The board's ruling interprets a 2001 Supreme Court decision in which Justice Antonin Scalia, writing for a 5-to-4 majority, asserted that the labor board, then dominated by appointees of President Clinton, had adopted too strict a test in deciding when workers were supervisors.

Yesterday's decision could exclude many retail workers, like department heads in supermarkets or discount stores, from joining unions. The majority wrote, "The assignment of an employee to a certain department (e.g., housewares) or to a certain shift (e.g., night) or to certain significant overall tasks (e.g., restocking shelves) would generally qualify" as having the supervisory responsibility of assigning.

DOJ_NMG_0074873

The decision also stated, “If a person on the shop floor has ‘men under him,’ and if that person decides ‘what job shall be undertaken next or who shall do it,’ that person is a supervisor, provided that the direction is both ‘responsible’ ” and “carried out with independent judgment.”

William B. Gould IV, who was board chairman under Mr. Clinton, said the decision’s “shift in statutory interpretation is a seismic one.” Mr. Gould said that with the board setting forth rules on what employers must do to prove that employees are supervisors, “the potential for manipulation is substantial.”

The board’s main decision yesterday involved Oakwood Heritage Hospital, an acute care facility in Taylor, Mich., with 257 beds and 181 registered nurses. The decision focused on a dozen nurses who worked in intensive care, medical/surgical and other units, and oversaw several other nurses, nurses’ aides and technicians.

The union that sought to represent them, the United Automobile Workers, asserted that they should not be deemed supervisors on the ground that their supervisory duties were minor and routine, and required so little independent judgment. But the hospital argued that they should be considered supervisors on the ground that they assigned nurses and nurses’ aides to particular patients and directed them by giving them specific responsibilities, all while using independent judgment.

Another board decision released yesterday involved some 30 “lead persons” working for Croft Metals, a door and window factory in McComb, Miss. The board ruled that the company had not established that these workers exercised independent judgment in directing their crews. The board suggested that their judgment was simply routine.

A third decision involved the Golden Crest Healthcare Center, a nursing home in Hibbing, Minn. The board ruled that the employer had not established that the nurses in charge had met the definition of assigning or directing other workers. It found that the nursing home had failed to show that those nurses were held accountable when their subordinates failed to perform properly.

Pamela Thompson, chief executive of the American Organization of Nurse Executives, an industry organization, said, “Since hospital staffing can vary, not only hospital to hospital but hour by hour, this decision will play out differently hospital by hospital.”

Some Workers Change Collars (WP)

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

The National Labor Relations Board ruled yesterday that nurses with full-time responsibility for assigning fellow hospital workers to particular tasks are supervisors under federal labor law and thus not eligible to be represented by unions.

The 3-to-2 decision, long awaited by unions and businesses, sets a new standard for determining who is a supervisor in the modern economy, and could have significant implications for efforts by labor unions to organize nurses in the fast-growing health-care sector. Under federal law, supervisors do not have the right to belong to unions.

Labor leaders decried the ruling, with AFL-CIO President John Sweeney saying it "welcomes employers to strip millions of workers of their right to have a union by reclassifying them as 'supervisors' in name only." The labor-backed Economic Policy Institute said the new definition could affect 8 million workers who give direction to fellow workers in fields ranging from construction to accounting.

Business organizations applauded the decision, arguing that it will not have sweeping effects. "The business community thinks the standard is reasonable, but this is not a sea change," said Steve Bokat of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The dispute, involving Oakwood Healthcare Inc., is one of many cases in a contentious area of labor law that have awaited a ruling since 2001, when the Supreme Court took issue with the NLRB's interpretation under the Clinton administration of what constitutes a supervisor. Since then, control of the NLRB has shifted to Republicans, who hold three of the five positions.

The case concerns Oakwood Heritage Hospital in suburban Detroit, where the United Auto Workers is trying to organize 181 registered nurses. The hospital had argued that 127 of the nurses -- two-thirds of the potential bargaining unit -- should be deemed supervisors and thus ineligible for union representation.

The NLRB disqualified only 12 of the nurses from belonging to the bargaining unit -- all full-time "charge nurses" whom the board deemed to be supervisors because of their responsibility for assigning and directing other workers on their shifts. But AFL-CIO associate general counsel Craig Becker argued that the decision was broader than it appeared, leaving room for nurses who rotate only temporarily through the job of charge nurse to be disqualified as well. And Barbara Medvec, senior vice president of Oakwood Healthcare, said the hospital will likely ask the NLRB to rule that another 115 nurses are supervisors for that reason.

The ruling defines workers as supervisors if they give assignments to other workers, if they are held responsible for the performance of those assignments and if they exercise independent judgment rather than follow an employer's detailed instructions. NLRB members Wilma B. Liebman and Dennis P. Walsh, the only Democrats on the board, argued in dissent that the definition was so broad it "threatens to create a new class of workers under Federal labor law: workers who have neither the genuine prerogatives of management, nor the statutory rights of ordinary employees."

DOJ_NMG_0074874

Bokat likened the unions' warnings to "Chicken Little saying 'the sky is going to fall.' " He pointed out that the NLRB, in applying the new definition to two other pending cases, found in both that the workers in question were not supervisors. Those two cases concerned charge nurses at Golden Crest Healthcare Center, a long-term care facility in Minnesota, and team leaders at Croft Metals Inc., a window manufacturer in Mississippi. "The result speaks for itself," Bokat said. "We were kind of disappointed."

Nurses who work only occasionally as charge nurses could be disqualified from joining unions under the decision, according to the AFL-CIO's Becker. He noted that the ruling defines a supervisor as an employee who spends "a regular and substantial portion of his/her work time performing supervisory functions." But the decision defines "regular" as meaning "according to a pattern or schedule" and "substantial" as "at least 10-15 percent of their total work time."

"If the next employer comes forward with evidence that someone is a charge nurse in one of every three shifts or one out of every four weeks, that would meet the definition of a pattern or schedule," he said.

University of Tennessee labor law professor Jeff Hirsch said the decision is important because the lines between workers and supervisors are blurring throughout the economy.

"You have far more workers who have a lot more responsibility than they did when the National Labor Relations Act was passed almost 60 years ago," he said. "It's not just a production factory floor with people punching out widgets. It's a much more skilled economy."

U.S. Ruling Could Eliminate Union Eligibility For Millions (LAT)

By Molly Selvin

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

A federal labor agency Tuesday broadened its definition of who is a supervisor, in a ruling that could keep millions of skilled employees from joining unions and accelerate a decades-long decline in union membership.

In a long-awaited decision, the Republican-controlled National Labor Relations Board held that nurses could be classified as supervisors if they directed and oversaw other nurses.

Under federal law, employees defined as supervisors aren't entitled to legal protections ensuring their right to join unions.

The labor board's definition could be applied to other kinds of workers, particularly in the fast-growing service sector, where unions have made some gains in recent years even as overall union membership has declined nationally, labor experts said.

Even before the ruling, many employers had classified more of their workers as supervisors, in part to avoid paying them overtime. For example, many employees of restaurants, retailers and other businesses have been classified as "shift supervisors" even though most of their duties — such as waiting on tables or cashiering — are indistinguishable from those they supervise.

In recent years, several large retailers, including Home Depot Inc., Abercrombie & Fitch Co. and Staples Inc., have been targets of lawsuits by nonunion employees claiming they were denied overtime pay because they were classified as supervisors, even though only a small fraction of their responsibilities involved supervision.

Harley Shaiken, a UC Berkeley professor who studies labor issues, said as many as 135 cases pending before the labor board, many in the service sector and high-tech fields, could be affected by Tuesday's ruling.

"The notion of supervision in an Internet age is a lot blurrier than when we're talking about an assembly line or a stamping plant," he said.

The ruling was applauded by business organizations but denounced by labor groups, which called it part of a Bush administration strategy to destroy unions.

"It's an outrageous decision," said Rose Ann DeMoro, executive director of the 70,000-member California Nurses Assn., which threatened to strike against hospitals that tried to enforce the new rule.

AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said the board's decision would immediately deny as many as 8 million workers "their basic right to have a voice on the job."

Business groups said unions were overstating the ruling's effect.

The decision will probably affect primarily work sites where union organizing is going on, said Stephen A. Bokat, general counsel at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Where there are established collective bargaining relationships," he said, "these issues with regard to supervisors are very well established and I doubt most employers will totally upset their workplaces to meet that definition."

Kaiser Permanente, one of the state's largest employers of nurses, with 24,000 in California represented by two unions, said it would not take nurses out of their bargaining units who under the new ruling could be classified as supervisors.

DOJ_NMG_0074875

Federal law defines supervisors as those whose jobs may require them to use "independent judgment" in the course of their duties, or have continuing responsibilities to "assign" or "responsibly direct" the activities of other employees. An employee can be considered a supervisor by performing any one of those duties — or by having the power to hire or fire.

In Tuesday's ruling, the labor board determined that the term "assign" could include dispatching an employee to a workstation, appointing an employee to a specific shift or to work overtime, or directing a nurse to care for a particular patient.

The five-member labor board issued rulings in three related cases. In the first, it voted 3 to 2 that permanent "charge" nurses at a Michigan acute care facility, who oversee staff, were supervisors. However, the board rejected the supervisor designation for charge nurses who rotate in and out of that job. The board's three Republicans voted in favor of the decision, with the two Democrats opposing it.

In the two other cases, the board found that employers did not provide enough evidence to determine whether charge nurses at a Minnesota nursing home or so-called lead workers at a Mississippi manufacturing plant should also be classified as supervisors.

The rulings were triggered by a 2001 U.S. Supreme Court decision directing the board to refine its definition of a supervisor. The court ruled that nurses and other healthcare workers were not entitled to join unions if their duties included supervising others.

It is unclear whether the board's action can be appealed.

Nationwide, an estimated 400,000 nurses are represented by collective bargaining agreements, said Jennifer Coate, spokeswoman for the Nurse Alliance of the Service Employees International Union. It is unclear how many nurses will be affected by the board's decision.

DeMoro of the California Nurses Assn. said the ruling "opens the door to redefining every nurse as someone who uses professional judgment and is therefore ineligible for collective bargaining."

She said, "We intend to mount a full strike against any hospital that attempts to take rights away from registered nurses."

Workers classified as supervisors by their employers have been winning some legal battles in their bid to get overtime pay in nonunion settings. Abercrombie agreed in January to pay as much as $2 million to settle a suit filed on behalf of 250 California store managers, Longs Drug Stores Corp. paid $11 million to end two suits brought by 1,000 managers, and Countrywide Financial Corp. agreed last year to a $30-million settlement involving 400 employees. Several other cases are pending.

AFL-CIO President Sweeney said as many as 34 million workers and professionals, accounting for 23% of the labor force, would eventually fall within the scope of Tuesday's decision.

Union membership has fallen steadily in recent decades. In 2005, 15.7 million workers, or 12.5% of the labor force, were union members, according to government figures. That was down from 1983, when 1 in 5 workers — nearly 18 million — carried union cards.

Sweeney said the decision would accelerate that decline by creating a category of workers with neither the legal rights of employees nor "the prerogatives of management."

Richard Simmons, a Los Angeles lawyer who represents employers, said the decisions set forth "a more realistic standard and a more developed standard" than the board had previously adopted.

Employers will have to "look at what someone does," he said. "It doesn't mean that simply by ascribing the title of charge nurse to someone that they become a supervisor."

The latest decision follows other federal actions making it harder for unions to organize workers. In 2003, for example, the administration denied collective bargaining rights to newly federalized airport security screeners. In 2004, the labor board ruled that graduate assistants were students, not employees, and therefore not entitled to the protection of federal labor law.

NLRB Decision Angers Unions (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

The federal government yesterday established new guidelines for considering a worker a supervisor, a decision organized labor says will exclude millions of Americans from joining unions.

In a long-awaited health care case involving a group of "charge nurses" at a Michigan hospital, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) ruled the nurses should be considered supervisory staff and thus not covered by a federal law allowing them to join a union.

Charge nurses serve as a head shift nurse for a unit or ward and assign duties to other nurses. But they typically don't have the authority to hire and fire or perform evaluations on other employees, which union groups say is a vital benchmark for classifying an employee as a supervisor.

DOJ_NMG_0074876

The decision was one of three related rulings grouped as the "Kentucky River" cases because they were intended to clarify the supervisor question from a case several years ago involving Kentucky River Community Care Inc. in Hazard, Ky.

Union leaders denounced the 3-2 decision, saying it would have broad implications for workers in many fields. The vote was split down party lines.

The AFL-CIO labor federation said the new ruling would strip at least 8 million workers of their right to have a union by reclassifying them as supervisors in name only.

"Today's decision is the latest in the Bush-appointed NLRB's legal maneuvering to deny as many workers as possible their basic right to have a voice on the job and improve their living standards through their union," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said. "The NLRB should protect workers' rights -- not eliminate them."

Mr. Sweeney added the ruling "threatens to create a new class of workers under federal labor law: workers who have neither the genuine prerogatives of management, nor the statutory rights of ordinary employees."

The decision was not a surprise since Republicans have the majority on the five-member board, said Roland Zullo of the Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations at the University of Michigan.

"This is what happens when you have a political party in power that is just not friendly to labor -- you get decisions like this," Mr. Zullo. "Labor had more favorable decisions during the [President] Clinton administration."

Workers considered supervisors under the new definition can unionize, but management will be under no legal obligation to bargain with them, Mr. Zullo said.

Business praised the board's decision.

"The board has given a clear, reasonable and fair standard employers can apply in determining who is and who is not a supervisor," said Steve Bokat, general counsel for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Some accused labor activists of exaggerating the number of workers that will be affected by the ruling.

"The NLRB articulated a clear test of supervisory authority that is totally consistent with 70 years of statutory and decisional history," said Martin Payson, a New York lawyer with the Jackson Lewis law firm, which represents management in labor cases. "Relatively few people will be impacted," he said.

Labor groups also say the ruling gives employers another tool for fighting organizing efforts by threatening litigation.

"Every case now where an employer wants to drag it out for three years in the courts will be able to do so," said Jon Hiatt, general counsel for the AFL-CIO. "It's an invitation for employers to manipulate job duties."

Business also disputed the union's prediction the decision will lead to widespread litigation.

"The real lesson is that every individual whose job duties put their legal position in question should have their authority and responsibility spelled out in advance, by the employer, so as to avoid uncertainty," Mr. Payson said. "This will avoid what was predicted by the unions -- another decade of litigation."

The decision is expected to be appealed in the federal courts and could reach the Supreme Court, Mr. Payson said.

The question of which employees are considered supervisors has been the topic of debate between unions and employers for decades. The Supreme Court twice has overturned NLRB rulings on the matter.

"This has been a contested area that has see-sawed back and forth," Mr. Zullo said. "But board decisions do change, and if the politics shift, [the decision] could shift right back."

Fate Of Post Office Overhaul Is Up For Debate (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Sometimes it is small provisions that trip up big bills.

That was the case last week with compromise legislation that would overhaul the U.S. Postal Service. The bill's collapse also spawned differing opinions on whether it can be salvaged next month in a lame-duck session.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) is optimistic that the House and Senate will approve a postal bill. "We are going to get it done," Davis said yesterday, adding, "We are conceptually 99.9 percent of the way there."

But Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), a chief sponsor who will broker any compromise, is not as confident as Davis. "Unfortunately, at the eleventh hour, various parties raised objections to some of the bill's long-standing provisions, and these objections caused certain members of Congress to block passage of the legislation," Collins said in an e-mail yesterday from her home state.

"While I remain committed to the goal of passing the bill in the lame-duck session, I do not know if that will be possible," she wrote.

Efforts to overhaul operations of the Postal Service have been underway in Congress for a decade as big mailers have pleaded for a new rate structure that makes it easier for them to predict postage increases. The financial health of the Postal Service also has become a concern, as Americans expand their use of the Internet, e-mail and cellphones and send fewer first-class letters, an important source of revenue for the post office.

DOJ_NMG_0074877

Finding a legislative solution has been a complex effort. President Bush set up a postal commission to study possible changes, and business groups and outside experts floated their ideas. Enthusiasm for an overhaul has waxed and waned at postal headquarters.

Some of the proposed changes involve multibillion-dollar budget issues, such as how to handle costs for pensions and retiree health care. The White House gave in on one of its requests -- that the Postal Service pick up the tab for military pensions earned by postal workers. Under the compromise, the military portion of postal worker pensions will be paid out of the Treasury, as happens with other agencies. The Postal Service will use the savings to fund future retiree health-care benefits.

But the bill stalled on a relatively modest provision that would require a three-day waiting period before injured postal workers could begin accruing workers' compensation benefits. Employees would be expected to use vacation or sick leave for the first three days they were out of work and would be reimbursed for that time if they were unable to return after 14 days, congressional aides said.

The president of the National Association of Letter Carriers, William H. Young , unexpectedly announced that he would not accept the bill because no one had explained to him why the change was necessary.

Union spokesman Drew Von Bergen said the proposed workers' compensation change "would put postal employees in a different classification than other federal employees."

Under current law, injured federal employees receive "continuation of pay" for up to 45 days, and if their disability continues for more than that, they can receive additional compensation for lost wages after three days in a non-paid status.

Young wrote NALC members, "for the Bush administration, it is always easier to pick on those who are less fortunate than others." He wrote, "The nation's injured letter carriers and other postal employees were an easy mark."

Collins was dismayed by Young's action, congressional aides said. The NALC had not brought up the issue in three years of negotiations on the bill and had promised to support an overhaul of postal operations, the aides said.

Collins and the White House had backed off another workers' compensation provision opposed by the union, and Collins had negotiated solutions to issues raised by large mailers and postal competitors, such as UPS.

One troublesome area -- how to regulate postage rates for certain types of mail under a cap linked to the consumer price index and also provide an escape clause for exceptional circumstances -- was resolved to the satisfaction of big mailers and unions, lobbyists said.

"We were within a quarter-inch of getting it done Friday night," Davis said at a breakfast forum sponsored by the nonprofit Council for Excellence in Government and The Washington Post.

But some administration officials and some lobbyists think the postal overhaul could be dead, not only for this year but for two or three years, if control of Congress shifts in next month's congressional elections. They also doubt that Collins and the White House will give in to the NALC.

Still, one administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he participated in the discussions, noted that the bill has survived delays and attempts to kill it. "This has more lives than nine dead cats," he said.

OMB Welcomes Help From Anti-Pork Bloggers (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Call it the Office of Management and Blog-it.

The Office of Management and Budget is turning to bloggers for help in pushing the OMB's government reform plans after last week's success of its pet project, the Federal Funding Accountability and Transparency Act, also known as the Coburn-Obama bill.

The legislation envisions an online, searchable list of all federal government contracts and grants of more than $25,000. Such a window onto pork distribution would, said President Bush when he signed it, "increase accountability and reduce incentives for wasteful spending."

Despite its bipartisan support, the bill earlier hit a wall when an unknown senator put a secret hold on it. Open-government bloggers leapt off the computer and onto the phone, calling all 100 senators -- minus Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), of course -- to unmask the culprit.

Heady stuff, reading rapid-fire postings as the mostly conservative blogmeisters narrowed the list in real time, flushing out the faceless holder: Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska).

DOJ_NMG_0074878

Stevens's explanation -- mostly, that he wanted a cost-benefit analysis -- was lost in a hail of online gotchas, and he lifted his hold. To some Hill-watchers, outing the Senate's per capita pork champ was a "duh" moment. But to the OMB, bill sponsors and their blogger backers, it was sweet victory.

Bush signed the bill last week, flanked by the bloggers who had led the charge, including those from Porkbusters.org, Townhall.com, Instapundit.com and Human Events Online's Right Angle blog. Soon afterward, OMB Deputy Director Clay Johnson III spent an hour with the bloggers.

Right after that, OMB Director Rob Portman and Johnson appeared at a luncheon to talk about OMB's government performance push.

Portman also talked about the blogger fest, saying, "Clay asked them, 'Gee, since you're so good at this, can you help us on some of our other initiatives?' " When Johnson took the floor, he invoked the bloggers several times as weapons in his fight for government performance and accountability reforms.

"Senator Voinovich tried . . . to get a co-sponsor this year for a bill that called for that kind of performance evaluation, and Voinovich added that an employee had to be minimally successful to get a raise," Johnson said at one point, referring to George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio). "This is a no-brainer, right? He could not get a co-sponsor. . . . It might just make its way to the blog community."

But the blogosphere remains an unstable realm: At the height of the search for Stevens, a cry rose to abolish secret holds, which are often used for innocuous reasons, and at least one blogger demanded that the entire Senate be shut down until the holder was found.

OMB official Robert J. Shea seems to grasp that better than his bosses. Using bloggers as advocates, he mused, "could backfire."

Bayer's Duplicity On Drug Safety (NYT)

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

Bayer A.G.'s limp excuse for withholding data suggesting that a heart-surgery drug is dangerous won't wash. The failure by the German pharmaceutical giant to inform the Food and Drug Administration of the disquieting results of a large observational study cannot be sloughed off as a mere "mistake on the company's part."

Rather, the circumstances suggest that Bayer sought to hide the results of a contractor's study until some way could be found to discount them. It came clean only when forced to by a whistleblower.

The drug is Trasylol, which has long been used in heart surgery to reduce blood loss and the need for transfusions. Although extensive data seemed to document the drug's effectiveness and safety, two studies published this year found that it increased the risk of kidney failure, heart attack and stroke.

Even so, an F.D.A. advisory committee, after reviewing extensive data at a public meeting on Sept. 21, overwhelmingly concluded that Trasylol was still acceptably safe and effective for certain patients. The committee had not been told — because Bayer representatives who participated in the meeting kept mum — about the most recent large study the company had sponsored, which raised even more questions about the drug's safety.

After the fact, a whistleblower, possibly an outside researcher, reportedly called both the F.D.A. and Bayer to force full disclosure. Preliminary results of the suppressed study showed that Trasylol may increase the chance for death, serious kidney disease, congestive heart failure and strokes.

The company says it did not initially disclose this retrospective study of some 67,000 patients because it deemed the results preliminary and had significant questions about the methodology and populations of patients. That may be. But that cannot be an excuse for hiding the very existence of this study from an expert advisory panel convened to review the latest safety evidence.

This incident underscores the importance of requiring drug companies to publicly register all safety studies so that they can't be suppressed later should their results displease the sponsor.

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Climbs From Depths (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 4, 2006

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average made history Tuesday, notching a record closing high that erases some, but not all, of the pain suffered by investors when stocks came crashing down after peaking in early 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0074879

It took more than 61/2 years, but the Dow's comeback is complete.

The Dow, a Wall Street icon that dates to 1896, rallied 56.99 points Tuesday to close at 11,727.34, surpassing its prior record close of 11,722.98 hit on Jan. 14, 2000.

“The record's biggest significance is psychological,” says Timothy Vick, senior portfolio manager at Sanibel Captiva Trust. “It arouses a lot of bullish sentiment.”

The Dow record caps a 4,437-point comeback that began in October 2002 at the low point of the worst stock market decline since the Great Depression.

The record-setting session Tuesday for the USA's oldest stock barometer erased the nearly 38% loss the blue-chip average suffered in the three-year bear market that began in early 2000 after the technology stock bubble burst, wiping out $8.5 trillion of investor wealth.

Sparking the Dow's final sprint to a new peak is a bet by investors that the Federal Reserve will succeed in slowing the economy and keeping inflation at bay without causing a recession.

Also boosting stocks has been a nearly 25% drop in the price of crude oil since mid-July, including a $2.35 decline Tuesday to $58.68 a barrel, a nearly eight-month low.

The Dow, which also notched an intra-day record of 11,758.95 Tuesday, is up 9.4% in 2006.

The best performer for the Dow since its Jan. 14, 2000, peak is Altria Group, parent of tobacco giant Philip Morris, which gained 212%, says Ned Davis Research. Biggest laggard: computer-chip maker Intel, off 60%.

A fresh recovery high for the Dow, which tracks 30 big companies representative of U.S. business, does not erase all the losses suffered by investors during the market's 2000-02 swoon.

During the 1990s stock market boom, most people invested in either mutual funds that tracked the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index or highflying tech stocks, most of which traded on the Nasdaq. The S&P 500 remains 12.7% below its high. The Nasdaq is down 55.6%.

Dow's New Height Not As Giddy As The Last One (LAT)

By Tom Petruno

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

In less than seven years, the value of the typical U.S. home has risen 64%. The price of gold has doubled. The Russian stock market has rocketed nearly 800%.

And the Dow Jones industrial average just broke even.

The world's best-known stock index rose 56.99 points Tuesday to end at 11,727.34, finally topping the previous peak of 11,722.98 reached Jan. 14, 2000.

The day's advance, aided by another drop in oil prices, capped the Dow's long slog back from its 2000-2002 plunge, the worst in three decades.

Stock market bulls say the index's comeback is a sign of optimism about the nation's economy, given that the Dow's giants — blue-chip names such as Boeing Co., McDonald's Corp. and Walt Disney Co. — account for a colossal chunk of business activity.

"You have everything in place for a continuing bull market," said Neil Hennessy, whose Marin County investment firm manages about $2 billion. He cites strong corporate earnings, steady interest rates, relatively low unemployment and falling energy prices.

Other Wall Street veterans see less to cheer in the Dow's revival. They read it as the final chapter in the market's recovery from the last recession, signaling that another downturn looms.

Blue chip stocks, they say, are winning by default because investors are running out of other viable moneymaking alternatives.

In the short term, however, the Dow's new high may add to the stock market's momentum.

"It's a ringing of the bell for Main Street. People think, 'Maybe I should get out of my money market fund. Maybe real estate isn't the only way to go with my bonus check this year,' " said Art Hogan, chief market analyst at brokerage Jefferies & Co. in Boston.

But no one is predicting a return to the heady days of early 2000, when stocks ruled the investment landscape.

Although volatile technology issues led the mania of the late 1990s, the Dow was no slouch. The 30-stock index rose at an astounding rate of 25% a year from 1995 through 1999 on average, and the sky seemed the limit as the economy boomed.

Financial authors outdid one another in breathlessly forecasting how high the index might soar. The books "Dow 36,000," "Dow 40,000" and, finally, "Dow 100,000" appeared on store shelves within the span of several months in 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0074880

"It was the biggest [financial] mania in the history of the world," said Bill Fleckenstein, a Seattle money manager known for his dour outlook on the stock market.

And like all such manias, it finally exhausted itself. The downturn that began in 2000 was led by technology stocks, but the rest of the market tumbled as well. The situation worsened with the recession of 2001 and a plunge in corporate earnings.

In 2002, a wave of scandals involving Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other major companies was the final blow. The Dow sank 17% that year. When it hit bottom in October, the index had plummeted 38% from its peak — its worst loss since the early 1970s.

Amid the downturn, many once-eager blue-chip investors found better things to do with their money. They fled to real estate, commodities, foreign stocks and shares of small U.S. companies.

"A lot of investors got out of blue chips. Other things competed for dollars," said Dan Pemberton, a 66-year-old retiree in Thousand Oaks.

Like millions of other small investors, Pemberton in recent years was drawn to foreign stocks. The rise of emerging economies such as China and Russia lured capital and stoked excitement about the growth potential abroad.

Huge pools of investment capital such as the California Public Employees' Retirement System also gravitated to more exotic investments, including hedge funds, which are known for fast paced trading and chasing opportunities in obscure markets.

CalPERS had 46.4% of its assets in U.S. stocks, mostly blue chips, at the end of 1999. Now that proportion is just 40%.

Meanwhile, foreign stocks have risen from 18.8% of the fund's assets in 1999 to 22.8%; real estate investments have jumped from 4.7% to 7.4%.

For individual investors, little could compete with residential real estate after 2000. Home prices soared across the nation as mortgage rates plunged to generational lows.

And after losing untold billions of dollars in the collapse of technology shares after 2000, many Americans saw real estate as much more of a sure thing than stocks.

Now, however, the housing market has cooled. Nationwide, the median price of a previously owned single-family house declined in August from a year earlier, the first such dip in 11 years.

A sharp drop in many foreign stock markets in the spring, and similar slides in oil and other commodity prices in recent months, have intensified doubts about the wisdom of risking cash in those areas.

"All of those other markets are beginning to lose their luster," said Robert Morris, director of stock investments at money manager Lord, Abbett & Co. in Jersey City, N.J.

The best argument in favor of the Dow stocks and other big-name issues is that they're inexpensive, said Michael Holland, head of investment firm Holland & Co. in New York.

Even though blue chip companies' earnings have risen sharply since 2002 amid the U.S. economic expansion, "people haven't been willing to pay up for the stocks," Holland said.

One classic measure of stock market value — the price-to-earnings ratio, or stock price divided by annual earnings per share — now averages about 16 for blue-chip issues, the lowest since the mid-1990s, according to Standard & Poor's in New York.

At the height of the last bull market, that ratio reached 28.

Holland, who has his clients in such Dow shares as Microsoft Corp., Johnson & Johnson, General Electric Co. and Pfizer Inc., contends that the stocks are too cheap to ignore.

"These are the world's greatest companies," he said.

But there's another key factor in the resurgence of the 110-year-old index, experts say: fear that the economy, already slowing, is headed for a recession.

Although big-name stocks probably would slide if the economy slumped, their losses might be mild compared with what could befall other investments that have risen much more dramatically in recent years. Home prices could tank. Small companies without deep pockets could be wiped out.

Fleckenstein has been warning clients that the economic expansion of the last five years "has all been done with borrowed money." He cites the explosion of federal debt and the hundreds of billions of dollars that homeowners have pulled out of their properties via mortgage refinancings and credit lines.

"When this unwinds, it will be a disaster, period," he said.

Scott Rutherford, a 49-year-old Pacific Palisades investor who has about $2 million in the market, said he had been turning back to blue chips in part because he's concerned about the economy.

The Dow stocks "represent a safe haven against possible recession, if the housing market truly implodes," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0074881

Many investors don't buy the recession talk. They believe the Federal Reserve's interest rate hikes have succeeded in slowing the economy to a pace that will keep inflation subdued. Under the "soft landing" scenario, the economy will emerge healthier and poised for another round of significant growth in 2007.

David Elias, a retired Amherst, N.Y., money manager who wrote "Dow 40,000" in 1999, concedes that he was probably too optimistic in predicting that the Dow would reach that lofty level by 2016.

Nonetheless, "I still strongly believe we will hit 40,000 in my lifetime" as blue-chip companies benefit from the spread of capitalism around the world, said Elias, 61.

"We have all of the ingredients for good, solid growth in the world over the next 10 to 15 years."

Dow Soars To Record As Oil Price Slides (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at a record high on Tuesday as oil prices fell sharply, but the broader stock-market remained well below their peaks of the high-technology boom.

Having flirted with a record several times in recent days, the blue-chip stock index finally broke above the previous high set more than six years ago to close at 11,727.34. Oil prices fell below $59 a barrel, the lowest level since February, reducing worries about inflation.

While the 30-stock Dow rallied into new territory, the S&P 500, remained 12.6 per cent below its record close of 1,527, while the technology-heavy Nasdaq remained 55.6 per cent below its all time close of 5,048 reached at the peak of the internet boom in 2000.

Other indicators also indicated that the US equity markets have yet to recover from the late 1990s, when holding stock, particularly in US technology companies, was seen a superior investment choice over other major asset classes. Since 2001, bonds, commodities, real estate and various international equities have significantly outperformed the US stock market.

“It’s not just sentiment that has been poor. It’s activity,” said Tobias Levkovich, chief US equity strategist at Citigroup.

The bank said that “since the start of 2005, individual investors have poured $207.65bn into international stock funds, compared with only $46.49bn for domestic equity funds, representing 81.7 per cent of total flows.”

For the year ending August 31, “a staggering 86.8 per cent of the $118.56bn in total equity flows has headed overseas”, the bank said. During the past four months, Citigroup said, “domestic stock funds have witnessed cumulative outflows of $23.72bn, which marks the worst four-month span since October 2002.”

Mr Lekovich said breaking the Dow record “doesn’t change the underlying dynamic, but it’s psychologically good for investors.”

The Dow also set a new intra-day high of 11,758.95 on Tuesday, breaking the previous mark of 11,750.28 established on January 14, 2000, when the index set the old closing record of 11,722.98.

Still, there are nagging concerns that the economy faces a tough road in 2007, a view reflected by Treasury yields sitting well below the present Fed funds rate of 5.25 per cent.

“The stock market is neither a bull or a bear, but a turtle, carrying a weight upon its back,” said Alfred Goldman, chief market strategist at AG Edwards. “The thinking that the Fed pulls off a soft landing for the economy is not a guarantee,” he added.

Dow Jones Index Hits A New High, Retracing Losses (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

The best-known measure of the stock market, the Dow Jones industrial average of 30 major stocks, rose 0.49 percent yesterday to squeak past a closing high that was set in January 2000 amid a technology-driven market boom.

In contrast to those heady days, though, investors and market professionals are greeting the current rally with more relief than euphoria, noting that the broader stock market has yet to find its way back to previous highs.

“I am happy that it has now happened so that we can move onto something else,” said Liz Ann Sonders, chief investment strategist at Charles Schwab.

Stocks have been climbing without fanfare since late in July, bolstered by a decline in energy prices and by mounting signs that the Federal Reserve will not raise interest rates again this year.

The spark for yesterday’s gains was a 4 percent drop in oil prices that pushed the next-month futures price of crude oil below $60 a barrel for the first time since March.

DOJ_NMG_0074882

In 2000 and the years leading up to it, the rally was fueled by demand for computers and telecommunications and a belief that the Internet would transform business. The rally over the last few months has had more modest roots: signs that the economy is moderating and inflation is tame. Investors have been encouraged that falling crude oil and gasoline prices, while a sign of slowing demand, will restrain inflation and spur consumer spending. And investors have been heartened by what they hope is a gradual and orderly end of a five-year boom in home sales and construction.

Indeed, many on Wall Street argue that the housing pullback and the decline in energy prices has put the economy in a sweet spot: not growing fast enough to accelerate inflation, but not so slowly that it risks falling into recession.

"There is and will continue to be a building sense of a Goldilocks" market, said James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management.

Charles P. Mayer of Pioneer Investments, a mutual fund company, added that corporate profits were still growing at robust rates, further supporting stock prices.

Still, a significant number of skeptics say that this view does not fully take into account the risks that falling home prices and sales could crimp consumer spending and cause an economic slump next year. These people note that the Dow's new high is hollow, given that broader gauges of the market have still not returned to their high-water marks.

There is also the reality that the Dow is a measure by dollar value of only 30 blue-chip companies, and so is not representative of the great majority of traded stocks.

Jane L. Caron, chief economic strategy at Dwight Asset Management, a Vermont specialist in bond investing, took a measured view. "There is a lot of concern that the housing market softening will spill over to the rest of the economy," she said. "But if you look at the stock markets, they seem to think that everything is O.K."

"Somebody is wrong," she added.

The Dow industrials closed up 56.99 points yesterday, at 11,727.34, surpassing the record of 11,722.98 set on Jan. 14, 2000 — a day when stocks were buoyed by a strong profit report from Intel and by comments from Alan Greenspan, then the Federal Reserve chairman, that interest rates would rise only slightly.

Most other market measures were also higher yesterday. The broad-based Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.21 percent, and the technology-focused Nasdaq composite index rose 0.27 percent. The Russell 2000 index of smaller-capitalization companies was fractionally lower.

Unlike the Dow, the S.& P. 500 index is still about 12 percent away from its record high in March 2000. The majority of those stocks have returned to their 2000 levels, but a large minority — including technology stars like Cisco Systems, Sun Microsystems and JDS Uniphase — are trading at a fraction of their prices six years ago. The Nasdaq composite index is still down about 55 percent from its March 2000 peak.

Seen another way, the stock market has spent the last six years exorcising the effects of the technology bubble, Howard Silverblatt, Standard & Poor's senior index analyst, said. He noted that without the technology sector, the S.& P. 500 would be up 17 percent today. Though not a spectacular return for six years, it would be a far better outcome for investors than a 12 percent decline.

And by some measures, the Dow still has some way to go before it can be said to have reclaimed its previous heights. On an inflation-adjusted basis, the average would have to reach a level of 14,104.97 for it to match its January 2000 peak.

Only 10 of the 30 stocks in the Dow today are at or above their levels when the index last reached its high. Most of the highfliers from the late 1990's and early 2000, including Microsoft, I.B.M. and Intel, are a long way from the lofty levels they were trading at then. Even companies like Home Depot, Alcoa and Merck are down more than 30 percent.

"This has been a really rotten five-year period," said James K. Glassman, a fellow at the conservative-leaning American Enterprise Institute and an author of the 1999 book "Dow 36,000."

"It really has, there is no doubt about it," said Mr. Glassman, who maintains that his book was mischaracterized at the time as a forecast for the market. He argues that the fear of terrorism has held down stock prices.

Still, the Dow components that have led the charge back have done exceedingly well. The price of Altria, parent company of Philip Morris, fell to a five-year low early in 2000 because of its multibillion-dollar legal liabilities, but it has more than tripled since. The shares of Caterpillar, United Technologies and Boeing have soared because of strong global demand for their heavy industrial products. Exxon Mobil, the world's largest publicly traded oil company, is up almost 60 percent on the rise in energy prices.

The last time the Dow inched close to the record, early in May, stocks tumbled from India to New York as investors worried that the Federal Reserve, in its eagerness to curb inflation, would raise rates so much that it would push the American economy into recession and precipitate the end of an era of relatively cheap financing worldwide. The Dow industrials fell more than 8 percent and the Nasdaq composite by 11 percent at the start of the summer.

DOJ_NMG_0074883

A few months have made a lot of difference. The Fed left its benchmark short-term rate unchanged at 5.25 percent in its last two meetings, on the rationale that a slowing economy and its two-year campaign to raise rates might be enough to lower prices. Indeed, inflation has slowed and data for September is widely expected to show a further drop because of the recent fall in energy prices. Nationally, average retail gasoline prices are at $2.36 a gallon this week, compared with just over $3 at the start of August.

Declining home sales and construction activity has helped slow the economy without causing any major retrenchment, at least so far. The economy grew at a 2.6 percent annual pace in the second quarter after a 5.6 percent increase in the first three months of the year.

Bond investors remain somewhat more skeptical than stock buyers. The yields on long-term Treasury bonds, for instance, indicate that investors are assuming that the Fed will have to reverse course soon and cut interest rates to resuscitate the economy.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, has fallen to 4.61 percent, from 5.25 percent late in June. Investors demand higher yields when they are worried that inflation will eat deeper into the value of their holdings, and they push yields down when they think that interest rates are headed lower or when they are seeking shelter from tougher times.

Market historians have noted that stocks can take a long time to recover from periods of great excess. The Dow and the S.&. P., for instance, did not return to their 1929 pre-crash peaks until 1954, long after the Depression and World War II ended.

All this does not mean that investors have stood still in the last six years. Many foreign stock markets, especially those in developing countries, have outperformed American markets, as have commodities like oil, gold and copper. In the United States, the stocks of smaller companies have outrun larger ones, though that trend appears to have reversed this summer.

Data on investment fund flows show that Americans have invested more in those faster-growing areas. They have also spent increasingly more on home purchases and improvements, as evidenced by the large run-up in housing sales and prices and the sharp increases in mortgage and home equity lending.

Will the Dow's new record prompt skeptical investors to reconsider stocks, perhaps giving them a psychological boost? Momentum can help propel stock markets, but investors could also conclude that the Dow's return to its early 2000 level means that the index has merely been treading water for six years.

"You're telling me that I have gone six and a half years and gone even," Mr. Silverblatt of S.& P. said. "What about the 19 percent inflation? Well, it's better than being down, but it's not as positive as you think."

Dow Industrials Close At A Record (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

When the Dow Jones Industrial Average last closed at a record, on Jan. 14, 2000, it was a time of exultation. A lot has changed since then.

After flirting with the record for days, the Dow Industrials finally topped it yesterday, pushed higher by the hope that falling oil prices will support consumers and the housing market. The average rose 56.99 points to squeak past the old record close of 11722.98 with a finish of 11727.34. Throughout the market, the mood was more skeptical than during those heady days more than six years ago.

"We're in a vastly different world and a vastly different market," said Stephen Porpora, an independent broker on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange. When the Dow registered its previous record, "we were at the tail end of a bull market and everyone was somewhat drunk on the euphoria."

At the Big Board yesterday, as the Dow moved through its old high, jacket-clad traders continued shuffling across the exchange floor checking prices and shouting their orders. When the market closed, they barely reacted. There was no applause. Some traders said they were more worried about news that was trickling out of layoffs at a couple of floor-trading firms.

There's good reason to be more cautious this time. Between the two records came one of the worst bear markets in financial history. From its 2000 high to its 2002 low, the Dow fell 37.85%. The Nasdaq Composite Index, containing many volatile technology stocks, plunged 77.93%. To push the Dow to a new high, investors have had to overcome serious doubts about inflation and the sustainability of economic growth.

"A lot of people who were bearish are throwing in the towel and turning more positive," said David Briggs, head of stock trading at Federated Investors, a Pittsburgh mutual-fund group. "A lot of people have been sitting out this dance, and before we top out, I think we are going to get them in."

In that sense, today's skepticism could prove healthier for stocks than the excitement of January 2000. Stocks are benefiting from a slow but steady flow of money from investors overcoming their fears, rather than from a rush of irrationally exuberant buyers, as then-Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan suggested just over three years before that bull market topped out.

DOJ_NMG_0074884

The Dow almost finished at a record in May, only to succumb to the doubters. This time, it rode a surge that began in mid-July and took the blue-chip average up 9.2% in less than three months.

The gains had a simple catalyst: the Federal Reserve. Beginning in July, investors began to believe that the Fed, at its August meeting, might end its two-year campaign of interest-rate increases. Fed decision makers did stop raising rates in August, and kept the "pause" going at their September meeting, although they left the door open to increases later.

Hopes spread that the Fed's interest-rate management would foster a "Goldilocks" economy, with rates high enough to blunt inflation but not so high as to torpedo corporate profits. Many investors see that kind of balanced scenario as a formula for steady stock gains, and the optimism became so strong that the gains continued even during September, historically the year's weakest month for stocks.

Now talk is spreading that the Fed might actually start cutting short-term interest rates sometime next year, to give the economy a boost. The prospect of lower interest rates has been pushing down the yields on Treasury bonds since late June, pulling many mortgage rates down with them. The prospect of more-moderate economic growth has been pulling oil and gasoline prices down. Consumers are growing more optimistic.

As a result, the stocks leading the latest rally have been those linked to consumer spending, such as McDonald's, Microsoft, General Motors and Pfizer -- some of them rebounding from earlier slumps. Industrial stocks such as Caterpillar and Alcoa, which led until this year, have fallen back, as the pace of economic growth appears to moderate.

The market looks much different from that of January 2000, a time when some believed stocks had entered a new era in which "New Economy" stocks would rise for years. Technology stocks, which had taken on an aura of invincibility, are viewed by many today as battered objects of suspicion.

Even fanciful market forecasts have taken a haircut. In 1999, two scholars at the American Enterprise Institute startled Wall Street with a book named "Dow 36,000," a title that later drew ridicule. Shortly before this latest record, one news release touted a little-known money manager's radical forecast: Dow 16000.

Skeptics worry that the new level reached yesterday might not hold for long. Their concern is that the bull market is aging and that it could be too late now to pile into stocks.

The current upswing, which began in October 2002, has run for almost four years and is the fourth longest since 1900, according to Ned Davis Research in Venice, Fla. But it hasn't been particularly strong, a reflection of investor reservations following the excesses of the 1990s and the bust of 2000-02. The Dow's 61% gain from the closing low of 7286.27 on Oct. 9, 2002, remains below the 85% average total gain for bull markets since 1900. (Generally speaking, a bull market is a 20% rise from a bear-market low; a bear market is the opposite.)

The more volatile Nasdaq composite index has doubled since its own 2002 low, and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index is up 72%. But because the Nasdaq fell so far during the bear market, it would have to more than double again to return to its March 2000 record of 5048.62. It finished yesterday at 2243.65.

The S&P 500, which also holds more tech stocks than does the Dow and also fell harder during the bear market, finished at 1334.11. It would have to rise 14.5% to get back to its record of 1527.46, also reached in March 2000.

The new record for the Dow Industrials means they have recaptured their losses, but it also means they have made virtually no progress in more than six years. Of the 30 stocks in the Dow average, only 10 have surpassed their levels of January 2000.

In general, the biggest losers since then are the big winners from the late 1990s. Microsoft, for all its gains this past summer, remains down 46% since Jan. 14, 2000. Intel is off 60%. General Motors -- not one of the '90s big winners -- has fallen 59%.

And taking inflation into account, the Dow still is 20% from its old record.

The biggest Dow gainers are Altria, maker of Marlboro cigarettes and Kraft cheese, up 214%; equipment-maker Caterpillar, 151% higher; industrial conglomerate United Technologies, with a 103% gain; and Boeing, up 86%.

In January 2000, the world's biggest stock as measured by stock-market value was Microsoft. Today, it is Exxon Mobil, whose stock is up 56% since then.

Another sign of the bull market's age: The Nasdaq stocks, the rabbits of the current bull market, posted some of the largest gains early on but now are slowing down. This year, despite the summer gains, the Nasdaq composite is barely in positive territory, up 1.7%. The Dow industrials are up 9.4% year-to-date, and the S&P 500, 6.9%. Other big gainers during much of the current bull market, such as energy stocks, also have begun to slip.

Some stock indexes that led the way for much of the past four years, such as those measuring small stocks and transportation stocks, hit records earlier this year, but then fell so hard they still aren't back to record territory. These are indexes of stocks that benefit from a strong economy. Their recent weakness reflects continuing expectations that economic growth will slow.

DOJ_NMG_0074885

Typically, toward the end of a bull market, larger, safer stocks start performing better than those of smaller, less-established companies, and that is what has been happening this year.

Prudence and diversification are in again. "Having all your eggs in one basket seems like a great idea...until the basket falls," said Tim Swanson, who manages money for Cleveland's National City Corp., in a recent note to clients. "As others brag about the extraordinary returns that their concentrated bets are delivering, just remember that it takes a lot of eye-popping returns to make up for a couple of weeks where you lose two-thirds of your money." He pointed to the approximately $6 billion loss suffered by hedge fund Amaranth Advisors in natural-gas trading.

For all the doubts, the bull market has shown surprising staying power. It has blossomed in the shadow of terrorism, Middle East conflict, high energy prices and growing U.S. political discord. The latest gains have come despite jitters about the sagging housing market, an engine of economic growth for several years. Some investors seem almost inured to the risk.

But the stock market's strength may be masking the fact that many investors today are demanding higher rewards for risking money in a changed world. "The terror issue is hanging over the market," said Mr. Porpora, the stock-exchange floor broker. "We're at war and we all feel vulnerable." One measure of that: Investors today aren't willing to pay as much for a dollar of profits as they were in 2000.

Back then, the S&P 500 traded at more than 30 times its member companies' earnings for the previous 12 months -- more than double the historic price-earnings ratio of about 15. Since then, stocks haven't risen as fast as corporate profits. So today, the S&P 500 trades at a less expensive 17 times earnings.

"When the Dow hit its peak in 2000, there was a fairly wide gap between the stock price of mega-cap companies and the underlying value of the business," said Bruce Veaco, co-founder of Focused Investors LLC, a money-management firm in Beverly Hills, Calif. Today, he said, stock prices seem better related to profits. "We see a lot of opportunity in names like Wal-Mart, PepsiCo, American Express and Coca-Cola. They're all holdings of ours," he said.

The pace of stock gains has slowed since the late 1990s, a frothy time when a year wasn't considered good unless major indexes rose 20%. After surging 25% in 2003, the Dow was up 3% in 2004, and fell 0.6% last year. Increased investor caution also may help explain the unexpected strength of the bond market, which many investors view as safer than the stock market.

"The analysts have definitely got religion," and there are a lot fewer outrageous stock forecasts, added Mr. Briggs of Federated Investors. "Analysts are more conservative, investors are more conservative, and I would be willing to bet that chief executives are more conservative. The good news is that that has helped prevent us from going back into a bear market. But the bad news is that it probably has served to limit the gains."

Mr. Briggs added that in his view, "you've got to give Bush and Greenspan credit for keeping us in the game." But he noted that "a hurricane, a refinery fire or one event in the Middle East" could send oil-futures prices upward again, creating problems for consumers and possibly having a negative ripple effect on stocks.

A lot of other things have changed since 2000. Then, stocks were practically the only game in town. Many regarded investing in bonds, real estate and precious metals as a waste of time. Stocks like Cisco Systems and Qualcomm drove the average tech-oriented mutual fund to a more than 100% gain in 1999, while shares of small companies and non-tech, "Old Economy" companies languished. In recent years, for many people, U.S. stocks have ceased to be the investment of choice. They have turned things like Florida condos, gold coins, developing-country stocks and junk bonds. Worries have spread about bubbles in those areas.

And yet, similarities to the old days remain. When investors start feeling bullish, they often turn, almost reflexively, to tech companies, which they expect will provide the fastest stock gains. Just that has been happening since mid-July.

The Dow's New Top (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

It took nearly seven years. But the Dow Jones Industrial Average finally closed at a new record of 11727.34 yesterday, topping the previous high recorded at the peak of the dot-com bubble on January 14, 2000. Adjusted for inflation, the Dow still has some ways to go to catch that earlier peak. And the Nasdaq, loaded as it is with tech stocks, closed with a slight gain yesterday at 2243.65, well below its 5048.62 peak on March 10, 2000.

Yesterday's new Dow Jones high is nonetheless worth celebrating as a sign of America's economic resilience. At the start of every bear market, there are always voices saying we will never see the top again. But the smartest investors always turn out to be those who see new lows as a buying opportunity.

DOJ_NMG_0074886

In the current mini-bull market, stocks have been driven by a record 13 straight quarters of double-digit gains in corporate earnings. With more of the same expected this year and next, many stocks have price earnings ratios that make them good targets for "value" investors.

The stock market's strength is an especially good omen given that we are at a point in this expansion when many economists doubt its staying power. Investors seem to be betting that rising rates, the housing slump and a possible change of power in Congress won't stop the economy's growth. They may well be wrong in the short term. But the lesson of yesterday's new stock market high is that in the long term optimism always pays.

Oil Prices Slip Almost 4%, Go Below $60 A Barrel (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Oil prices plunged at the fastest rate in more than a year Tuesday and fell below $60 a barrel for the first time in nearly eight months as high inventories and expectations for reduced demand weighed on prices.

A number of energy analysts, such as those at Wachovia, First Enercast Financial and BNP Paribas Commodity Futures, say prices will likely head lower in the days and weeks ahead, absent a major change in the oil landscape.

The price of a barrel of crude oil trading for future delivery fell $2.35, or 3.9%, to $58.68. That was the lowest price since mid-February and marked the steepest one-day percentage decline in prices since August 2005.

Oil prices have fallen 24% since peaking at $77.03 in July. Prices are poised to fall further, Wachovia economist Jason Schenker says.

“The market is under pressure from both the supply and demand side,” he says.

What's happening:

·Supply. U.S. oil inventories are up more than 6% from this time a year ago and are far above the historical average for this time of year, according to the Energy Department's Energy Information Administration. Such large supplies are the main reason for the oil price decline, BNP Paribas Commodity Futures senior energy analyst Thomas Bentz says.

“Right now, it looks like we're going to continue to slide,” he says.

·Demand. Demand normally declines in the fall after the end of the busy summer driving season and before the winter, when heating oil demand rises. But expectations are growing that demand will soften more than usual in the months ahead, in large part because of a broad decline in economic activity around the globe.

·Weather. Forecasts are suggesting this may be a mild winter, pointing to reduced demand for heating oil and for oil to power electricity to heat homes, says Ben Smith, president of First Enercast Financial, an energy consulting firm that focuses on weather. Such expectations are also reducing expectations for oil demand this winter.

Crude Oil's Drop Is The Largest In More Than A Year (WSJ)

By Matt Chambers

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

How much lower can crude-oil futures go?

Yesterday, crude futures closed in on their lowest price for the year as traders become more convinced there are no big OPEC production cuts in the pipeline.

The nearly 4% drop in crude on the New York Mercantile Exchange, coming after a 3% fall Monday, was the biggest percentage drop since Aug. 17, 2005.

The front-month November light, sweet crude contract fell $2.35 to $58.68 a barrel, its lowest close since Feb. 16. The front month contract is slightly more than $1 off its lowest settlement for 2006 of $57.65 a barrel on Feb. 15.

"The question being asked is what price OPEC is going to defend and I think you can make a pretty good case it's going to be a lot lower than this," said Bill O'Grady, an analyst at A.G. Edwards Inc. in St. Louis. Mr. O'Grady said the downgrading of Colorado State University's hurricane forecast and its assessment that El Nino conditions took hold quicker than expected also weighed on prices.

Traders are ignoring comments from some members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries suggesting they are cutting output to buoy prices, instead waiting for input from Saudi Arabia, the group's biggest oil exporter and its key powerbroker. Based on comments at last month's OPEC meeting, some traders had been expecting OPEC to try to defend oil prices at $60 a barrel.

Calls from OPEC President Edmund Daukoru for other group members to follow his country of Nigeria in cutting production were dismissed by traders. Iraq also weighed in to the mix of conflicting talk from the producer-group. Cutting oil output is "impractical" before the northern hemisphere winter, when demand normally rises, a senior Iraqi oil official said.

DOJ_NMG_0074887

Traders have shrugged off reports that Nigeria and Venezuela intend to cut production this month to support prices, amid OPEC denials that a deal on crimping output has been reached.

"We're going to need strong words from the Saudis," to cause supply concerns over OPEC cuts, said Aaron Kildow, a broker at Prudential Financial Inc. in New York. Mr. Kildow said funds and independent traders were the main sellers of crude. Colorado State's forecasters said developing El Nino conditions in the Pacific Ocean led them to predict there will be no more intense hurricanes for the rest of the Atlantic hurricane season.

In other commodity markets:

GOLD: Futures on the Comex division of the New York Mercantile Exchange fell, dragged lower as a drop in crude oil prices sparked profit taking. Gold prices fell near a three-week low. Most-active December gold fell $21.80 at $581.50 an ounce and nearby October fell $21.40 to $576.30.

WHEAT: Prices on the Chicago Board of Trade tumbled, pressured by profit taking as rainy weather in dry wheat regions in Argentina pressured wheat futures yesterday. Argentina has experienced droughty conditions as its wheat crop develops, but rains Monday and yesterday are expected to alleviate some of the dryness. December wheat slid 6.50 cents to $4.395 a bushel.

Stepping Up Attacks, Bush Calls Democrats 'Softer' On Terrorists (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

STOCKTON, Calif., Oct. 3 -- President Bush ratcheted up his campaign offensive against Democrats on Tuesday with perhaps his bluntest rhetoric yet as he accused them of being "softer" on terrorists and willing to allow attacks on Americans rather than interrogate or spy on the nation's enemies.

With his party in serious trouble five weeks before Election Day, Bush shifted into full campaign mode this week, kicking off a month of frenetic barnstorming aimed at drawing disgruntled Republicans back into the fold. As part of the effort, he has escalated the intensity of his attacks with each passing day, culminating with what aides called a "very aggressive" series of speeches Tuesday.

"Time and time again, the Democrats want to have it both ways," he told donors here. "They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out."

He added: "If you don't think we should be listening in on the terrorist, then you ought to vote for the Democrats. If you want your government to continue listening in when al-Qaeda planners are making phone calls into the United States, then you vote Republican."

Bush's tough talk Tuesday came after he suggested at a Monday night fundraiser in Nevada that Democrats were content to sit back until terrorists strike again. "It sounds like they think the best way to protect the American people is wait until we're attacked again," he said.

The emphasis on terrorism and allegations of Democratic weakness replicate a strategy used to powerful effect in 2002 and 2004, but polls suggest the president may have a harder sell this year.

"That's not resonating anymore," California Democratic Party Chairman Art Torres said. "It's like the plaintive pleas of King Lear. People don't believe him anymore. You can cry wolf only so many times."

A poll by the Survey and Policy Research Institute at San Jose State University found that just 27 percent of Californians approve of Bush's performance, while 62 percent disapprove. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) stayed away from his three California stops Tuesday rather than be photographed with the unpopular president.

The two House Republicans who were beneficiaries of Bush's fundraising hail from usually safe districts, but both face serious competition this year. Reps. Richard W. Pombo and John T. Doolittle both have ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and Democratic polling suggests both are running roughly even with Democratic challengers.

And the campaigning was interrupted by the mushrooming scandal regarding former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.). During a tour of the George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton, the first in the nation named after him, Bush broke a four-day silence on Foley to pronounce himself "disgusted by the revelations." But he stood by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who faces calls from conservatives to step down for not pursuing early warnings about Foley's contacts with former House pages. Hastert, Bush said, "cares about the children of this country."

Bush opened his three-day swing through the West in Reno, Nev., on Monday, followed by stops Tuesday in Stockton, El Dorado Hills and Los Angeles, and he will conclude Wednesday in Arizona and Colorado. He raised $2.3 million in three events Tuesday, bringing his total to nearly $185 million at 75 events in the two-year election cycle, eclipsing the record he set in 2002.

Along the way, he has sharpened his tone. While saying he does not question their patriotism, Bush paints Democrats as a "cut-and-run" party that enables terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0074888

His indictment centers on three pieces of legislation: the USA Patriot Act expanding law enforcement powers; a measure authorizing warrantless surveillance of telephone calls and e-mail into and out of the United States when one person is suspected of ties to terrorists; and legislation creating military tribunals that restricts the rights of terror suspects and permits harsh interrogation to extract information. Noting that Democrats supported the Patriot Act in 2001 before filibustering its renewal last winter, Bush said, "They voted for it before they voted against it."

Bush's language, though, characterizes Democratic positions through his own prism. Critics of the surveillance program have not argued against listening to terrorist phone calls but say the government should get warrants from a secret intelligence court. Likewise, many critics of the tribunal measure did not oppose interrogating prisoners generally, as Bush said, but specific provisions of the bill, such as denying the right of habeas corpus or giving the president freedom to authorize what they consider torture.

"The sad truth is this White House and this Republican-controlled Congress have put our national security at risk," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "It's time for a change. The American people expect more than tough talk from their leaders. They expect tough and smart action. Democrats are fighting to take this country in a new direction."

A couple of hundred protesters gathered outside the Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium for the Pombo event, holding up signs such as "Lie, Deny, Occupy" and "State of Denial," and shouting, "Shame on you," at those entering the building. While Schwarzenegger stayed away, another actor showed up: Richard Kiel, the actor who played the villain Jaws in James Bond films.

Bush again remarked that it seems "like an eternity" since December elections in Iraq but predicted that "when this chapter of history will be written . . . it's going to be a comma -- the Iraqis voted, comma, and the United States of America understood that Iraq was a central front in the war on terror and helped this young democracy flourish." Democrats have complained that the comment dismisses thousands of American deaths as "a comma."

Bush Campaigning Amid GOP Woes (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, October 3, 2006

President Bush tried to focus voters on the fight against terror Tuesday and away from the ethics questions that are making the Republican election campaign difficult this year.

Bush ratcheted up his charges against Democrats during a fundraising tour of California, flatly accusing his political opponents of being soft on terror, but could not avoid the scandals that are dogging the GOP. He was campaigning for two incumbents who were benefactors of corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff and was drawn into defending the House speaker from calls for his resignation over a sex scandal on Capitol Hill.

But even if Bush can't erase his party's problems, he provided plenty of cash to fuel their cause in November's elections. His fundraising told for three events Tuesday was $2.3 million.

He told cheering Republicans at a $400,000 breakfast fundraiser for Rep. Richard Pombo that Democrats would raise their taxes and "cut and run" in Iraq.

"They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out," Bush said. He made the same charges later in the Sacramento suburb of El Dorado, where he raised $600,000 for Rep. John Doolittle.

Bush criticized Democrats who voted against legislation authorizing warrantless monitoring of phone calls and e-mails to detect terror plots and another bill that would allow tough interrogation of terror suspects by CIA agents.

"If they feel we are safer without this program, the Democrats in the United States Senate need to explain to the American people which of the attacks that the CIA program stopped would they have been willing to let go forward," Bush said.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada responded that Republicans have put national security at risk by bungling Iraq and ignoring warnings of the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago.

"The American people expect more than tough talk from their leaders," Reid said in a written statement e-mailed to reporters. "They expect tough and smart action."

Bush didn't mention the two Republicans' link to Abramoff in his fundraising stops. Both easily survived primary challenges this year from opponents who criticized them for their Abramoff donations, and both were expected to win in their reliably Republican districts in November.

Pombo received thousands of dollars in questionable contributions from Abramoff or his clients while supporting the lobbyist's causes. After the disclosures, Pombo gave $7,000 to charity that he had received from Abramoff. The congressman had denied taking any positions because of the money.

Doolittle used Abramoff's luxury sports box for a fundraiser without initially reporting it. Doolittle's wife and one of his former aides also worked for Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0074889

During a stop in Stockton's three-year-old George W. Bush Elementary School, Bush made his first comments on the revelations that Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., had sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage boys he met through the congressional page program. Foley resigned Friday when ABC News obtained copies, and House Speaker Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders are facing questions about why they didn't pursue the matter earlier.

Bush said he was "dismayed and shocked to learn about Congressman Foley's unacceptable behavior." Some, including the conservative Washington Times newspaper, have called for Hastert to resign, but Bush expressed confidence in the speaker's ability to resolve the matter.

Meanwhile, the Republican National Committee said Bush would not return $2,000 that Foley's political action committee gave to the president's re-election campaign in June 2003. Some other Republicans were returning or donating money that Foley had donated to their campaigns, but RNC spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt said Bush's re-election campaign "has basically been shut down."

"That money is no longer available to return," she said.

As of June 30, the last date that the Bush-Cheney re-election campaign reported its finances, $315,000 was left. But campaign officials said that money has been committed for outstanding campaign expenses and charitable donations.

Bush's final fundraiser was scheduled for Tuesday evening at a mansion in Beverly Hills. The event, hosted by investor Elliott Broidy and his wife Robin, was expected to raise $1.3 million for the RNC and was closed to the media.

The president was to wrap up the fundraising tour Wednesday with stops in Arizona and Colorado before returning to Washington.

___

The House interrogation resolution is HR 6166. The Senate bill is S 3930.

The House warrantless wiretapping bill is H.R. 5825; the Senate bill is S. 3931.

___

On the Net:

http://www.whitehouse.gov

Bush Tells Supporters Dems Soft On Terror (USAT)

By John Bacon And Sarah Elkins With Wire Reports

USA Today, October 4, 2006

President Bush tried to focus voters on the fight against terrorism Tuesday as his Western campaign swing swept into California. Bush accused his political opponents of being soft on terrorism at three events in the state designed to raise $2.3 million. He told cheering Republicans at a $400,000 breakfast fundraiser in Stockton that Democrats would raise their taxes and “cut and run” in Iraq. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada issued an e-mailed response that despite Bush's talk about being “tough,” Republicans have put national security at risk by bungling Iraq and ignoring warnings of the 9/11 attacks five years ago.

Bush wraps up the fundraising tour today with stops in Arizona and Colorado.

Dems rip Frist for Afghanistan comment

Democrats accused Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of waving a white flag for saying the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can't be won militarily and favoring bringing “people who call themselves Taliban” into the government. Frist, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said Monday in Afghanistan that Taliban members were too numerous and popular to be defeated. “You need to bring them into a more transparent type of government,” he said. “And if that's accomplished, we'll be successful.” House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., citing Taliban links to al-Qaeda, said Frist “suggests that the best way forward in Afghanistan is to coddle the Taliban by welcoming Taliban members into a coalition government, as if 9/11 had never happened.” Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said he was referring to Afghan tribesmen targeted for recruitment by the Taliban, not Taliban fighters.

Family goes against Mass. candidate

The siblings of Massachusetts gubernatorial hopeful Christy Mihos have donated to the independent candidate's competitor, GOP Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey.

James Mihos and his wife, Linda, donated $500 to Healey's campaign, while Mihos' sister, Marlene Mihos-Bucavalas, donated $100. James Mihos said that his brother's campaign attack ads have embarrassed the family and that he hopes his donation can “mitigate Christy's despicable behavior.” The Boston Globe has reported that Christy Mihos said in the spring, “Hey, look, families stay together, move apart … everyone sort of goes their separate way.”

Bush Blasts Democrats' 'Softer Side' (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0074890

By Stephen Dinan
The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

STOCKTON, Calif. -- President Bush yesterday accused Democrats of being "softer" on terrorists and charged that they compared CIA officers with the Taliban.

"If you don't think we should be listening in on the terrorists, then you ought to vote for the Democrats," Mr. Bush said at a fundraiser here for Rep. Richard W. Pombo, part of a three-day fundraising blitz through the West in the run-up to next month's congressional elections.

In his most bruising campaign speech to date, the president called out Democratic leaders, comparing Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's boast of having "killed the Patriot Act" to Sen. John Kerry's iconic "I actually did vote for the $87 billion before I voted against it" statement on Iraq war funding in the 2004 election.

Mr. Bush also said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi doesn't understand the war on terrorism because she said this year's elections shouldn't be fought on national security issues.

Last month, Mr. Bush challenged Congress to send him legislation enshrining the tools he says are needed to fight the war on terrorism, including wiretapping authority for the National Security Agency and interrogation authority for the CIA.

This week, Mr. Bush has become the official scorekeeper, tallying up those who opposed him: 160 House Democrats and 32 Senate Democrats on the interrogation bill, and 177 House Democrats on the wiretap authority.

"The Democrats want to have it both ways," Mr. Bush said. "They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out."

But Democrats said Mr. Bush has lost the credibility to level these charges.

"Given that this administration has misled the American people on so many issues like weapons of mass destruction, and what our intelligence agencies really said, it is pretty cheeky for the president to talk about trust," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Mr. Reid fired back by saying the administration is ignoring warnings about how badly the war in Iraq is going and failed to heed earlier warnings about al Qaeda in the run-up to the September 11 attacks.

"President Bush is no longer credible with the American people, no matter how many campaign speeches he gives in the next month," the Nevada Democrat said.

Mr. Bush never mentioned Mrs. Pelosi or Mr. Reid by name, but identified them and several others by position or quote: both California Sens. Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein; Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat; and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Bush blasted Mr. Leahy for opposing the interrogation program and said that on the Senate floor, Mr. Leahy compared CIA officers to the Taliban and deposed Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein.

"This exposes a dangerous mind-set on the part of Democrats in Congress," Mr. Bush said. "You can't defend America if you cannot tell the difference between the CIA officers who protect their fellow citizens and brutal dictators who kill their fellow citizens."

Mr. Leahy's spokesman, David Carle, called Mr. Bush's charge a "fabrication."

During a Senate debate, Mr. Leahy was calling for habeas corpus protections and laid out a hypothetical detention without those legal protections. He then compared the hypothetical to "something that would have happened under the Taliban, something that Saddam Hussein would have ordered or something out of Kafka."

The administration has said the CIA program helped foil a number of terrorist plots, and the president yesterday said Democrats must "explain to the American people which of the attacks that the CIA program stopped would they have been willing to let go forward."

U.S. Security At Stake In Upcoming Vote, Bush Says In Stockton (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske And Rone Tempest
The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

STOCKTON — President Bush painted the midterm election as a referendum on national security at fundraising events in California on Tuesday, saying congressional Democrats failed to provide the tools he needs to fight the war on terror.

"They talk tough on terror, but when the votes are counted, their softer side comes out," he told a crowd of about 650 at Stockton Memorial Civic Auditorium, flanked by Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy).

Bush also helped raise money for Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Roseville) at an event near Sacramento on Tuesday afternoon on his way to a third fundraiser in Bel Air.

Pombo and Doolittle, tarnished by their ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), have been campaigning hard in their solidly Republican districts.

DOJ_NMG_0074891

Bush called Pombo, chairman of the House Resources Committee, a man who "stands on principle" and supports the programs necessary to protect the country, including legislation protecting the CIA's program for detaining and interrogating suspected terrorists and the National Security Agency's communications surveillance program.

"The stakes in this election couldn't be more clear," Bush said. "If you don't think we should be listening in on the terrorists, then you ought to vote for the Democrats. If you want your government to continue listening in when Al Qaeda planners are making phone calls into the United States, then you vote Republican."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean issued a statement in response to Bush: "What's softer than giving up the hunt for Osama bin Laden and ignoring the 16 intelligence agencies who told him that the war in Iraq is making us less safe at home and around the world?"

Shawn and Wiley Chandler, grocery store owners from Stockton, are Pombo supporters who brought their three daughters to Tuesday's event. They said they were not upset that the congressman had accepted campaign donations from Abramoff, but they did worry about terrorism, and saw voting for Pombo as a way to protect themselves.

"I think he's on a mission, and we support what he's doing to keep hard-working families' taxes down, to help small businesses and to keep us safe," said Wiley Chandler, 42.

Peter Petroski, 58, a registered Republican from Danville, stood across the street from the auditorium Tuesday with several hundred protesters, hoisting a sign for Pombo's Democratic opponent, scientist Jerry McNerny.

Petroski said he voted for Pombo in 2004 and Bush in 2000, but found Pombo's ties to Abramoff and DeLay "embarrassing." He said he was troubled by Bush's speech, and by the NSA program, which he said violates basic civil liberties.

Both Doolittle, 55, an eight-term incumbent and Pombo, 45, now in his seventh term, waged expensive primary campaigns to fend off attacks from MoveOn.org, the Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund, the Sierra Club and other groups.

Pombo accepted campaign money from Abramoff and his clients and helped an Indian tribe Abramoff represented. The congressman later donated the Abramoff money to charity.

Doolittle also accepted campaign money from Abramoff and used the lobbyist's luxury skybox at a Washington sports arena for a fundraiser without reporting it. He has not returned the campaign money, instead defending Abramoff as a friend.

Years ago, Pombo and Doolittle also joined with DeLay, the former House majority leader who resigned amid money-laundering charges, to stop a federal investigation of a Texas businessman who donated to their campaigns.

Both McNerny and Doolittle's opponent, Charlie Brown, have been spotlighted by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee as among the top 15 competitive "emerging races" nationally.

Tuesday's events raised about $400,000 for Pombo, $600,000 for Doolittle and $1.2 million for the Republican National Committee.

More than 300 people paid $2,000 each to attend the Doolittle fundraiser at Serrano Country Club in El Dorado Hills.

Doolittle acknowledged Tuesday that his wife's consulting firm stood to make $90,000 for her role in organizing the event. He defended the arrangement with Julie Doolittle's political consulting company, Sierra Dominion Financial Solutions Inc., under which she makes 15% of all money the company raises for her husband.

"I hired her. She is a very good fundraiser, and she works very hard," Doolittle said.

Brown has repeatedly attacked Doolittle for his relationship with Abramoff, Julie Doolittle's fundraising commission and other purported ethical lapses.

Bush spoke for 30 minutes, focusing on national security issues. Afterward, he flew south for a reception at the Bel Air mansion of Robin Broidy, a former 20th Century Fox executive, and Elliott Broidy, chairman and CEO of Broidy Capital Management Co.

Absent from the day's events: Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger. His staff said he agreed months ago to campaign Tuesday for a handful of ballot measures to authorize $37 billion in bonds for levees, hospitals, schools and other public works.

Expensive Ad Markets Hike Campaign Costs (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats will have to overcome the high cost of TV advertising to win pivotal races in their bid to control Congress.

They're trying to pick up 11 House and Senate seats held by Republicans in expensive media markets. Republicans are attempting only four takeovers in top markets, a USA TODAY analysis shows.

The contrast underscores one of the chief difficulties Democrats face in their drive to win congressional majorities: raising enough money to make it happen.

DOJ_NMG_0074892

In Philadelphia — where Democrats are going after House seats held by Republicans Jim Gerlach, Curt Weldon and Michael Fitzpatrick — a typical 30-second ad during a local newscast on a network affiliate costs about $2,100, according to the non-partisan Campaign Media Analysis Group.

In Waco, Texas, where Republican Van Taylor is trying to oust Democratic Rep. Chet Edwards, a similar ad costs about $250.

"It's like comparing Mercedeses to Hyundais," says Evan Tracey, founder of the group.

Federal reports show some Democratic challengers keeping up with incumbents, such as Lois Murphy and Joe Sestak in their races against Gerlach and Weldon. And the Democrats' Senate and House campaign committees had as much or more money as Republicans did on Aug. 31.

However, the Democratic National Committee, which has invested heavily in a long-term program to build up party infrastructure in all 50 states, has far less money than its Republican counterpart going into the final weeks before Nov. 7 elections.

High advertising costs can translate into shorter media campaigns or more reliance on outlets that reach fewer voters, such as cable.

"There are lots of these (competitive) seats in very expensive areas," GOP pollster Bill McInturff says. "It gives incumbents one more modest edge because it's so much harder for challengers to build name ID."

Thomas "Doc" Sweitzer, a Philadelphia-based Democrat who is handling Sestak's ads, says vulnerable incumbents also must spend money this year: "They may have name recognition, but they don't have the job ratings … to ignore those markets."

Democrats are trying to win GOP-held Senate seats in Pennsylvania, Virginia, Missouri and Ohio, which means running ads in the top-20 markets of Philadelphia, Washington, St. Louis and Cleveland. Democrats are also making strong plays for seven GOP House seats near Philadelphia, Houston, Tampa, Chicago and Minneapolis.

Republicans are gunning for Democratic Senate seats in New Jersey and Maryland, which means buying ads in Philadelphia, New York City, Baltimore and Washington. While they're also vying for Democratic House seats near Chicago and Cleveland, many of the Republicans' top House takeover targets are in districts with smaller cities such as Waco; Rock Hill, S.C.; Burlington, Vt.; Wheeling, W.Va.; and Des Moines.

In New Mexico, One Of The Nation's Hottest Races (CSM)

By Jeff Kass

The Christian Science Monitor, October 4, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

The fault line in one of the country's tightest congressional races runs between Iraq, New Mexico, and who gets to march first in the state fair parade.

Republican incumbent Heather Wilson, seeking her fifth full term, faces the state's Democratic attorney general, Patricia Madrid, in a race that polls have shown as very close.

The race is a microcosm of dueling strategies other Democrats and Republicans are using in their campaigns this fall. Ms. Madrid is trying to tie Ms. Wilson to an unpopular president, a troublesome war in Iraq, and a culture of corruption in Washington. The Wilson campaign is trying to focus on local issues, and saddle Madrid with a state corruption scandal.

One issue that has not cropped up, despite New Mexico's status as a border state, is immigration. One that has been resolved - via coin toss - was that Madrid got to march ahead of Wilson in the parade. What remains is a tight contest.

An Albuquerque Journal poll released Oct. 1. showed Wilson and Mardrid dead even with each taking 44 percent of the vote. Seven percent of registered likely voters were undecided, and 5 percent said that they wouldn't vote for either one.

"Madrid's campaign is definitely a must-win race for Democrats' battle to regain control of the House," says Ramona Oliver, spokeswoman for EMILY's List, a political action committee for pro-choice Democratic women, which has funneled $220,000 to Madrid, according to the campaign. Money flows into both campaigns

Madrid has raised approximately $1.8 million total so far, while the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) has reserved $1.9 million for television ads in the district.

Wilson has raised some $2.8 million, and the National Republican Campaign Committee has spent $550,000 on the race, according to spokesman Alex Burgos.

Voter registration in New Mexico's first congressional district is 46 percent Democratic and 35 percent Republican, although both Wilson and Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry won the district in 2004. Republicans are counting on that split to continue working for Wilson.

"New Mexico One voters are very independent-minded," says Mr. Burgos. "They elect independent representatives." The incumbent

DOJ_NMG_0074893

Wilson's campaign website notes that she is "independent, honest, effective," and adds that she has "a clear independent streak."

Yet Wilson has been tied to Washington in some uncomfortable ways. Over the weekend, she said she would give $8,000 to charity that she had received from former Rep. Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who resigned Friday after news broke indicating that he had sent inappropriate e-mails to at least one male page.

And in line with other representatives, Wilson has returned other monies, such as $10,000 from former House Majority Leader and Republican Rep. Tom Delay of Texas.

An Air Force veteran who holds a PhD in international relations from Oxford University in England, Wilson sits on the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

She also serves on the House's Energy and Commerce Committee. In 2004, while serving on that committee, she excoriated CBS executives after Janet Jackson's breast-baring incident at the Super Bowl halftime show. Wilson has backed legislation for increased penalties for broadcast indecency.

Her campaign manager, Enrique Knell, did not return numerous phone calls over several weeks requesting an interview with Wilson. But he did e-mail a number of news articles about corruption allegations in the New Mexico state treasurer's office.

"As you can see," Mr. Knell wrote, "corruption in Santa Fe [the state capital] and Patricia Madrid's failure to root it out is the biggest issue in this race." The challenger

Yet one of Madrid's talking points has been her tough stance as a prosecutor. Sitting in a conference room at her husband's Albuquerque law firm, she touts her office's criminal prosecutions and pursuit of corporate wrongdoing against companies such as Enron. Those are also among the reasons the DCCC says it recruited Madrid into the race.

Madrid dressed in a black pantsuit, says Wilson is attempting to divert attention from a key issue on voters' minds: the war in Iraq.

"This race is going to be a referendum on this administration's conduct of the war and its unwillingness to give us a responsible exit plan," Madrid says. "Stay the course is not a plan. Stay the course is paralysis." New Mexico's demographics

New Mexico is 43.6 percent Latino, according to the 2005 American Community Survey from the US Census Bureau.

Madrid would be the first Latina elected to the House from New Mexico if she wins.

But the otherwise hot-button issue of immigration has not surfaced in the race. One possible reason is that the state's poor economy has failed to draw large numbers of outside workers, says F. Chris Garcia, professor emeritus of political science at the University of New Mexico. The large Latino population may also mean that Latino immigrants blend in more easily, he adds.

In these parts, Historic Route 66 becomes Central Avenue as it runs through Albuquerque, and is dotted with trendy restaurants, boutique shops, and tattoo parlors. Locals weigh in on the race

Ryan and Lisabeth Harwood, both 24 and brandishing a few tattoos, were outside the Sachs Body Modifications tattoo and piercing parlor one recent afternoon. Both plan to vote in the upcoming election, but the couple has been turned off by the negative commercials on TV.

Mr. Harwood, who works in an automotive shop, said his voter registration is unaffiliated. He voted for Wilson in the last election after meeting her at an art show - she answered his questions, and appeared competent. But he also voted for Kerry in 2004 because he agreed with the candidate on abortion and birth control issues.

Ms. Harwood, a body piercer at Sachs, did not live in the district during the last election, and has a mixed views of the candidates. "It seems that Patricia Madrid has more points that I would agree with, but the whole state treasurer fiasco has me kind of doubting her, and Heather Wilson seems more conservative and a George Bush lackey, so that has me more turned off towards her."

Ms. Harwood says of her vote in November, "I have no idea which way I'll go at this point."

First District facts

· Pop. in 2005: 640,640
· Pop. in 2000: 606,400
· Nonhispanic white: 48.5 percent
· Black: 2.3 percent
· Hispanic: 42.6 percent
· Median income: $38,413
· Poverty status: 14 percent
· Military veterans: 15.2 percent
· The International Balloon Fiesta is held in Albuquerque every October
· In 1975, Bill Gates founded Microsoft in Albuquerque
· The town of Rio Rancho is home to an Intel plant, and Sprint PCS facilities

DOJ_NMG_0074894

Sources: The 2006 Almanac of American Politics and 2005 American Community Survey

Schumer Sweats His Wall Street Ties To Fill War Chest (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

It is often said in Washington that the most dangerous place to stand is between Senator Chuck Schumer and a microphone. But it is an adage that does not seem to ring true these days.

In fact, for Republicans battling to hold on to their majority in the Congress, this election cycle has proved that the New York Democrat's sharp tongue and insatiable appetite for media attention are not nearly as dangerous as his lethal ties to Wall Street.

Most Democrats have set their hopes on wresting back control of the House of Representatives this November. But Mr Schumer's fundraising efforts as chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Commission (DSCC), and improving prospects in a handful of Senate races, have some Democrats believing that a narrow Senate victory is in reach.

The support of Democratic donors from New York, particularly Wall Street, has been key to Mr Schumer's success. Of the $81.3m (€64m, £43.3m) he has helped raise - $12m more than Senator Elizabeth Dole, his Republican counterpart - roughly 18 per cent has been donated by New Yorkers, making it the most lucrative donor base. That compares with 9 per cent in 2002, during the last midterm election cycle, when Washington DC held the top spot.

"We have had a lot of DSCC chairs over the years - some have been better than others. Chuck is certainly among the best: the energy and drive and leveraging of his relationships is quite extraordinary - all you have to do is look at the numbers," says Steven Rattner, a Democratic donor and principal of Quadrangle Group, the private equity firm.

It is difficult to compare current and previous election cycle fundraising statistics because of changes in campaign finance laws enacted in 2002. However, figures compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics show a significant increase in the amount individuals from some Wall Street banks have donated to the DSCC under Mr Schumer's watch. Some examples include Goldman Sachs, where individuals have donated $512,000 to the DSCC in this cycle compared with $125,832 during the last midterm election in 2002; Citibank employees have individually given eight times more to the DSCC over the past two years than they did in 2002, or about $228,701.

"I know a lot of people who are giving the maximum, or people who haven't given before. In NY, it helps that it's him - people know him and like him, and it's harder to say no when he makes an appeal," said one Wall Street donor.

Heather Podesta, a lobbyist and Democratic fundraiser, says Mr Schumer has differentiated himself by showing "tough love" to candidates, avoiding long-shots and personal favourites and narrowing in on races that Democrats believe are winnable: Virginia, Missouri, Ohio, Rhode Island, Montana and Pennsylvania.

"If we pick up four seats, Chuck Schumer is a hero. If we pick up six, he has God-like status," she says, hinting, too, at Mr Schumer's more ruthless side. "He is grateful but he pushes. He pushes donors, he pushes fundraisers, he does it only as a New Yorker can. It is matter-of-fact, it is to the point. And it gets done."

Mr Schumer's ties to the business community go beyond his home address: the veteran lawmaker sits on the banking and finance committees - a point not lost on some who analyse his fundraising prowess.

"In terms of the financial institutions, [donating to the DSCC] is a twofer [bonus]. Schumer is a noted fundraiser in his own right; if you can be responsive to a solicitation, you are really getting an extra bang for your buck," says Kenneth Gross, an attorney at Skadden Arps who advises on campaign finance issues. While supporters of the senator say he is liked by the business community because he is responsive to Wall Street, they also acknowledge he is not always on the "right" side of business.

Earlier this year Mr Schumer played a key role in orchestrating the backlash against the sale of US port terminals to Dubai Ports World. Although his campaign scored Democrats significant political points by portraying the White House as weak on national security and, some critics say, exploiting anti-Arab sentiment, business groups were aghast - and rattled - by the politicisation of the deal.

Even Democrats who disagree with Mr Schumer on the ports issue, as well as his stance on trade, however, recognise that for the New York senator, some political opportunities outweigh risks to the business community.

"Frankly, how can you argue with the politics of it?" says one Democratic donor. "If we do well in November, he deserves more than his share of credit. He is certainly pulling his weight, and more."

Dems, Lobbyists May Expand Partnership (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, October 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074895

There have been hotter tickets on K Street than the informal breakfasts sponsored by a group of centrist House Democrats.

Off and on for the past two years, the New Democrat Coalition (NDC), a "pro-growth" group that bills itself as a link between Democrats and the business community, have held regular meetings with a few friends and financial backers on K Street.

Over coffee and a modest breakfast, the handful of lobbyists who regularly attended swapped ideas with members and helped them develop a list of priorities, as they all dreamed of the day when Democrats regained control of the House so that they could actually implement the agenda.

But even if Democrats fall short of the majority this midterm, New Democrats and like-minded lobbyists say they may need to hold their meetings in a bigger room.

In a more evenly divided House, groups like the New Democrats and the Blue Dogs, a group of centrist-to-conservative Democrats, will likely hold greater sway over the legislative agenda, and therefore will be more sought after among K Streeters.

"On every issue, no matter the outcome in November, the slim majority will result in enormous influence for the NDC and other moderate blocs," said Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.), who directs the NDC political action committee.

Moreover, Smith added, the Democrats who take over Republican seats will most likely represent swing areas that favor centrist candidates, adding to the New Dem numbers and influence on Capitol Hill.

"The closer we get [to the majority], the more relevant the New Dems are," said Coalition Chairwoman Ellen Tauscher of California.

Lobbyists who have attended the regular meetings say that they were among the few on K Street who bothered with House Democrats, who were up against a majority that put a premium on party discipline.

"Any number of lobbyists on K Street thought the best play was the Senate because they could have a greater impact," says attendee said.

With a solid majority and firm grip on the Rules Committee, which decides which amendments can be introduced on the floor, House Republican leaders could pretty much determine the legislative agenda on their own, the lobbyist said. It was up to Democrats in the Senate, where the margin was closer, to block policies the party opposed.

But in recent months both New Dems and Blue Dogs have both done a "great job of presenting themselves as key to control the next Congress," said another Democratic lobbyist.

That success can be seen in the money both groups have raised in the run-up to the election.

The New Democrat Coalition PAC has raised nearly $500,000, distributing funds to more than 30 candidates. That number includes 21 challengers who would add to the ranks of the 43-member group if elected.

The Blue Dogs have done an even better job raising money. The group for the first time has raised over $1 million for candidates it supports.

Other caucuses, too, will be competing for the hearts and minds of party leadership. There are 64 members of the Congressional Progressive Caucus and 43 members of the Congressional Black Caucus, whose ranks include several members in line to take over key committees should Democrats win back the majority.

New Dems, with members from urban or suburban areas, and Blue Dogs, with a more rural base, are likely to be in conflict at times, too, particularly over social issues.

On those occasions Blue Dogs could be tough to beat. Lobbyists who support both groups say Blue Dogs have been more unified, focusing on budget issues, and attracted more support downtown. The group also sponsors weekly meetings with lobbyists.

But while New Dems have lost members in recent years, lobbyists said the result has been a more cohesive group that could rival the Blue Dogs in business community backing. Members are now required to regularly attend coalition meetings to demonstrate their commitment.

One thing that hasn't changed is the New Dems closeness to the high-tech community. Many of its members hail from districts with a large number of high-tech jobs.

Members are strong supporters of the "innovation agenda" developed by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) that seeks more money to support math and science education, permanent extension of the popular research and development tax credit, and a goal for universal broadband Internet access within the next five years.

In August, Smith, Tauscher and fellow New Dems Joseph Crowley and Carolyn McCarthy, both of New York, met executives from Sun, Oracle, Google, Yahoo!, Cisco, and several financial services groups in a series of meetings in Silicon Valley.

DOJ_NMG_0074896

That followed a retreat last spring at the Hyatt Regency Resort at Chesapeake Bay. Lobbyists who attended had to have contributed $5,000 to the PAC. Twelve New Dem members and more than 100 congressional staff members and K Street lobbyists attended the retreat.

And the breakfast meetings, once held once a month, have been “amped up,” in the words of one congressional aide, to once a week. Regularly attendees include: Dan Tate, of Capitol Solutions, Cory Alexander of Fannie Mae, Matt Tanielian of Cisco, Josh Ackil of the Information Technology Industry Council, Bruce Andrews of Quinn Gillespie, Scott Parven at Clark Consulting, and Melissa Schulman of the Bockorny Group.

Lobbyists said their clients could be expected to take an even greater interest in New Dems after the election.

“For a long time there were entire sections of the business community that haven’t looked at these groups,” Tate said. “But there is a natural fit there.”

That doesn’t mean, though, that business groups can expect to be as welcome in Democratic offices as they are in Republican ones.

“We represent swing districts,” Tauscher said. “But we are damn good Democrats.”

Senate Candidates Sound Familiar Themes In First Debate (AP)

By Kristen Wyatt

AP, October 3, 2006

BALTIMORE - In their first debate of the general campaign, Maryland's candidates for an open Senate seat repeated familiar themes in laying out a case for votes.

The Democrat, U.S. Rep. Ben Cardin, emphasized his opposition to the war in Iraq and a call for universal health insurance.

The Republican, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, called for more investment in minority businesses and said he'd be a careful listener for voters.

The independent, Kevin Zeese, mostly lobbed criticisms at the main parties and called for immediate abandonment of the war effort in Iraq.

The debate, held at the Baltimore Urban League, was the first - and so far only - forum for all three candidates before the election Nov. 7 to replace retiring Democratic Sen. Paul Sarbanes. Most of the 200 or so people in the audience were there in support of a candidate.

Race and the war were dominant themes at the two-hour forum. Cardin, who spoke first, immediately launched into the Iraq situation, reminding voters that he voted against the war while in the House.

"We may be in fact encouraging more terror than we've solved with the war in Iraq," he said.

Steele made only oblique references to the war in his opening statements, not saying how the nation should proceed. Asked about his position later, Steele said he opposed a withdrawal plan for the troops and said the war should be fought differently, perhaps, but not ended.

"We need to make sure we finish the job," he said. "This is not the time to step back."

Zeese, whose opposition to the war is paramount to his outsider campaign, was happy to deride both Democrats and Republicans for allowing and funding the war. "The sensible thing to do," he said, "is to get out."

Race was another theme in the forum. Steele is the only African-American elected statewide, running against a white Democrat. Steele brought up race early, opening his remarks with a story about his sharecropping ancestors and working-poor mother. He said he was proud to be a Republican.

"The real Michael Steele is someone who was raised to think for himself," he said. He later said that his status as a rare black Republican "empowered me to look across party lines."

Cardin said he'd be the best candidate for black voters because, even though he is white, he would challenge Republicans and President Bush.

"The voters in the African-American community want change," he said, describing himself as the best candidate to change the nation's direction.

But Steele and Zeese laid claim to that role as well. Steele plainly told voters not to choose him if they don't want a major shake-up in Washington, and Zeese argued that no one from a major party would be the agent to change the federal government.

The debate was the only one scheduled so far in the general campaign to include all three candidates on Maryland ballots. Steele and Cardin have agreed to a televised debate on NBC's "Meet the Press" late this month, but no other debates have been set.

DOJ_NMG_0074897

Steele, Cardin Draw Distinctions (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

BALTIMORE, Oct. 3 -- Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and U.S. Rep. Benjamin Cardin stripped away the niceties and exchanged sharp words Tuesday night in their first debate in the race for the U.S. Senate.

Steele, the Republican, at one point told the Baltimore congressman to "shut up and listen" to the citizens of the state. Cardin unloaded on Steele for failing to address a series of issues while campaigning -- most pointedly, the war in Iraq.

The debate offered the first chance to see the striking contrasts between the two major party candidates vying for the seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D).

The physical differences between the two, standing on stage in a Gothic 19th-century church building in downtown Baltimore, were impossible to miss -- Steele, 47, 6-foot-4 and looking polished in a designer suit; Cardin, 62, short and a bit portly in standard dark pinstripe, looking every bit the bookish legislative technician.

For Cardin, a chief goal of the debate was to turn the focus away from style and onto substance, where there are also sharp differences between the two that put him more in line with the views of Maryland's large population of Democratic voters.

"It's not about how nice we appear or how we deal with friendliness or how well we listen, because I'm a pretty good listener," Cardin said. "It's about how you are going to represent the interests of the people of Maryland."

In the first remarks of the night, before 300 people, Cardin checked off a long list of positions he has taken: opposing the Iraq war, supporting a minimum wage increase, backing embryonic stem cell research. He urged Steele to address each one, and concluded that his experience on Capitol Hill would put him in the position to "get things done."

"I have been effective when the Democrats controlled Congress and when Republicans have controlled Congress," he said. "As a result, I've changed Washington."

When Steele took his first turn to speak, he tried to turn Cardin's 20 years in Congress and 40 years in elected office against him. The man who took his first elected job in 2002 repeatedly described himself as an agent of change and his opponent as someone who has been on Capitol Hill too long.

"I do not want to go to Washington to retire," Steele said. "I want to go get something done."

The lieutenant governor, seizing the offensive, chided Cardin for not acknowledging the presence of independent candidate Kevin Zeese.

"What you just watched was the problem of Washington," Steele said, stepping out from the podium to face Cardin. "They run their mouths, but they do not listen. After 40 years of service, honorable service, he still has not learned to look around the room and shut up and listen. That was a lesson my mother taught me a long time ago."

Zeese, who has the backing of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties, spoke next.

"I don't think we've been more off track than we are now," Zeese said of the nation. He derided the war and the efforts by special interests to control Washington. "We all know that the elephant in the room is that this country is being sold to the highest bidder."

Cardin succeeded only somewhat at his primary aim: pinning down Steele on issues that the lieutenant governor has avoided discussing: the Iraq war, health-care policy, Social Security.

The starkest differences between the candidates emerged during a question about the Iraq war. Cardin called for an immediate redeployment of troops without a specific timetable for withdrawal. Zeese called for an immediate withdrawal. Steele said that troops should stay but that the United States should "shift our tactics."

"This is not the time to step back," Steele said.

The moderator pressed Steele: "Tell me Mr. Steele, are things going badly?"

"In what respect?" Steele replied, prompting derisive laughter from the crowd. Pressed again, Steele conceded: "It's not going well, no."

The stylistic distinctions were ever-present on stage. On several occasions, Cardin slipped into using acronyms and impenetrable government-speak, while Steele fell back on his compelling personal story.

Steele presented himself as an independent voice, and he challenged Cardin's assertion that he would "change the direction of this nation" in the Senate.

"I appreciate your definition of change, but, frankly, it's an outdated definition," Steele responded. "How can you be a change agent when you vote 95 percent of the time with your party?"

Cardin disagreed, saying after the debate that his long record shows that "I call it as I see it."

Steele came armed with numbers for one of the most consistent lines of attack against Cardin: his campaign contributions from political action committees tied to large drug and energy companies.

DOJ_NMG_0074898

In commercials and in person, Steele has suggested that Cardin is beholden to special interests in Washington. In reality, both of them have raised hundreds of thousands of dollars from PACs. Steele has enlisted a group of lobbyists -- known as Team Steele -- to solicit PAC contributions for him.

Both campaigns view debates as critical in the hotly contested race, although it remains unclear how many there will be. Among Cardin's advisers, the debates are viewed as a chance to humanize a candidate who has spent the past 40 years in public life, and to turn the race into a clash of policy ideas.

For Steele, the debates are a chance to present himself as a serious alternative to Cardin, even for Democrats who might normally shy away from a former chairman of the Maryland Republican Party.

Steele, Cardin Wrangle Over Race In Debate (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland's U.S. Senate candidates Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin clashed over racial issues last night in their first debate of the campaign.

"There are too many divisions in America along racial lines and along economic lines," Mr. Cardin, a Democrat, said during the two-hour debate at the Greater Baltimore Urban League, which is based in a church that once served as a refuge for escaped slaves on the famed Underground Railroad.

"Voters in the African-American community want change, and if they vote for me, they will get change," Mr. Cardin said. "I voted against [President] Bush's budget because Bush's budget is leading America in the wrong direction, and the people in the African-American community know that."

Mr. Steele, a Republican and the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland, responded: "I appreciate your message of change, but it is an outdated message."

"My opponent, Mr. Cardin, says he wants to be a change agent," Mr. Steele told the boisterous crowd that filled the old church hall. "How can you be a change agent if you vote with your party 95 percent of the time?"

The candidates also clashed over the Iraq war, health care and education.

Mr. Cardin said his Republican opponent was allied with the president in support of the Iraq war and against raising the minimum wage and universal health care coverage.

"I've stood up to the presidents of both parties when it was in the interest of the citizens of Maryland," said Mr. Cardin, who has been running on his experience as a 10-term congressman from Baltimore and former speaker of the state House of Delegates.

Mr. Steele criticized Mr. Cardin, 62, for spending 20 years in Congress and showing little change to the quality of life in his district.

"At what point, Mr. Cardin, will you begin looking at what is going on in your own back yard?" he said.

Earlier, Mr. Steele, 47, chided Mr. Cardin for opening remarks that focused almost exclusively on the lieutenant governor's association with Mr. Bush.

"What you have just witnessed is the trouble with Washington," Mr. Steele said. "They run their mouths, but they don't listen. ... After 40 years of humble public service, he still has not learned to look around the room, shut up and listen."

The remark drew competing cheers and jeers from the crowd.

Mr. Steele said Mr. Cardin had ignored the other candidate in the debate, Kevin Zeese, 51, an anti-war activist running under the banners of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties.

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele are expected to meet at least one more time before the Nov. 7 election, including an appearance Oct. 29 on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele have similar stances on key issues, such as advocating an expedited exit strategy for troops in Iraq. But they confront each other from opposite ends of the political spectrum.

Mr. Cardin is a liberal who last year received a 95 percent rating from the liberal Americans for Democratic Action.

Mr. Steele is a conservative, but with an independent streak that at times could put him at odds with his party.

The starkest contrast is on abortion. Mr. Steele is pro-life; Mr. Cardin is pro-choice.

However, racial politics remain the focus of the contest.

Black voters account for much of the Democrat's 2-to-1 advantage in voter registration. Maryland has nearly 900,000 registered Republicans and about 1.7 million registered Democrats, of which an estimated 700,000 are black.

Mr. Steele's ability to forge inroads to black communities has made the race one of the most closely watched in the country and one of the most hard-fought campaigns between the national parties.

DOJ_NMG_0074899

Mr. Cardin has scrambled to connect with black voters since his narrow win in the Democratic primary over Kweisi Mfume, former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 43.8 percent to 40.4 percent, despite outspending Mr. Mfume by about $3 million on television ads.

Mr. Mfume won by large margins in Baltimore and Prince George's County, two of the state's most populous and heavily Democratic jurisdictions that also are more than 65 percent black.

Mr. Cardin last week wooed black voters at a campaign rally in Prince George's County with Mr. Mfume and Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat and the country's only black senator.

However, the rally was tempered by Mr. Mfume's public criticism that the state Democratic Party still lacks black candidates at the top of the ticket.

"The Democratic ticket of four nominees for statewide office ... still looks like the Democratic ticket for state office in 1956," he said.

The sting of racism keeps infecting the campaign.

Mr. Steele has criticized Mr. Cardin for stirring anti-Republican sentiment in black communities by repeatedly invoking Mr. Bush and the Hurricane Katrina disaster, which for some has come to symbolize the Bush administration's supposed neglect of poor black people.

The references to Katrina and Mr. Bush follow the Democratic National Committee's strategy of convincing voters that Mr. Steele is a "typical Republican" as opposed to a black candidate.

Mr. Cardin, who last year pledged not to use racial attacks against Mr. Steele, said he is not race-baiting by talking about the government's response to the hurricane because it is an issue in the Senate race.

"It is about the failure of government to protect its most vulnerable citizens," he said.

Mr. Zeese railed against the Democrats and Republicans, saying they are "status quo parties" that are beholden to corporate special interests. He advocated free college tuition, an end to the United States' global military presence and development of clean energy technologies.

"We've got to say no more corporate control," Mr. Zeese said. "We need a government of the people. That's what I'm running for."

The forum was Maryland's first debate for statewide office to include a third-party candidate.

Sen. Clinton Supports Webb In Va. Campaign (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton endorsed Democratic Senate candidate James Webb yesterday as he and Republican Sen. George Allen intensified their efforts to woo female voters in the Virginia campaign's closing month.

The high profile appearance by Clinton (D-N.Y.) at a fundraising lunch in Old Town Alexandria provided a needed boost to Webb, whom Allen has criticized for his past attitude toward women in the military.

While the former first lady was announcing her support for Webb, Allen was attending a similar function in Fredericksburg held by his wife, Susan, and Cecelia Howell, the wife of House of Delegates Speaker William J. Howell (R-Stafford).

The Senate candidates' views toward women have become a central character issue of the campaign. Allen, who has had problems with questions about his racial sensitivity, has sought to shift attention to Webb's opposition 27 years ago to women in combat.

Allen is running an expensive statewide television advertising campaign featuring three female graduates of the U.S. Naval Academy complaining about remarks Webb wrote in a 1979 magazine article, "Women Can't Fight." Webb, a former Marine and secretary of the Navy, began airing an ad yesterday with a female academy graduate rebutting the allegations.

Echoing the theme of Webb's ad, Clinton told reporters: "I've watched and analyzed what Jim Webb has done when he was in the Pentagon, opening up positions -- thousands of them -- to women when previously they had not been available. We have women serving with valor and distinction because the battlefield has changed."

A day after paying for a two-minute TV commercial calling for the campaign to focus on political issues instead of character issues, Allen said at the Fredericksburg luncheon that his Webb commercials are about "respect for women." His campaign vowed to continue attacking what they say is the Democrat's biggest vulnerability.

"That article from 1979 gives an insight into the core of James Webb that is not going to go away and is going to cut deeply," Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said. He said the Democrats have "gone into a defensive posture, trying to blunt the criticism about Webb's disrespect of women."

Webb has said he was not wrong for participating in a national debate in the late 1970s about whether women should serve in the military. He has said he is "fully comfortable with the roles of women in the military today."

DOJ_NMG_0074900

The most recent polls show the Allen-Webb race tied. Advisers for both camps said the winner Nov. 7 could be the candidate with an advantage among women, who account for 3.7 million, or slightly more than half, of Virginia's population.

Female voters helped Timothy M. Kaine (D) beat former attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore (R) last year in the governor's race after Kaine offered messages about preschool, traffic and faith that were tailored specifically for church-going women in the suburbs.

Nationally, both parties have spent millions courting "soccer moms" and "security moms," mothers worried about terrorism and security issues.

"It's the same group. It's moderate to conservative women who are perhaps not so consumed with the political process because they have lives to live," said Democratic pollster Pete Brodnitz, who worked for Kaine last year and is now on Webb's team. "They are making their decision a bit later. There's a lot of effort expended on both sides to talk to women."

Allen aides said they will continue to seek advantage among that group by hammering Webb for his past views, which included highly-charged language to describe women at the Naval Academy. Wadhams said they will also continue to showcase Allen's wife, who was a popular first lady when Allen was governor.

"We have a very strong opportunity to appeal to women voters, and I think that's a significant part of the debate," Wadhams said.

Webb campaign manager Steve Jarding dismissed Allen's appeal to women, noting that the senator opposes abortion rights and embryonic stem cell research -- two issues that Jarding said put Allen at odds with most women in Virginia.

"This is not a champion of women's issues," Jarding said of the senator. "The Allen campaign knows that." One of the Naval Academy graduates who initially joined Allen in criticizing Webb has now accepted his apology and endorsed the Democrat.

Clinton, who raised about $75,000 for Webb, praised him as a decisive leader who would stand up to the Bush administration. She said it was important to "replace subservient Republicans who are unwilling to ask the hard questions with Democrats like Jim Webb, who will."

Webb once called President Bill Clinton's administration the most "corrupt" in history. He has said his animosity was fueled by Clinton's attempts to get out of serving in Vietnam, where Webb was wounded and received several medals and commendations.

As for his support of women, Webb said yesterday that "probably the most important thing I can say about that entire issue is that there's a term in law, res ipsa loquitur , the thing speaks for itself"; he then introduced his top campaign staff members, five of whom are women.

Allen spoke yesterday to about 50 women in Howell's backyard in Fredericksburg. Several of the women there wore buttons proclaiming "Vote for Susan Allen's Husband."

The senator said he has been a leader in efforts to get more women interested in pursuing careers in math and science. Allen also talked about keeping taxes low and winning the war in Iraq.

When Susan Allen was asked whether she agreed with her husband's opposition to abortion rights, she said: "Labels are not necessarily a good thing. I believe George's record looking at that particular issue is excellent. He's represented Virginia values."

Hillary Headlines Webb Event (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton endorsed Democrat James H. Webb Jr. in the U.S. Senate race in Virginia at a fundraiser yesterday, while incumbent Sen. George Allen tried to refocus his stumbling campaign on his political accomplishments.

The former first lady also downplayed a television advertisement paid for by Mr. Allen that hammers Mr. Webb for the view he held about a woman's role in combat 27 years ago.

Mrs. Clinton, who headlined the "Women for Webb" luncheon in Alexandria, said Congress needs someone with Mr. Webb's military expertise and demonstrated leadership who can stand up to President Bush and the Republican majority.

"We need to elect Democrats," Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, said. "We're never going to have the right kind of debate about what needs to be done in Iraq or Afghanistan until we have some leverage in the Congress and frankly replace some of the subservient Republicans who are unwilling to ask the hard questions, and Democrats like Jim Webb will."

Mr. Allen has backed Mr. Bush 96 percent of the time, making the senator the third biggest supporter of the president in the U.S. Senate.

When asked about Mr. Webb's 1979 "Women Can't Fight" article that questioned whether women were fit for military combat and apparently led to women facing harassment at the Naval Academy, Mrs. Clinton said, "Times have changed."

DOJ_NMG_0074901

"That was about 30 years ago, and I've watched and analyzed what Jim Webb has done when he was in the Pentagon -- opening up positions, thousands of them to women where previously they had not been available," Mrs. Clinton said.

Mr. Webb has apologized for the "tone" of the article and stressed that as secretary of the Navy under President Reagan he opened more military billets to women than any secretary in history had.

Meanwhile, Mr. Allen kicked off an "Issues, Ideas, Proven Record Tour" in Fredericksburg, Va., yesterday, as he tries to refocus his campaign on his record as state legislator, congressman, governor and U.S. Senator.

Mrs. Clinton's appearance at Mr. Webb's fundraiser came the morning after Mr. Allen aired a rare two-minute statewide TV address Monday evening to turn around a floundering campaign. Mr. Allen's campaign spent $50,000 on the ad.

Mr. Allen's campaign has been bogged down in character questions concerning his "macaca" remark, his reaction to a reporter's question about his Jewish heritage and accusations that he often used the "n-word" in the 1970s. Mr. Allen referred to a Webb aide as a macaca -- considered a racial slur in some cultures -- while campaigning in August.

"The negative personal attacks and baseless allegations have also pulled us away from what you expect and deserve," Mr. Allen told viewers in the ad.

The prerecorded address ran a few minutes after one of Mr. Allen's spots attacking Mr. Webb for his positions in the "Women Can't Fight" article had aired.

Mr. Webb's campaign yesterday responded to Mr. Allen's negative attacks with a 30-second TV ad featuring retired military women praising Mr. Webb's record as Navy secretary.

"He created more operational positions for women than anybody in the history of the Navy," retired Coast Guard Petty Officer 1st Class Nancy McPherson says in the ad.

"It's easy to just take shots at people, it's harder to actually change things, and that's what I did as Navy secretary," Mr. Webb says in the ad.

The new spot comes toward the end of a three-month period in which Mr. Webb has benefited from Mr. Allen's missteps and raised an estimated $3 million.

Kristian Denny Todd, a spokeswoman for Mr. Webb, said the campaign will use the money to air additional TV ads that will highlight differences between the candidates.

Allen Adlifts Hopes Of Backers (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Virginia conservatives, frustrated with Sen. George Allen's re-election campaign, were hopeful yesterday that the Republican's address televised statewide Monday evening will reverse his slip in the polls.

The senator now is almost tied with or slightly favored over his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr. Supporters say Mr. Allen needs to refocus on the issues if he wants to win re-election.

That was what Mr. Allen promised in the rare two-minute ad, saying that until the Nov. 7 election he will talk about his record, both as a senator and as governor in the 1990s.

"Good enough, but hardly enough to change the course of the race," wrote Norman Leahy, an Allen supporter who runs the One Man's Trash blog. "Will this spot change any votes? No."

The taped spot, which ran on five stations just before 8 p.m., was a smart move but might not be enough, said state Sen. Jay O'Brien, Fairfax County Republican.

"It was the right thing to do to say, 'Let's get off this other junk and talk about the issues,'" he said.

Mr. O'Brien said he was shocked at Mr. Allen's defensive stance to accusations that he used racial slurs as a college football player and to the fallout from the widely televised moment when he called an Indian-American Webb volunteer "macaca." The word is considered an ethnic slur in some cultures.

David B. Botkins, a former press aide to Mr. Allen, said the ad charts a positive course.

"It changes the calculus" and re-energizes Mr. Allen's conservative base, he said.

Delegate David B. Albo, Fairfax County Republican, said energetic conservatives will be key for Mr. Allen on Election Day.

"All we need to win the Senate seat for George Allen is to have the Republicans in Northern Virginia show up," he said. "If they stay home, we have problems."

Some Republicans put Mr. Allen at fault for steering the campaign off course, particularly with the "macaca" remark.

Mr. Allen acknowledged in the ad: "Some of this I've brought on myself."

"This whole campaign has degenerated into macaca and all the other racial allegations, and no one knows that he's probably going to go down in history as one of the best governors of Virginia, putting him on the same level as Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson," Mr. Albo said.

DOJ_NMG_0074902

One Republican expressed regret last week that Jay Timmons, a longtime Allen adviser, was not on board.

"He was a control freak, but there was control," the Republican said.

Mr. Timmons left to join the private sector in 2004, but Hotline on Call reported Monday that he has returned to Mr. Allen's staff as a senior adviser.

The Allen campaign said the Monday night ad cost $50,000. The senator is following up with a statewide tour with the theme "Issues, Ideas, Proven Record."

Shaun Kenney, a conservative Republican who ran unsuccessfully for a Spotsylvania seat in the House of Delegates last year, called the ad a "huge" step forward for Mr. Allen.

"Take note, Webb supporters. When the opposition is getting dogpiled by the press, go positive," he said.

Critics said Mr. Allen's wife, Susan, seemed "awkward" and "plastic" standing next to her husband in the ad.

Others praised the placement of a photograph of Mr. Allen's late father, George H. Allen, near a helmet of the Washington Redskins, the team he coached.

Understanding George Allen's Best Black Friend (WP)

By Courtland Milloy

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Benjamin J. Lambert III, who serves in the Virginia Senate, hears the question all the time: Why would such an influential black Democrat come to the rescue of George Allen, a white Republican U.S. senator who was being tarred and feathered by his own racist past?

Allen's once seemingly sure-shot bid for reelection remains in jeopardy because of accusations that he used a racial slur and the fact that he had an affinity for racist symbols such as nooses and the Confederate flag. But the political hemorrhaging has eased somewhat since Allen found a powerful new best black friend to help burnish his image.

"I look at it from the point of view that people are capable of change, of learning from their mistakes," said Lambert, a 28-year veteran of Virginia electoral politics and former campaign manager for L. Douglas Wilder (D) during his run to become the first African American governor since Reconstruction. "George has apologized. He said he understands the plight of African Americans and their sensitivities regarding the Confederate flag. He said he was going to do much better. I say, 'Let's give him a chance.' "

It is no coincidence that Lambert's endorsement came after a pledge by Allen to secure nearly a half-billion dollars in federal funding for financially troubled historically black colleges. Moreover, at Lambert's urging, Allen, along with Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), announced their sponsorship Monday of a bill that would honor the late U.S. District Judges Spottswood W. Robinson III, who was black, and Robert R. Merhige Jr., who was white, by having a new federal courts building in Richmond named after them "for their historic roles in the nation's civil rights struggle."

No small order in the capital of the Confederacy.

Asked if Allen's financial commitments had influenced his decision to endorse, Lambert demurred: "Let's just say I have a strategy."

But not everybody is convinced that a half-billion dollars is adequate reparation for Allen's alleged insults, which some see as evidence that the racist underpinnings of Virginia's virulent history of slavery live on.

One blog, Skeptical Brotha, offered a reaction to Lambert's endorsement that is no doubt shared by many African Americans: "George Allen's confederate bandwagon of confused colored folks has grown by another this week," the blogger wrote last month.

Other blacks who support Allen include William R. Harvey, president of historically black Hampton University, and Charley Taylor and Roy Jefferson, both retired professional football players who were coached by Allen's late father on the Washington Redskins. "For these manifestly fraudulent endorsements, these contemptable black sycophants have earned themselves Skeptical Brotha's '2006 House Negroes of the Year Award,' " the blogger wrote.

But Lambert is undaunted. To hear him tell it, there is always more to racial politics in Virginia than meets the eye. Sometimes a whole lot more -- as in, say, the legendary affair between Thomas Jefferson and Sally Hemings.

"I was born in 1937 and went to segregated schools in Henrico County," Lambert told me. "But I had white friends. Somehow, we all got along. I found that people could be different up close than they appeared to be from afar."

To Lambert, Allen looks better up close. He is more than someone who referred to a person of color as "macaca," which is a genus of monkey. "I'm not going to hold a person's words against them, especially after they stand up and apologize," Lambert said. "I'm most interested in education for African Americans, making sure historically black colleges stay in existence, and I'm going to work with anyone who can help keep them alive. George and I share that goal."

As for people who call him a sellout, Lambert said, "What have they done to keep a school open?"

DOJ_NMG_0074903

And yet, the appearance of Allen buying his way out of a racially explosive predicament discounts the black struggle against racism -- which continues despite the insistence of some whites that race no longer matters. During a speech in February about the need for a U.S. Slavery Museum, former governor Wilder, now mayor of Richmond, noted that slavery and racism were not ancient history. "The legacy of slavery is as much a part of our present and, if left alone, will tragically remain a part of our future."

Wilder has publicly expressed bewilderment at his former campaign manager's decision to support Allen. But in private talks with Lambert, Wilder does not come off as confused at all. "He asked me to talk to George about getting money for the slave museum," Lambert recalled.

Race relations are not always what they seem. And in a state fraught with racial contradictions, macaca may turn out to be a gift to African Americans that keeps on giving. At least if Lambert has his way.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

A real achievement

"The 109th Congress limped out of town at a particularly ugly moment. But it had some achievements worth noting. Well, one achievement, anyway," syndicated columnist James P. Pinkerton writes.

"It might be the case that this November the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley ... will be foremost in the voters' minds. If that's the situation, Republicans will have a bad Election Day, exactly five weeks from now," Mr. Pinkerton said yesterday.

"And if so, then the biggest accomplishment of this Congress, the authorization for construction of a wall across much of the U.S.-Mexican border, is likely to be downplayed by the media. Yet, fortunately, the wall-building issue is firmly planted in voters' minds, not only for this election, but for the future. And while the partisans on both sides of the debate are fired up by the wall-troversy, it's obvious that immigration hawks far outnumber immigration doves."

Cash infusion

Democrat Ned Lamont, seeking to erase Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman's double-digit lead, is turning to his campaign's biggest financial backer for another infusion of cash: himself.

The multimillionaire businessman, who trailed by 10 percent in a recent poll, wrote a $500,000 check to his campaign this week, an aide said yesterday. Just last week, Mr. Lamont had tapped his personal wealth for $750,000 to help fund the race. He has spent $6,751,500 of his own money to unseat the 18-year incumbent.

The Lamont camp said it needs the money to blunt Mr. Lieberman's aggressive television ad campaign. Both sides are spending heavily on commercials. Mr. Lieberman has run ads recently suggesting that political newcomer Mr. Lamont lacks the experience to be an effective senator.

"Ned is not going to let Senator Lieberman's negative allegations go unanswered," said Lamont spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl. "We've said all along we're not going to take this lying down."

The Lieberman campaign scoffed at Mr. Lamont's move to bolster his campaign, the Associated Press reports.

"We fully expect Ned Lamont to keep drawing on millions of his own money to continue funding his negative campaign," said Lieberman spokeswoman Tammy Sun.

Meanwhile, in another good sign for the Lieberman campaign, the Hill newspaper reports that Mr. Lieberman says the chamber's Democratic leadership has assured him he would keep his seniority if he returns to Congress as an independent.

But Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, said his boss "won't make any decisions until after the elections in November."

A taxing agenda

"Democrats are campaigning on 'a new direction for America,' but they've been deliberately abstemious with any details of what that means," the Wall Street Journal says in an editorial.

"New York Sen. Chuck Schumer told the Journal last week that silence is their strategy because laying out an agenda 'gives Republicans a target.' So much for the courage of one's convictions," the newspaper said.

"Apparently, however, Mr. Schumer hasn't connected with Charlie Rangel, the 36-year House veteran from New York City who will chair the Ways and Means Committee if Democrats win a majority. Mr. Rangel has been happy to explain his own agenda on taxes and the war in Iraq.

"In a recent interview with Bloomberg News, Mr. Rangel was asked specifically if any of the Bush first-term tax cuts were worth preserving, and he answered that he 'cannot think of one.' Then last week, Mr. Rangel was asked by Congress Daily whether he'd consider tax increases across the income spectrum. 'No question about it,' he said. 'Everything has to be on the table.'

DOJ_NMG_0074904

"'Everything' would mean repealing the 10 percent low-income bracket, the child tax credit and marriage-penalty relief, all of which passed in 2001 and expire in 2010. According to the Treasury Department, repealing those provisions would raise taxes on the average middle-income family by about $2,000 a year. Most Democrats say they only want to raise taxes on the rich, so give the would-be chairman points for honesty."

Back in the race

Rep. John P. Murtha is back in the race for House majority leader, should the Democrats come out on top in November, Roll Call reports.

"We're back campaigning again," Mr. Murtha said Friday in an interview taped for C-SPAN's "Newsmakers."

The Pennsylvania lawmaker had suspended his bid in June just days after announcing his intentions, faced with criticism from fellow Democrats who feared a divisive leadership campaign could distract the party heading into the November elections.

Name game

A divided Ohio Supreme Court yesterday threw out a lawsuit attempting to force the release of the names of donors backing a group that ran ads critical of the Democratic candidate for governor.

Democrats want to know who donated $1.5 million that a group called Common Sense Ohio gave to Common Sense 2006, which used the money for ads criticizing Democratic Rep. Ted Strickland. The two groups say the contributors' identities are protected by their nonprofit status.

The court ruled 4-3 that it didn't have jurisdiction to rule on the lawsuit, filed by the Ohio Democratic Party on behalf of Mr. Strickland. The court said state law gives that authority solely to the Ohio Elections Commission.

10-point lead

Washington Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Democrat, has a 10-point lead over Republican challenger Mike McGavick five weeks before the election, according to a new McClatchy-MSNBC poll.

Miss Cantwell was at 50 percent, and Mr. McGavick, a former insurance company executive, at 40 percent, with 9 percent undecided. Nearly half of those polled had a favorable opinion of Miss Cantwell. She is seeking a second term six years after she was elected by 2,229 votes in what was then one of the closest races in state history.

Mr. McGavick's approval rating stood at 30 percent, but even after months of nonstop campaigning, 45 percent of those surveyed had no opinion about him or didn't recognize him.

Back in Ohio

Returning to the state that dashed his presidential hopes in 2004, Sen. John Kerry urged college students: "Take back Ohio; take back our country."

"All of the things that make a difference in the real quality of life are going in the wrong direction," the Massachusetts Democrat told about 300 supporters in the rally at Ohio State University.

Mr. Kerry, who conceded the 2004 election after he lost Ohio's 20 electoral votes, defended the Democrats against charges that they have no ideas, citing plans by Democrats for health care, education, jobs, trade and global warming, the Associated Press reports.

Democrats' Jersey Barrier (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

JERSEY CITY -- It's 1 in the morning, and Bob Menendez, a red bindi dot on his forehead, is at his third Navratri festival of the night. "Namaste," says the Democratic senator, pressing his palms together and looking out over a street thronged with Indian Americans who've taken a break from the exuberant dancing at the traditional Hindu festival.

On this day, Menendez's pitch to keep his Senate seat has taken him on a marathon spin through the ethnic kaleidoscope of New Jersey politics. He dropped by the city's Irish Festival, a backyard barbecue with the Latino community, a meeting with African American leaders and a Korean celebration -- before boarding a bus full of Indian American supporters for this late-night blitz.

"I always drive myself hard," he says, but this fall the 52-year-old Menendez has especially good reason to push. In a year when Democrats across the country are doing better than expected, his race could be a glaring counterexample -- and a potentially costly one, given Democrats' outside chance of retaking the Senate.

Gov. Jon S. Corzine tapped Menendez, then the House's third-ranking Democrat, to fill his unexpired Senate term. Winning election on his own should have been the easy part -- this reliably blue state hasn't elected a Republican senator for 34 years, and President Bush's popularity is low. But Menendez now finds himself in a too-close-to-call race against Republican Tom Kean

DOJ_NMG_0074905

Jr., the 38-year-old son of the popular former governor. The scion of a patrician family, Kean is waging a decidedly ungentlemanly campaign against Menendez, the son of poor Cuban immigrants.

The race, in broad strokes, comes down to Bush fatigue vs. corruption fatigue. Menendez is doing his best to lash Kean to the president and his policies. Kean hardly mentions Bush or his party, though he's been happy to accept fundraising help from Laura Bush and Karl Rove. Instead, much as Menendez seeks to link Kean to Bush, Kean paints Menendez as "an individual who personifies the system that has hurt New Jersey for so long."

In hammering on corruption, Kean may have lucked out -- in his timing and opponent. Even in a state where tales of corrupt officials are as common as turnpike traffic, this has been a busy season. One powerful Democratic state senator was implicated in arranging a no-show state job for himself. The former state Senate president pleaded guilty to taking bribes. The attorney general, a Menendez protege, had to quit after intervening in a traffic stop of her boyfriend. Former governor Jim McGreevey, who resigned after admitting he put his gay lover on the state payroll, has just published a book.

And Menendez, who got his start in the notoriously corrupt politics of North Jersey's Hudson County, has offered Kean ample ammunition. Some of the attacks on him have been decidedly below the belt, others overstated even by the loose rules of political license, but some involve the kind of back-scratching coziness that looks even worse in the unforgiving light of a 30-second attack ad.

Kean accused Menendez of being "part of a massive kickback scheme" in Union City 25 years ago, citing his 12 appearances before a federal grand jury that culminated in the racketeering conviction of Menendez's political mentor, Mayor William V. Musto. In fact, four former federal prosecutors in the case contradicted Kean's assessment. "[I]t was certainly an act of courage for him to testify against the entire city government," one told the New York Times.

Similarly, Kean assails Menendez for "putting $350,000 of federal taxpayer money in his own pocket" -- accusations that arise from Menendez renting a house he owned to a nonprofit agency he helped to get federal funds, even as agency employees donated to his campaigns. Reports from the time indicate that the rental was at market rates; Menendez says the ethics panel approved the arrangement. Still, federal prosecutors have subpoenaed records, and Menendez himself says he wouldn't do it again.

Adding to Menendez's woes, last week he had to sever ties with his childhood friend and closest political adviser, Donald Scarinci, after a tape surfaced in which Scarinci urges a Hudson County contractor to make a particular hire. "That would be a favor to the congressman," Scarinci says, adding that "it makes sense for you because it gives you protection."

Kean tries to bring home the corruption issue, linking it, not entirely convincingly, to the state's "unaffordability," especially high property taxes -- never mind that local taxes aren't something a U.S. senator can do much about. "That type of personal profiting from public office is what raises people's taxes and makes this state more unaffordable," he says.

Politically, Kean is no Lincoln Chafee moderate -- or even a Tom Kean Sr. moderate. He is pro-choice and supports federally funded embryonic stem cell research, but he backs the Bush tax cuts, would have voted for his Supreme Court nominees and the war in Iraq, and denounces Bush's immigration plan as unacceptable "amnesty."

Menendez, for his part, seems offended by having to run against the unseasoned Kean in what he describes as "probably the most vile campaign I have ever participated in."

Dismissing the closeness of the polls, he says, "New Jersey is a late-deciding state." The open question is what, 34 days from now, its voters will decide they're most fed up with.

Steve Poizner For Insurance Commissioner (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

CALIFORNIA HAS ONLY HAD TWO elected insurance commissioners. First there was Democrat John Garamendi, who was seen as a champion of consumers, and then Republican Chuck Quackenbush, who resigned in disgrace amid allegations he allowed insurance companies to underpay their 1994 Northridge earthquake claims. Prosecutors never filed charges, but after two appointees filled out the term, voters returned Garamendi to the job in 2003.

Now Garamendi is leaving again, and the fight is renewed between consumer advocates — who say the industry is out to cheat customers — and insurance companies, which say regulators don't understand the market. Garamendi is backing Democratic Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante over Republican tycoon Steve Poizner. The twist is that the best choice for consumers, hands down, is Poizner.

The Silicon Valley entrepreneur has solid market credentials, having built a billion-dollar company from a global positioning device that locates cellphone users for emergency operators. He has made reducing insurance fraud a priority, which would protect the industry but also would allow companies to offer lower prices to consumers. He acknowledges that "insurance companies want to own this position" — and he vows not to let them. He has said he'll defend Garamendi's auto insurance rate regulations, which put a person's driving record ahead of where the driver lives. He vows to defend Proposition 103.

DOJ_NMG_0074906

He's credible, and his history shows he's a man of integrity. He thinks before he acts, a trait exemplified by his careful study of a liberal Democratic Bay Area Assembly district that he almost won, and his equally studious approach to and backing for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's redistricting reform, a measure that, while unsuccessful, was worthy. The insurance commissioner's job, he notes, "requires analytical horsepower." Poizner has it.

Bustamante, as a legislator, often backed bills that insurance companies sought to help them avoid complying with Proposition 103. For example, he advocated the repeal of the initiative's good-driver discount. When he ran for governor in the campaign to recall Gray Davis, he misused donations from Indian tribes and was heavily fined. As a candidate for insurance commissioner, he accepted insurer contributions, then returned them when it became a campaign issue. It was not a proud day for Democrats when it became clear that he would be their nominee. His election would be a step backward for consumers.

Poizner is no Garamendi; with his market orientation, Poizner is open to permitting lower-premium health policies and other types of coverage with very high deductibles, along with other moves that may not prove popular with consumers. But he is dedicated to making sure insurers are competitive and, where the market falls short, he will be an effective consumer watchdog.

The Real Market For Fuel Efficiency (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

Detroit is talking up small cars again, but Americans haven't gotten any smaller since the 1970s.

You've heard the statistics: Nearly two-thirds of adults are overweight, and 31% are obese. In the late 1990s, the so-called Civilian American and European Surface Anthropometry Resource began cataloging body shapes and sizes, and auto makers discovered that a substantial chunk of the car-buying public couldn't fit its tummies behind the wheel while still reaching the pedals. They also found that demand for pickups and SUVs was partly related to taller cabs -- no bending over and scrunching down was required to get aboard. Some child safety seats now are designed to accommodate a 100-pound toddler.

To wit, growing vehicle size over the past two decades is a function of more than just the price of gasoline. Add the fact that commutes have been getting longer as Americans choose to live farther from town. They spend more time in their cars. And their cars also must hold more stuff: DVD players, airbags, and if Washington has it way, mandatory stability control by 2012.

The thing to notice about fuel economy is that it steadily improved relative to the growing weight of the average vehicle. People want fuel-efficient cars so they can afford to drive bigger cars and drive them more miles.

Therein lies the beginning of wisdom in understanding the market for fuel economy, which has recently thwacked Detroit across the nose with the near collapse of SUV and truck sales amid higher gas prices the past two years.

It should be delicately pointed out that Detroit as an industry has long put up with unusually close public and political attention and has developed PR habits that amount to a comprehensive smokescreen around its decision making and internal motives. Re-enacting this history amid the latest challenge is GM Vice Chairman Bob Lutz, a licensed "car guy," who was put forward to introduce a new fuel-cell prototype vehicle developed by GM. He also sang GM's praises for rolling out millions of cars that can run on E85, a gasoline-substitute consisting of 85% ethanol.

Uh huh. Fuel cells are destined to remain a negligible, if not nonexistent, part of the market over the relevant time horizon, which could easily witness GM's bankruptcy. As for E85, it's a regulatory hoax. Mr. Lutz, to the cognoscenti of the Detroit Free Press, gave a more likely explanation of the alternative fuels medicine show. "We need a moon shot to get out from the notion that Toyota is miraculous and GM is run by a bunch of aging stumblebums who wouldn't know technology if it hit 'em in the face."

GM's management is in a fight for its life right now, trying to hold out against superinvestor Kirk Kerkorian's plan to force it into an alliance with Renault and Nissan. The stakes only get more urgent as GM begins to figure out how to deploy billions in cash flow liberated by its labor cuts to begin developing products competitive with the best of its foreign-born rivals.

It won't be with fuel cells and E85 that GM puts itself back into the game. Nor will it be with teensy eurocars. Mr. Lutz, in passing, noted that GM can now make money on small cars, having unloaded some of its fixed labor overhead by trimming UAW health benefits and paying thousands of workers to leave the company. He implies an undisclosed accounting judgment about how to allocate costs to various vehicle categories, but never mind: Ford and Chrysler still can't make money on small cars and are willing to admit as much.

Yet to equate small cars with fuel efficiency may be a serious mistake if that informs the industry's investment strategy. University of Michigan's Walter McManus, in a new paper, argues that the one vehicle attribute that Detroit can leverage most profitably in the coming years is continued progress on fuel efficiency. Or if you prefer, cost of ownership as impacted by fuel consumption. But this applies up and down their model line. GM earlier this year acknowledged as much when it offered to guarantee SUV buyers a year's worth of gas at $1.99 a gallon.

GM, with its structural labor cuts, has freed up capital to invest in new product, but how? The authors argue that at any gas price between $2.00 and $3.10 per gallon, GM (as well as Ford and Chrysler) can produce more profit by investing a buck in fuel efficiency than by any other approach. The technologies are already available -- better lubricants, lighter materials, variable valves, six-speed transmissions, mechanisms to shut down spark and fuel to unneeded cylinders.

DOJ_NMG_0074907

Mr. McManus, a former GM staff economist, uses game theory and estimates of how consumers discount their future gas expenditures to produce a guesstimate ($578) of how much an additional mile-per-gallon of fuel efficiency is worth to the average car buyer. Whatever the merits of his conclusion, his method is refreshing because it recognizes that fuel efficiency is not a virtue independent of economics -- the chief selling proposition behind hybrids, which expect you to pay extra for the privilege of saving gas.

It also points to the decision that faces GM, now that survival is in sight, on how to use its capital to upgrade its auto lineup. Foreign alliances are not an answer to this quandary -- that idea is geared mainly to cost cutting, and over a longer period than GM should be worrying about right now. GM has already shown (see Cadillac) that it has the vehicle design savvy. Its cars have lagged for lack of investment and the company's low tolerance for financial risk taking -- exactly the problems GM has increasingly put itself in a position to solve.

Civic Priorities (WT)

By John M. Bridgeland And Peter Levine

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

Five years after September 11, we can begin to assess whether tragedy also bred civic transformation. The National Conference on Citizenship, a non-profit created by Congress to strengthen our civic ties, recently released its new Civic Health Index, which charts our nation's civic progress over the last 30 years. While there are signs of civic recovery in areas of national focus, our civic health shows steep declines in most of 40 measures.

Youth volunteering is a bright spot. Over the past decade, young people age 16 to 24 have narrowed the gap with adults in volunteering. Levels of volunteering have been so high for youth compared to their Baby Boomer parents that some talk of a "9/11 Generation." By some measures, about half of today's youth volunteer, up 10-15 percentage points from the 1970s. Although we cannot be sure why youth volunteering has burgeoned, or whether resume-building played a role, we note growing efforts to combine classroom learning with community service, increases in national and international service opportunities, and calls to service issued from presidents.

But youth and adults alike are not participating in community projects or attending club meetings: the everyday, face-to-face settings of democracy. And those who still participate tend to be privileged. College graduates now dominate community life, while high-school dropouts are almost completely missing. Half of Americans who work on community projects and attend meetings are college graduates, while only 3 percent of these active citizens are high school dropouts. College graduates are more than four times as likely to volunteer and twice as likely to vote as their peers who never finish high school.

Our political participation, while spiraling downward from 1975 to 1998, has risen lately in activities such as voting in federal elections, attending political meetings, and making political donations. During the 2004 presidential election, more than 122 million Americans voted — the highest turnout since 1968 and largest uptick since 1952. Nearly 4.3 million more 18-29-year-olds voted in 2004 than in 2000, a significant upsurge given steep declines in prior years.

While political activities are rising, trust in one another and in key institutions has steadily declined. As many Americans suspect, our politics are both more engaging and more divisive, drawing more people to the polls but making it more difficult to solve public problems.

Across the vast majority of our 40 indicators of civic health, we see declines in most — belonging to civic and religious groups, attending meetings, connecting to family and friends and staying informed on public affairs. Even in areas where there is progress, we still under-perform as a nation, with only 29 percent of the population volunteering and 58 percent of the population voting. Of 172 countries ranked for voter turnout in elections since 1945, the United States ranked 139th.

History tells us we can make civic gains. The Greatest Generation, born prior to 1930, ushered in robust civic health in the mid-part of the last century. During that time, there also was more equal opportunity, a smaller gap between rich and poor, and greater cooperation across party lines to address our nation's challenges.

So what's to be done? Schools need to foster civic learning and skills, teach the core ideas from American history, offer students opportunities for participation, and increase the numbers of students who graduate from high school with the skills for college and the experience of community service.

Community and national service programs, such as AmeriCorps, Peace Corps and the new Citizen Corps for homeland security, should enlist more Americans into full-time and part-time service. Workplaces should conduct civic audits to ensure their policies regularly enlist employees to serve in their communities. Houses of worship of different faiths should mobilize youth to serve in communities together, promoting both problem-solving and peace.

DOJ_NMG_0074908

We must make congressional and other elections more competitive, by giving redistricting authority to neutral commissions and finding ways to increase citizen voices and decrease the influence of money.

These policy debates should occur with better data. The new Civic Health Index is a start in having good feedback measures with localized information. Given the challenges we now face, it is time to make civic health a greater national priority. For when that health is vibrant, opportunities for social mobility are higher, our communities and country are stronger, and our own lives are enriched.

John M. Bridgeland is CEO of Civic Enterprises and on the advisory board of the National Conference on Citizenship. Peter Levine is director of the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement at the University of Maryland. Both participated in the the National Conference on Citizenship's study, Broken Engagement: America's Civic Health Index.

Arabs Pressure Rice On U.S. Peace Efforts (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 3 -- The Bush administration's effort to foster a bloc of moderate Arab states to stand against growing militancy in the Middle East has come up against a brick wall, with several close U.S. allies bluntly telling Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday that they do not want to be pitted against other Arab governments and movements, according to senior Arab officials. The solution, the allies told Rice, lies with stronger U.S. leadership in solving the Arab-Israeli conflict.

During talks Tuesday in both Saudi Arabia and Egypt, Rice was confronted by friendly but firm pressure from eight Arab governments -- Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Oman and Bahrain -- to follow up on promises by President Bush to help achieve a two-state solution in the dispute between Israel and the Palestinians. They also questioned whether the administration still has the energy or full commitment to pull off a solution to the Palestinian issue before Bush leaves office, officials said.

Arab officials also expressed frustration that the United States seems far more focused on the issue of Iran's nuclear program. Although Arab states share concern about Iran's nuclear potential, Rice and her Arab interlocutors sometimes seemed to be talking at cross-purposes, according to Arab officials involved in the talks in Cairo. One senior Arab official described the talks as warm but unproductive.

The new Arab pressure came on the same day as a global appeal by 135 former presidents, prime ministers and Nobel Peace Prize winners from the United States, Europe, Africa, the Middle East and Asia for a concerted international effort to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict. The U.S. signatories to the document, released by the Brussels-based International Crisis Group, included former president Jimmy Carter, ex-defense secretary Frank Carlucci, 9/11 Commission vice chairman Lee Hamilton and retired Gen. Wesley Clark.

After talks with Rice in Jiddah on Tuesday, the Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, called on the Bush administration to "restart" the peace process, warning that the issue had become like a disease that weakened the body's ability to deal with all other diseases.

"There is a very short step from extremism to terrorism. And ever since the problem arose of Palestinian-Israeli conflict, the region has been destabilized. . . . Therefore we think it's a core problem [that], if settled, would have beneficiaries on all the other core problems of the region," Faisal told reporters at a joint news conference with Rice.

After afternoon meetings in Cairo, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said foreign ministers from the eight Arab countries told Rice of the urgent need to push the peace process forward "as envisioned by President Bush. . . . After all this suffering, we must achieve it," he said at a joint news conference.

Rice is scheduled to fly to Israel on Wednesday for talks with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Rice appealed to the Palestinians on Tuesday to immediately end internal fighting that has killed a dozen people recently and threatened to unravel the troubled Palestinian Authority.

"Innocent Palestinians are caught in this violence and in this crossfire, and we call on all parties to stop. . . . The Palestinian people deserve calm," she told reporters at the news conference with Faisal.

Rice also called on the Palestinians' ruling party, Hamas, to accept negotiations with Israel as the only route to a political solution that will ensure peace. Hamas, which won an upset in January parliamentary elections, continues to balk at any political arrangement that involves recognizing Israel's right to exist.

At the news conference with Aboul Gheit in Cairo, Rice said she was pleased to hear ideas from Arab allies about how the United States might further support Abbas. But Arab officials said they are increasingly concerned that, since the cutoff of tax revenue by Israel and aid by foreign governments since Hamas formed a government, an already serious humanitarian problem has deepened.

DOJ_NMG_0074909

Arab foreign ministers also made clear to Rice that they do not want a group of Arab states that she assembled last month at the U.N. General Assembly to be considered a formal bloc, Arab officials said. The group, referred to as the "GCC plus two," comprises the six oil-rich sheikdoms in the Arabian Peninsula, plus Egypt and Jordan.

On Iran, Aboul Gheit said the Arabs listened to Rice but did not agree to any statement or action.

Rice warned Tuesday that after weeks of diplomatic delays and Iranian stalling, time has run out for talks. The issue, she added, is no longer just Iran, but the United Nations' ability to deal effectively with global crises. "I hope that there is still room to resolve this, but the international community is running out of time because soon its own credibility . . . will be a matter of question," Rice said.

Rice is tentatively planning to meet with her European counterparts, possibly in London, at the end of her Middle East tour this week to agree on sanctions to impose on Iran; Security Council action could follow as early as next week.

The United States has not formally specified which sanctions it supports, although they are widely reported to include a travel ban on Iranian officials involved in the nuclear energy program and a ban on the sale of any technology and hardware that could be used for production of deadly weapons. U.S. officials have said the first actions would be mild but would be followed by tougher measures if Iran failed to comply.

Rice, In Mideast, Meets Skeptics (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

CAIRO — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, touring the Middle East in an attempt to build support for U.S. goals and allies, found herself Tuesday on the defensive about the Bush administration's search for partnerships and its efforts for democratic reform.

Meeting in Cairo with ministers of eight moderate Arab regimes, Rice was questioned on whether her desire to work with the countries masked an American desire to line up allies against the growing power of Iran.

The Egyptian foreign minister and dubious local media asked whether President Bush's campaign of democratic reform was nothing short of meddling by a country that doesn't accept election results it doesn't like.

Bush dispatched Rice to the Middle East at a time when, in the wake of the war in Lebanon, European and Arab countries, among others, are clamoring again for progress in the ArabIsraeli dispute. But as Rice arrived in Cairo on the second day of a weeklong trip, it was apparent that many in the region feared the effort was a veiled attempt to build a new "coalition of the willing" to stand up to Iran, like that employed in the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

Administration officials have faced tough questions in the region for some time. Still, the tone Tuesday was another sign that Washington confronts a stiffer challenge rebuilding ties in the aftermath of the war in Lebanon, which many here contend the American government was unwilling to stop.

Rice, in a meeting with the local media, insisted that "this is not a meeting or a coalition against anyone."

Ahmed Aboul Gheit, the Egyptian foreign minister, made clear his government's view that although Cairo had been a key target of U.S. efforts for democratic reform, it was capable of advancing at its own speed.

Aboul Gheit challenged Rice to stay in Egypt a month to witness for herself the country's eagerness for development.

"Not everything is done in haste … and not everything is done in one day," he said. "But we will move … we will be there."

Rice was asked at the evening news conference about widespread reports that the United States was secretly supporting the choice of Gamal Mubarak to succeed his father, longtime President Hosni Mubarak.

She insisted that the United States was not involved in the decision.

"It is absolutely going to be up to the people who is going to be the president of Egypt," Rice said.

The secretary of State said the administration's goal in funding nongovernmental programs for building democratic institutions was "not to interfere in choices Egyptians make, but to help civil society develop the capability to give Egyptians choices."

"The United States is going to stand for certain values," she said.

"We always have and we always will — and it is not a matter of interference in Egypt's internal affairs. How Egypt conducts its internal affairs will, of course, be up to Egyptians."

Reporters questioned whether U.S. aid to nongovernmental organizations wasn't actually interference.

Rice was also asked whether the United States did, indeed, favor democratic outcomes, considering that it had worked to halt aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority government elected this year.

DOJ_NMG_0074910

In response to another question, Rice made a slight change in the administration's vocabulary. She said she preferred "the future Middle East" to the phrase "the new Middle East," which has become controversial because it suggests U.S.-engineered change.

Bringing back an important word from Bush's 2000 election campaign, she said the United States intended to be "humble" in the way it encouraged countries to change.

During Rice's visit to Cairo and a stop Monday evening in Jidda, Saudi Arabia, it was clear that American allies in the region had greater ambitions for a renewed Israeli-Palestinian peace effort than the administration did.

U.S. officials have said that the most they hope for now is limited progress. Bush said last week that the United States did not intend to impose a settlement on the Palestinians and Israelis.

But Aboul Gheit and Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al Faisal made it clear that they wanted major steps to be taken swiftly to move the parties toward an eventual two-state solution.

"Ever since the problem arose of Palestinian-Israeli conflict, the region has been destabilized," Saud said.

"Like a disease on the body, it calls for other diseases to attack that weakened body. And, therefore, we think it's a core problem."

Rice Calls For Hamas To Work With Abbas (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday the Hamas government cannot govern in the Palestinian territories and she urged the Islamic militants to moderate and cooperate with the secular president.

Rice also said the world's credibility is on the line in the nuclear standoff with Iran as U.N. diplomats declared last-ditch talks with Tehran a likely failure. She said the nations that could impose sanctions are unified, despite Russia's public misgivings Tuesday.

"The international community is running out of time because soon its own credibility in terms of enforcing its own resolutions will be a matter of question," Rice said midway through a Middle East tour.

Although she got a polite hearing from the United States' two most powerful friends in the Arab world, Rice also got a lecture. Saudi Arabia and Egypt both told Rice on Tuesday that the Middle East's many volatile conflicts are hinged to Israel's long conflict with the Palestinians.

Arab nations, including the few moderate states that are key to U.S. goals in Iraq, Iran and Lebanon, view improving the Palestinians' lot as essential. They argue that the festering grievances of the stateless Palestinians feed unrest and radicalism elsewhere.

"The issue is how to make peace, and in order to make peace you have to identify the problem," Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said during a sometimes strained news conference with Rice.

"We think and we claim and we keep telling everybody that it is the Palestinian problem, and the lack of a settlement for the Palestinians. The Palestinian problem is the scourge of this region," Gheit said.

Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal likened the nearly 60-year-old conflict to a disease that weakens the body and invites further infection.

"Whenever there is an answer to question in justice and the rights of people are not responded to, it's a breeding ground for extremism," Saud said with Rice by his side in Jedda, Saudi Arabia. "There is a very short step from extremism to terrorism. And ever since the problem arose of Palestinian-Israeli conflict, the region has been destabilized."

Rice is in the Middle East this week seeking ways to strengthen Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in his standoff with Hamas radicals who control part of the Palestinian government. Rice was to meet with Abbas on Wednesday.

Rice's talks in Ramallah will be the administration's third meeting in less than three weeks with Abbas, whom President Bush called a "man of courage" for trying to revive Mideast peace talks.

Rice wants Saudi Arabia and Egypt to put greater diplomatic muscle behind the secular Palestinian president in his standoff with Hamas militants, and to bolster moderate secular governments in Lebanon and Iraq.

Rice met in Cairo with diplomats from Egypt and seven other Arab allies in hopes of reviving the moribund Arab-Israeli peace process and making headway on other regional issues. During that session the ministers of the six-nation Gulf Cooperation Council and Egypt and Jordan gave broad support to Abbas, Rice said.

Her first appointment in Egypt was with the country's intelligence chief, seen as key to ongoing efforts to release an Israeli soldier captured in June by militants close to Hamas.

The top aide to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak last week demanded that Hamas release the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, immediately.

DOJ_NMG_0074911

Egypt is a longtime mediator among Palestinian factions and between Israel and the Palestinians, and its exasperation with Hamas may signal a turning point.

Israel wants to reopen dialogue with Abbas and work with him to establish a Palestinian state. But Abbas has been in a weakened position since January when Hamas, which seeks the destruction of Israel, won the Palestinian elections.

Abbas retains his position as president but is caught between Hamas and the West, which considers Hamas a terrorist group and refuses to underwrite it with vital international aid. Abbas has tried to persuade Hamas leaders to moderate their anti-Israel policies and join with his Fatah Party in a coalition government, but the U.S. and Israel are leery of the plan.

"Clearly, they cannot govern in a circumstance in which they cannot represent a responsible government before the international system," Rice said in Saudi Arabia. "I would hope that they would take up what I understand to have been many overtures" by Abbas.

The Bush administration and Israel are increasingly convinced Hamas eventually will crumble, and they look to Abbas to capitalize.

Blockade Of Gaza Could Be Eased By Rice Plans (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

International observers could be deployed at the main cargo crossing point between Israel and the Gaza Strip as part of expected proposals by Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, to loosen the economic siege of the Palestinian territory, diplomats said.

Ms Rice was due in Jerusalem on Wednesday for separate talks with an Israeli government politically weakened by the war in Lebanon, and with officials of a Palestinian administration that risks disintegrating in an upsurge of factional violence.

In the face of political stagnation on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian divide, US officials played down the prospect that she would bring any new initiative to restart the peace process. But western diplomats said she was expected to try to revive a moribund agreement on easing the movement of Palestinian goods and people. Ms Rice brokered the agreement last November, eventually overcoming Israeli objections in an extended round of frequently abrasive talks. But 11 months on, most elements of the deal have yet to be implemented.

In the intervening period, and particularly since Hamas won Palestinian elections in January, movement to and from the Gaza Strip has actually been more restricted than before Israel withdrew from the territory more than a year ago.

The Israeli authorities have frequently cited security concerns when ordering closure of crossing points, an argument that was reinforced by the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier on June 26 by Palestinian militants who tunnelled out from Gaza.

The negative impact of closures on Palestinian exports has exacerbated the economic decline brought on by Israeli and international financial measures against the Hamas government.

The only element of Ms Rice's November deal that was implemented was the deployment of unarmed European observers to monitor traffic at the Rafah crossing between Gaza and Egypt. Since the June kidnapping, however, Israel has forced the closure of Rafah for all but a few days.

Among the proposals Ms Rice was expected to bring with her this time was a plan to deploy international observers at the main Karni cargo crossing point between Gaza and Israel. It has also been closed for about a third of the time since the November agreement was an-nounced. Palestinian officials say the frequent closures of Karni cost Gazan farmers $400,000 a day during the 2005 harvest season. The measures have also hit Gaza's lucrative textile export trade.

Diplomats said that the US was unlikely to offer to supply its own forces and might appeal again to EU states that are already playing a central role in the expanded international presence in south Lebanon.

Foreign observers might also be deployed along the Egypt-Gaza border where Israeli officials say arms smuggling is out of control.

"After Lebanon, people are more interested in internationalising security in the region," said one diplomat.

There is growing concern in Arab capitals about the disintegrating social and political conditions in the Palestinian territories and the ammunition this is providing for extremists throughout the region. Egyptian officials argue that only when there is a more comprehensive framework for negotiations on substantive issues between the Israelis and Palestinians will it be possible to make progress on details.

Foreign ministers from eight US-allied Arab countries who met Ms Rice in Cairo on Tuesday had hoped to impress this on her but are themselves increasingly frustrated by the inflexibility of Hamas, with months of efforts by Cairo to negotiate the release of the kidnapped Israeli soldiers in return for the release of Palestinian prisoners so far achieving little. The meeting in Cairo appeared to break little new ground.

DOJ_NMG_0074912

"The Palestinians need a government that can represent the interests of the Palestinians and can engage with the international community in accordance with the broad consensus for a two-state solution," Ms Rice said in a press conference with Ahmed Aboul Gheit, Egypt's foreign minister.

Rice Urges 2 Palestinian Groups To Halt Violence (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 3 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Tuesday for an end to the new wave of bloodshed between Palestinian factions as she prepared to travel to the West Bank to support the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas.

"Innocent Palestinians are caught in this violence, and we call on all parties to stop," Ms. Rice said. "The Palestinian people deserve calm."

In fighting on Sunday and Monday, at least 10 Palestinians were killed and more than 100 were wounded in some of the worst fighting in recent years between Hamas and Fatah, the two main Palestinian factions.

Gunmen linked to Mr. Abbas's secular Fatah movement suggested Tuesday that there would be more violence and threatened to kill three senior leaders of Hamas, the militant Islamic group that won the Palestinian elections in January.

The gunmen, Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, accused Hamas leaders of "sedition" and said they would be killed so "these filthy people can be made an example."

Only scattered incidents of violence were reported Tuesday, and no casualties as of nightfall.

The week's violence appeared to complicate Secretary Rice's campaign this week to drum up support among Arab nations for Mr. Abbas in his struggle to form a unity government with Hamas that could be recognized by the United States.

The Bush administration has said that it would resume financial aid to the Palestinian Authority only if a Hamas-run government agreed to recognize the right of Israel to exist and to forswear violence.

Hamas rejects the conditions.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, called Tuesday for Arab nations not to support American policy in the Middle East, telling reporters in the Gaza Strip, "It looks like Ms. Rice is adopting the old law — divide and conquer."

Secretary Rice began her latest Middle East trip with a stop on Monday in Jidda, Saudi Arabia, to meet with King Abdullah, before traveling to Cairo for a gathering of Arab counterparts. She is to leave Wednesday to see Mr. Abbas on the West Bank and to meet in Israel with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

She has discussed an array of issues with Arab leaders, including the violence in Iraq and mounting concerns over Iran's refusal to curtail its nuclear program. But she suggested at a news conference in Jidda that the trip would be centered on efforts to end the political and financial turmoil in the Palestinian territories, in large part by pressing Hamas to moderate its views toward Israel and to renounce violence.

"Clearly, Hamas cannot govern in a circumstance in which they cannot represent a responsible government before the international system," Ms. Rice said, adding that she hoped the group's leaders "would take up what I understand to have been many overtures" by Mr. Abbas.

She described the Palestinian Authority president as a "man who is committed to the agreements that the Palestinians have signed over the last decade or so."

In Cairo, Ms. Rice's first appointment was with officials of the Egyptian intelligence services who have been involved in negotiations for release of an Israeli soldier who was captured in June by militants linked to Hamas. The Egyptian government has called for the soldier, Corp. Gilad Shalit, to be freed.

State Department officials traveling with Secretary Rice said she was looking for modest if concrete methods of easing financial pressures on Mr. Abbas's government, which found itself cut off from American and other Western aid after the Hamas victory in January.

Secretary Rice said in Jidda that she hoped the Israelis would lift some travel restrictions now placed on Palestinians "because the economic situation in the territories is, of course, made very much worse if there is not the ability to move through some of the crossings."

Palestinian Rivals On Brink Of Civil War, Abbas Aide Says (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Armed Palestinian factions are just "centimeters" away from civil war, a top aide to President Mahmoud Abbas said yesterday after two days of deadly factional fighting.

DOJ_NMG_0074913

The violence, the worst since the West Bank and Gaza Strip won autonomy 12 years ago, has raged as Mr. Abbas' Fatah party and the militant Hamas movement, which controls the Palestinian government, have struggled to agree on a unity government that can end a crippling international aid freeze.

"If we don't reach a political solution, we are headed toward a civil war," Nabil Amr, a communications adviser to Mr. Abbas, said in an interview. "It could happen at any time."

Each side blames the other for the fighting that has left 12 Palestinians dead and more than 100 wounded since Sunday. No new injuries were reported yesterday, but the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a Fatah militia, threatened to kill Hamas Interior Minister Saeed Seyam and Damascus-based Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting with Arab leaders in Cairo, appealed for an end to the fighting. "Innocent Palestinians are caught in the crossfire and we call on all parties to stop," she said. "The Palestinians deserve calm."

The violence has filled a vacuum left by government paralysis and the failure of the parties to agree on a government program that would meet international conditions for the restoration of aid -- recognition of Israel, a renunciation of violence and agreement to honor past agreements with Israel.

Mr. Amr said he opposed a unity government because of the differences between Hamas and Fatah over whether to recognize Israel and conduct peace talks. He proposed alternative solutions to the crisis, such as new elections or the formation of a Cabinet made up of political independents and technocrats.

"Yesterday a red line was crossed, but they retreated," Mr. Amr said of Monday's fighting. "I am afraid that without a political solution, more groups will cross the red line. Gaza isn't just chaos. It's a big storehouse of weapons. Each family has its own militia and its own organization."

Fatah leaders accused Mr. Seyam, the interior minister, of ordering Hamas gunmen to fire on a group of protesters in the Gaza community of Khan Younis. The Gaza clashes spread to the West Bank, where Hamas-controlled government offices were torched and the bodyguards of the deputy parliament speaker was fired upon.

Since Hamas took over the government after elections in January, gunmen from its military wing have sparred with Fatah security services. The atmosphere deteriorated further because of the economic boycott, which left the Palestinian Authority unable to pay the salaries of policemen and other public servants.

Sheik Yazeeb Khader, editor of the Hamas newspaper Mumbar el-Islah, said he and other editors had kept a low profile in recent days for fear of new clashes. As he crunched across the shards of glass that littered the floor of a Hamas political office in Ramallah, he claimed the windows had been smashed over the weekend by vandals acting with the approval of the Fatah-controlled security services.

Ultimately, he said, Mr. Abbas should be held responsible.

"This took place under the eyes of the security agencies," he said as he flipped through pictures taken by a Palestinian journalist showing a policeman standing alongside Fatah militants as they burned government buildings.

"The government didn't fail. The government was made to fail and the presidency participated" in the failure, he said.

Even so, Mr. Khader said, Hamas prefers a unity government with Fatah. But he insisted that Hamas would prevail over Fatah in any new election.

A recent poll by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Center showed a statistical dead heat between the parties. The same survey indicated that Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas was perceived as more trustworthy than Mr. Abbas.

The Ha'aretz newspaper reported yesterday that mediators from Qatar had suggested that the parties form a unity government that would be headed by an independent prime minister.

Hamas PM Vows To Prevent Civil War (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, October 4, 2006

Prime minister Ismail Haniya has vowed that his Hamas-led government would not let Palestinians slide into civil war following the deadliest bout of internecine fighting since he took office.

Ten Palestinians were killed and more than 100 wounded in two days of clashes between supporters of Haniya's ruling Islamist movement and the rival Fatah party, concentrated in the Gaza Strip and the flashpoint West Bank.

Compounding the tension, an armed group affiliated to Fatah threatened to kill Hamas leaders, blaming the hardline faction for violence unprecedented since the Islamists took power after a landslide election win in January.

"We are against internal clashes," Haniya told a cabinet meeting in Gaza City Tuesday. "We cannot allow a civil war to erupt, but this question is the responsibility of everyone."

The embattled premier was speaking just hours after a radical group linked to Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas's Fatah issued a vitriolic statement, threatening to kill leaders in his Hamas party.

DOJ_NMG_0074914

The Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades pointed the finger at Hamas's powerful exiled political supremo in Damascus, Khaled Meshaal, Gaza-based interior minister Said Siam and chief of the group's paramilitary force in Gaza, Yussef al-Zahar.

"In this statement, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades declare loud and clear the decision of the people and the revolution to condemn to death the head of the discord Khaled Meshaal, as well as Said Siam and Yussef al-Zahar," it said.

"We will charge ourselves with executing this sentence so that these scoundrels serve as an example to all those who dare spill Palestinian blood."

Hamas reacted immediately, accusing Fatah of sowing discord and poisoning the atmosphere.

"We are speaking about a seditious current in the heart of Fatah that searches to sow discord and poison the atmosphere in order to realize personal aims," said MP Mushir al-Masri.

On Tuesday, some 100 security forces loyal to Fatah blocked the Gaza Strip's main highway with vehicles and burning tyres, but a paramilitary controlled by the Hamas government did not intervene.

The two days of violence erupted on Sunday, when the Hamas paramilitary force tried to stop the mainstream security forces from blocking roads in Gaza as part of their demonstrations against non-payment of salaries.

Hamas has been unable to pay any full public service salaries since taking power in March owing to an international aid boycott stemming from its refusal to recognise Israel, renounce violence and abide by past agreements.

In the northern village of Azzun, in the occupied West Bank, a car belonging to a Hamas member was set alight and gunmen opened fire on a house belonging to another official of the party.

Further north in Nablus, suspected Fatah loyalists burnt two buses operated for a Hamas-run school and opened fire on the car of a university lecturer close to the ruling party.

On the eve of a visit to Israel and the West Bank by US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Haniya lashed out at her regional tour.

"It is clear that Condoleezza Rice is resorting to the old policy of divide and rule," he told the cabinet.

"We urge all the brother Arab countries not to bow to the American plans and aspirations of the American administration to carve up the region," he added.

In Saudi Arabia, Rice called for "moderate forces" to be helped at the expense of "extremist forces", called for a halt to the Palestinian violence and for the creation of a unity government that would abide by Western demands.

Political talks between Fatah and Hamas on forming such a government have stalled over Hamas's hardline stance despite an initial agreement last month between Abbas and Haniya on a political platform.

The fighting brought a plea from the Arab League for an end to what an official called the "Palestinian madness."

Mohammed Subeih, assistant secretary general for Palestinian affairs, said in Cairo: "Let us leave the killing, aggression and destruction to Israel, because that is enough for the Palestinian people."

He urged an end to the fighting, otherwise the Arab League would not be able to "speak to the world on behalf of the Palestinians."

Fatah Militia Threatens Hamas Leaders (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, October 4, 2006

Gunmen linked to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement threatened Tuesday to assassinate leaders of the rival Hamas group — heightening tensions from three days of fighting that has killed 10 Palestinians.

The violence, the worst since Hamas took office in March, heightened fears of a full-scale civil war. The fighting came after efforts broke down last week to bring Fatah into the government.

Abbas, who had hoped a broader and more moderate coalition would end an international boycott of the Hamas government, is running out of options to end the crisis created by the aid cutoff.

Abbas had considered calling early elections, but polls indicate Fatah would tie with Hamas. Also, a poll published Tuesday showed voters consider Abbas less trustworthy than Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas.

The U.S. and moderate Arab states were making a new push to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace talks. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the foreign minister of Bahrain, Shaikh Khalid Bin Ahmed Al-Khalifa, were to hold separate talks with Abbas on Wednesday.

The threat to kill Hamas leaders came in a statement by the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a violent Fatah offshoot. A caller reading from the statement told The Associated Press that Al Aqsa would try to assassinate Interior Minister Said Siyam, Hamas militia chief Youssef Zahar and the group's supreme leader in exile, Khaled Mashaal.

"We are going to implement the rule of the people and the revolution by executing the heads of this seditious group," the caller said. Al-Aqsa confirmed the authenticity of the statement when contacted by the AP.

DOJ_NMG_0074915

The latest round of fighting began Sunday, when Hamas militiamen used beatings and gunfire to put down protests by civil servants and members of the security forces who demanded payment of salaries.

The confrontations triggered armed clashes over the weekend between the 3,500-strong Hamas militia and the Fatah-dominated security forces. In all, 10 people were killed and more than 100 wounded.

The violence also spread to the West Bank, where Fatah militants torched the Cabinet building in Ramallah and trashed Hamas offices.

On Monday, Fatah militants shot at bodyguards of Deputy Prime Minister Nasser Shaer of Hamas as they rode in a government car, injuring two of them. Shaer was not present during the attack. Hospital officials said a Fatah militant also was injured.

The Palestinian Authority's 165,000 government employees have largely gone unpaid for seven months because of the international aid freeze. Many of the civil servants have been on strike for the past month, though compliance in schools has been spotty, particularly in Gaza.

On Tuesday, Fatah gunmen closed several schools in central Gaza by force. The gunmen also blocked a major intersection, shouting "Down, down with Hamas!" burning tires and garbage and shooting in the air.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas government, called for a new effort to establish a national unity government with Fatah, but also condemned the civil servants' strike.

"I know there is suffering and there is a big problem," Hamad told Israel Radio, speaking in Hebrew. "When there is a strike you don't go to work but you don't cause problems and riots all the time. This is not acceptable to us."

Palestinian Poll Shows Fatah-Hamas Close (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

The Fatah movement of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas is tied with the Islamic militant Hamas in voter support, according to a poll published Tuesday, undercutting hopes by Palestinian moderates that Fatah could oust Hamas if new elections were held.

As one of several options, Abbas is considering calling early elections, both for president and parliament, but Tuesday's poll and other recent surveys indicate there is no guarantee voters would return Fatah to power.

Also, previous polls have understated support for Hamas. Before Hamas won a January parliamentary election by a wide margin, polls showed Fatah leading, and even exit polls on election day forecast a Fatah victory.

Abbas' party controlled Palestinian politics for four decades and was forced out in January amid growing anger over official corruption and mismanagement. Support for Hamas remains steady, even though many Palestinians have been plunged deeper into poverty because of an international aid boycott of the Hamas government.

The face-to-face poll among 1,200 Palestinians also indicated that Palestinians consider Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas more trustworthy than Abbas, by 19 percent to 14 percent.

The survey was conducted by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Center Sept. 19-22, before a new round of deadly internal violence erupted this weekend. At the time of the survey, Hamas and Fatah were negotiating the formation of a national unity government, but the talks have since broken down.

In the survey, 56 percent said a national unity government was the best way out of the current crisis. If an election were held today, Fatah would get 32 percent of the vote, compared with 30 percent for Hamas.

The poll has an error margin of 3 percentage points.

More than half said they oppose attacks on Israel and 47 percent said they support a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Reach Out To The Red Zone (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is in the Middle East this week, trying to bolster America's allies to confront an enemies list that includes Iran, Syria, Hezbollah, Hamas and the all-party anarchy in Iraq. My worry is that Rice is becoming a traveling version of Baghdad's Green Zone, talking about hopeful strategies that are disconnected from events on the ground.

The focus of Rice's trip is to talk with moderate Arab governments -- Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states -- about how to form a united front against Iranian-backed extremism. This mission of containing Iran has become increasingly urgent because of growing signs that Iran is resisting a diplomatic compromise over its nuclear program. In recent weeks, European diplomats have offered various formulas to finesse the West's demand that Iran suspend uranium enrichment as a precondition for talks, but so far the mullahs in Tehran haven't budged.

DOJ_NMG_0074916

Talking to your allies is always a good idea, but consider the parties Rice isn't engaging on this trip: Syria, Hamas, Hezbollah and Iran -- the sources of the trouble. The idea of traveling to a Middle East in crisis and talking only to your friends is, I'm sorry to say, the equivalent of meeting Iraqi leaders in the protected Green Zone and imagining that you are thereby stopping the brutal killing out in the "Red Zone," which is the term U.S. officials in Baghdad have been using to refer to the real world.

U.S. officials talk hopefully about how the recent war in Lebanon "clarified the fissures" in the region and encouraged the moderate Arab states to finally take decisive action to curb Iran and its allies. They hope the squeeze on the Hamas government will embolden Palestinians to embrace the moderate leadership of President Mahmoud Abbas and resume negotiations with Israel. To which a cynic would respond: Are you kidding? This is the Middle East.

The lesson for Rice should have been clear after the war in Lebanon: Left to themselves, our moderate Arab allies will make the deals that are necessary for their survival. They will quietly cheer for America in Iraq and Israel against Hezbollah -- until it's clear that the extremists are winning. Then, for self-protection, they will lean in the other direction. I'm told that Sunni women from Bedouin tribes in Jordan were carrying amulets of the Shiite militia leader Hasan Nasrallah at a wedding in Amman last week. That's a small sign of which way the wind is blowing.

America needs to break out of its diplomatic Green Zone, or it will become a prisoner of events beyond its control. What's needed is aggressive, innovative policy that, to use a favorite Israeli term, "creates new facts on the ground." To me, that means a process of engagement -- especially now, when the mullahs in Tehran and their allies in Damascus and Beirut seem so afraid of it.

We should send an ambassador back to Damascus, tomorrow. We should encourage the widest possible contacts with Iran, leading to an eventual resumption of diplomatic ties. We should treat reconstruction of postwar Lebanon with the urgency we should have applied to postwar Iraq. We should deepen our contacts with a Lebanese government that includes two Hezbollah ministers. We should designate a special presidential envoy for the Middle East -- the obvious choices would be former secretary of state James A. Baker III or former president Bill Clinton.

Absent more aggressive action, the situation will keep slipping away from the United States, day by day. Iraq shows the price of the Green Zone mentality. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki says all the right things about a "government of national unity," but every night dozens more bodies are dumped in the streets. Tragically, Maliki can't connect his upbeat unity talk with reality. A good example of the disconnect is the fundamental economic issue of oil: Maliki's central government has been stalled working out the details for sharing Iraq's potentially massive oil revenue. Meanwhile, the regional government in Kurdistan is about to sign new oil drilling agreements with three companies, including one in the United States, with more deals pending. The Kurds' argument is simple: The Green Zone government is a fiction. It's time to move on our own.

To escape a traveling Green Zone mentality in the Middle East, Rice needs to create a process for engaging America's friends and adversaries. This is not a time for holding back, for testing the waters, for "staying the course" of current diplomacy. If we keep doing what we have been doing, we will keep getting what we've got -- which is a mess.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues at www.washingtonpost.com. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

US And UK Warn Of Fresh Iran Sanctions Drive (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, October 4, 2006

Renewed tensions over Iran's nuclear programme emerged on Tuesday as the US and Britain warned that world powers would return to the United Nations Security Council to consider targeted sanctions against Tehran.

Speaking in Cairo after meeting foreign ministers from eight Arab states, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said she feared Iran's latest proposals on enriching uranium abroad were a stalling technique.

"I hope there is still room to resolve this," she said, "but the international community is running out of time, because soon its credibility will be in question."

A senior British official said preparations for a new UN resolution had intensified after Iran informed Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, that it would not abide by UN demands for a suspension of uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of the nuclear programme. But talks at the UN are likely to be difficult, given the reluctance of Russia and China to take a confrontational approach.

To maintain an international consensus, the British official said the strategy at the UN would be incremental, with the first sanctions targeting Iran's procurement of materials for the country's nuclear and ballistic missiles programmes – a measure limited in scope.

The Security Council had set an August 31 deadline for Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment or face sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0074917

The five permanent council members plus Germany had also offered Iran a set of economic and political incentives if it agreed to the suspension.

Mr Solana had been holding talks with Ali Larijani, Iran's top security official, on a temporary suspension that would pave the way for formal negotiations on the six-nation package. These meetings had lowered tensions and helped ease pressure on oil markets.

But Mr Solana told world powers at the weekend Iran was not prepared to suspend uranium enrichment, according to the British official.

On Tuesday, after speaking to Mr Larijani, Mr Solana referred to his discussion as constructive but without yielding a breakthrough.

Attempts to talk Iran into a uranium suspension will not be broken off. Igor Ivanov, secretary of the Russian president's security council, held meetings in Tehran on Tuesday. But the US and European powers will now put more emphasis into UN action.

Ms Rice said failing to win Iranian agreement on suspension left the international community with sanctions as the only choice.

Iran's regime appears confident it can weather the impact of sanctions and often hints it can retaliate against the west.

U.S. May Back Iran On Nuke Alliance (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

CAIRO -- The United States is willing to consider setting up an international consortium to help Iran's nuclear program, but Tehran must suspend enriching uranium before any discussions can take place, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday.

Miss Rice expressed skepticism about a new Iranian idea about French investment in its nuclear activities, saying it may be a stalling tactic to delay possible U.N. sanctions, which Washington is prepared to push for as early as next week.

"There is a consortium idea that the United States supports, which is the joint venture that Russia has proposed," she said, adding that there cannot be enrichment and reprocessing activity on Iranian soil.

"The issue here is that Iran should not be in a position to acquire the technical expertise to enrich and reprocess, which is the most important step to knowing how to develop a nuclear weapon," the secretary told reporters during a visit to Egypt.

The idea Iran floated yesterday would allow it to enrich uranium in its territory. Tehran faces sanctions if it does not agree to suspend such activity by the end of the week.

"To be able to arrive at a solution, we have just had an idea. We propose that France create a consortium for the production in Iran of enriched uranium," Mohammad Saeedi, deputy chief of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, told France Info radio.

"That way France, through the companies Eurodif and Areva, could control in a tangible way our enrichment activities," he said, referring to a branch of a French state-controlled nuclear manufacturer created in part with Iranian backing in the 1970s.

Miss Rice, who is trying to build an anti-Iran coalition in the Middle East, raised the nuclear issue with foreign ministers of Egypt, Jordan and six Persian Gulf countries last night. Diplomats said the Arab participants in the meeting chose only to listen to her and say nothing.

"If the Iranians have ideas about how to come to [an] agreement about what they may be able to do in a civil nuclear program, the way to propose this is to suspend enrichment and reprocessing ... and then to come to the table with their ideas," the secretary said.

"But I fear that this may instead ... be a stalling technique because [they] don't want to get to the basic issue, which is that Iran has to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing in order to begin negotiations," she said.

French officials were skeptical about Tehran's consortium proposal. Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei said in Paris that he was surprised by the idea, which he called "totally new for us."

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said the idea of a consortium has long been discussed in his talks with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani.

"It's an interesting thing, but it's difficult to put it in place," Mr. Solana said during a meeting of EU defense ministers in Finland.

R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, told The Washington Times on Monday that the Bush administration is confident that Russia and China will join it in pushing for sanctions against Iran if it does not agree to suspend enriching uranium this week.

DOJ_NMG_0074918

"For four months now, we've been waiting for an answer," Mr. Burns said. "We've said, if they don't suspend enrichment, we'll take them to the Security Council and sanction them. We do believe we have Russian and Chinese support for that."

Iran's Proposal To End Nuclear Standoff Is Rejected By The West (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 3 — Iran has proposed that France organize and monitor the production of enriched uranium inside Iran, complicating negotiations over the fate of its nuclear program.

The United States, France and Britain rejected the proposal on Tuesday, saying it was a stalling tactic and fell far short of the United Nations Security Council's demand that Iran freeze all uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

The proposal, made by Mohammad Saeidi, the deputy director of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, was presented as a sign of flexibility in negotiations between Iran and six world powers represented by the European Union.

"In order to reach a solution, we've just had an idea: we propose that France create a consortium for the production in Iran of enriched uranium," Mr. Saeidi said in an interview in Tehran with France Info radio that was broadcast Tuesday.

A senior French official on Tuesday said: "This is totally excluded. There is nothing substantive behind it. This is not the first time the Iranians have tried to divide the international community."

Another senior European official — who, like the first, spoke on condition of anonymity under diplomatic rules — said that proposal "seemed to have the intention of distracting."

The United States, meanwhile, is giving Iran until the end of the week to declare whether it will agree to fully stop making enriched uranium or face sanctions. Enriched uranium can be used to make energy or to fuel weapons, and Washington has consistently taken the position that any uranium enrichment on Iranian soil is out of the question because it could give Iran the ability to master the nuclear fuel cycle.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the foreign ministers of the other five governments involved in the negotiations with Iran — Britain, France, Russia, China and Germany — have discussed the possibility of meeting in London on Friday to plot a strategy for the next steps, officials said.

While at a meeting of Arab foreign ministers in Cairo on Tuesday, Ms. Rice told reporters that there was nothing new in the Iranian proposal, and that it continued to fall far short of international demands.

"The Iranians have floated it before," she said, suggesting that the United States would reject any proposal that allowed Iran to enrich and reprocess uranium on its own soil. "This may be a stalling technique."

The Iranian proposal, which has been rejected by Iran's negotiating partners in the past, comes as Iran has hardened its position in negotiations between Ali Larijani, its chief nuclear negotiator, and Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief.

Mr. Solana reported to the six governments in recent days that Mr. Larijani rejected the calls to halt key nuclear activities even though Iran could face sanctions by the Security Council, three senior European officials said.

Instead, in meetings in Berlin with Mr. Solana last week, Mr. Larijani floated the idea of the creation of an international consortium to administer Iran's production of enriched uranium. He did not mention France as the central player, the officials said.

In what was widely perceived as a stalling tactic, Mr. Larijani also spent much of his time in recent conversations with Mr. Solana, airing Iran's historical grievances against the rest of the world.

Specifically, Mr. Larijani told Mr. Solana that Iran's current enrichment activities would have to continue, and that Iran would consider only a temporary halt to the expansion of its uranium enrichment program, the officials added.

The six powers, through Mr. Solana, had been trying to persuade the Iranians to accept a three-month halt on all uranium enrichment activities at their vast plant at Natanz and on construction at the plutonium plant at Arak, the European officials said. Uranium conversion, an earlier stage of processing, would have been allowed to continue at the Isfahan plant.

These officials also spoke on condition of anonymity under normal rules of diplomacy.

There is also increasing frustration among European governments with Mr. Solana for presenting the results of his talks in too positive a light, several European officials said.

Mr. Solana has acknowledged the lack of progress on substantive issues, telling reporters in Finland on Monday, "The fundamental matter of suspension has not been agreed." But he has repeatedly pointed to "progress" on peripheral issues, like where and when further negotiations with the six governments would take place.

On Tuesday, Mr. Solana appeared to keep the door open to Iran's new proposal, describing it as "interesting," and adding, "This is something we have to analyze in greater detail."

DOJ_NMG_0074919

In the radio interview, Mr. Saeidi proposed that Iran's uranium enrichment activities would be monitored "in a tangible way" by Eurodif, a multinational enrichment consortium based in France, and by Areva, the France-based nuclear energy giant and majority shareholder in Eurodif.

Eighty-seven percent of Areva is held by French governmental institutions, and the company has vast interests in the United States ($1.8 billion in earnings in America in 2005) that it may not want to jeopardize by seeming to negotiate with Iran.

Can Rice Rally Mideast Against Iran? (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, October 4, 2006

CAIRO

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is in the Middle East this week seeking to build a network of support for what she calls "emerging moderate forces" (i.e. Iraq, the Palestinian Fatah Party, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt) against "extremist" ones that are opposed to US interests.

The No. 1 extremist Ms. Rice intends to to counter, say analysts, is Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. This trip comes at a time when an oil-flush, potentially nuclear Iran has growing clout in the region, particularly among armed Shiite groups in Lebanon and Iraq.

Ms. Rice is seeking to tap a deep, historical concern among Sunni Arab countries wary of Shiite Iran, with the aim of building a counterweight to Iran's influence.

"The US sees Iran now as the source of destabilization in the Middle East and because there are fears among the Arab countries that Iran also possess a threat this gives the US a chance to form a coalition against Iran and against all its allies, like Syria, like Hizbullah, like Hamas," says Hassan Nafai, chair of the political science department at Cairo University.

Rice's public statements so far have given more time to shoring up the secular Lebanese and Palestinian leaders, ending Iraq's insurgency, and disarming Hizbullah in Lebanon than to Iran. But the confrontation with the Shiite state seems to be at the top of the agenda, and in many ways sits at the center of America's concerns in the region.

Hizbullah is seen by the US as an Iranian proxy that could harass Israel if the nuclear dispute with Iran moves to open conflict; disorder in Iraq is seen as serving Iranian interests by tying up US forces and creating the possibility that the country's Shiites could rise up against US forces in support of their coreligionists; and Hamas, too, is seen by America as a threat to speed attacks against Israel in the event of war.

But Washington's conviction that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons (Iran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes only) trumps all other concerns.

Rice said in Saudi Arabia Tuesday that Germany and the five permanent members of the UN Security Council would meet soon on Iran, and indicated the US will press for sanctions if Iran doesn't suspend its uranium-enrichment program. Enriched uranium can be used for either nuclear power plants or bombs.

Rice is meeting foreign officials from eight Sunni Arab nations on the trip, before meeting with Israeli and Palestinian officials later in the week, who all fear the implications of an Iranian nuclear bomb but are also worried about the consequences of an armed confrontation over the issue, since it is likely to inflame popular public sentiments against their own regimes.

Tuesday, Rice flew from Saudi Arabia to Egypt, where she met privately with Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman, who has been working on reconciling Palestine's warring factions.

"Expectations have to be kind of low on this trip. There are not going to be any major policy breakthroughs, either on the peace process or on Iran," says Josh Stacher, a lecturer at the British University in Cairo. "For Rice this is mostly a bit of a listening trip, finding out what allies want in the lead-up to building a coalition to go after Iran, be that sanctions, or military strikes, or further diplomacy."

Mr. Stacher says that while all eight of the Arab governments are eager to limit the possibilities Iran could go nuclear - particularly Saudi Arabia, which has feared Shiite expansionism since Iran's Islamic revolution - they will be urging the US against military action because of potential blow-back against their own regimes, none of which are democratic and six of which are monarchies.

Mr. Nafai agrees, and says that while the US might get fairly tepid support for sanctions against Iran, he doesn't see an eventual Arab coalition backing military action, largely because of the unresolved conflict over the Palestinian territories. "As long as the US continues to support unconditionally Israel's policies in the region and is not trying to seriously help find a settlement it will be almost impossible to form a strong coalition."

The recent confrontation between the Shiite Hizbullah and Israel boosted the regional popularity of Mr. Ahmadinejad, who supports Hizbullah, and hurt the standings of regimes like Egypt and Saudi Arabia because they were seen by their people as insufficiently condemning Israel's strikes inside Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0074920

Rice has also adopted a new rhetorical approach on this trip, in which America's allies in the region are cast as moderates, and its enemies as extremists, something she said was demonstrated by the war in Lebanon.

"When Lebanon happened ... [we] got in very stark relief a clear indication that there are extremist forces and moderate forces" in the region, she told reporters. "The countries that we are meeting ... is a group that you would expect to support the emerging moderate forces in Lebanon, in Iraq, and in the Palestinian territories."

"The President isn't going to stop pressing for democracy because he believes that ultimately it's the force that will stabilize the Middle East most," Rice said. "But it does not mean that even if states ... are not yet transformed to democracy that we're not going to have relations with them and that we're not going to work together to resist extremist forces in the region."

Stacher says her comments at the start of her trip make the current administration policy on the region look similar to those of past administrations, when the stability and support of allies was more important than promoting change. "The Bush administration has redesigned policy toward the region. Nondemocratic states that are friendly are being painted as moderates and unfriendly undemocratic states are being branded as extremists. The rhetoric is about to reflect reality"

None of the Arab countries Rice is talking to on this trip - Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, and Oman - are democracies, and most severely limit free speech and political organization.

For many Arabs, says Nafai, ongoing US support for these "despotic" regimes means the promises of President Bush to promote democracy aren't believed, and residents of these countries end up more inclined to support US enemies.

Diplomats: Iran Nuke Stance Hurts Talks (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, October 3, 2006

Iran's refusal to freeze uranium enrichment has sabotaged talks meant to defuse the standoff over its nuclear program, opening the way for the U.N. Security Council to start considering sanctions next week, senior U.N. diplomats said Tuesday.

The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity, citing agreement not to publicly pronounce the talks dead before a final attempt by European Union envoy Javier Solana and Ali Larijani, Tehran's chief nuclear negotiator, to bridge differences in a phone call scheduled for Wednesday.

But with both sides standing firm, "the talks are considered a failure," even in key European capitals that had favored negotiations over U.N. sanctions, said one of the diplomats, adding the Larijani-Solana phone call could focus on nothing more than how to publicly acknowledge that the discussions had failed.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, told The Associated Press: "It's only a very short time before we'll be seeking sanctions," unless Iran complies with international demands to suspend enrichment. And, he added, "there is not a single sign that they're prepared to give up" the activity, which can be used to make fissile material to arm nuclear warheads.

Beginning Sept. 9, the EU-Iran talks had been billed as a final attempt to head off a confrontation between Tehran and the Security Council, after Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend enrichment or face punishment. Two diplomats familiar with several rounds of negotiations between EU envoy and Larijani told the AP that the prospect of an up to three-month enrichment freeze was floated, and both men until recently spoke of progress in resolving the impasse.

But on Tuesday, another diplomat said Larijani — considered a moderate — told Solana he had been unable to sell the concept of even a limited enrichment freeze to the more hard-line leadership in Tehran. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had said as much during the weekend, telling professors at Tehran University that Iran would not suspend enrichment for a single day.

Wednesday's planned Larijani-Solana phone call is to be followed by a meeting Friday in London by the foreign ministers of the five Security Council nations and Germany or their senior representatives.

Those countries spearheaded the latest effort to persuade Tehran to renounce enrichment by offering it a package of economic and political rewards if it cooperated — and dangling the prospect of punitive action by the Security Council if it did not.

Then, the Security Council could meet as early as Monday to start work on a resolution imposing the first of a series of sanctions meant to make Iran turn course. One of the diplomats said Western council members — the United States, Britain and France — favor an embargo on sales of nuclear or missile technology to Tehran as a first step, to be followed by others, including travel bans on Iranian officials and the freezing of their assets.

While relatively mild, such punishments are meant to maintain council unity in the face of opposition to any sanctions from Russia and China, the other two permanent Security Council members.

The diplomats offered conflicting opinions on how Russia would respond, but both agreed China remained skeptical about using such punishment to rein in Iran.

Moscow and Beijing are Tehran's economic partners and have been traditionally opposed to sanctions, fearing they could ultimately lead to the council's most potent weapon — the threat of military action.

DOJ_NMG_0074921

In refusing to give up enrichment, the oil-rich nation says it has a right to nuclear technology as an alternate means of generating power. But Bolton on Tuesday dismissed that argument.

"They've been throwing sand into the eyes of the people concerned about their weapons program for three years now" — he said, alluding to the more than three-year investigation by the International Atomic Energy Agency into suspicious nuclear activities. While the agency says it has found no direct proof that Iran has a secret weapons program, its worrying findings — including revelations of secret plutonium experiments by Tehran and its possession of a diagram showing how to mold weapons-grade uranium into the shape of nuclear warheads, has increased suspicions.

In an attempt to ease the pressure, a top Iranian official on Tuesday revived a proposal of foreign oversight on its enrichment activities. Mohammad Saeedi, deputy chief of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, suggested that France create a consortium to enrich uranium in Iran.

Georges Le Guelte, a nuclear expert at France's Institute for International and Strategic Research, called Saeedi's announcement "a diversion tactic."

He said the international community was unlikely to agree to such a deal because the enrichment would take place in Iran.

"This is something that would be almost as dangerous as leaving the Iranians to do it alone," he said.

People Hold Promise For Peace (USAT)

By Shirin Ebadi

USA Today, October 4, 2006

While the current standoff between the United States and Iran over that country's uranium enrichment program is often portrayed as a clash of cultures — the West against Islam — the truth is much more complex. That depiction mistakes politics for culture, rhetoric for reality.

A more accurate picture requires looking at the relations between the two countries through different lenses: one, the political relations between the two governments; the second, the more personal attitudes of the people toward each other. The former, with the threats of sanctions and even war, receives the most attention; the latter could hold the most promise for a possible resolution.

There was a time when relations between the United States and the Iranian government were mutually beneficial. That honeymoon period began in 1953 when Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, the shah of Iran, was in power. A good friend of the United States, the shah purchased U.S. weapons and signed important oil contracts with American companies. He also became a close ally of Israel in the Middle East.

But in 1979, the shah was overthrown and the Islamic Revolution marked the beginning of a new chapter of political relations. Later that year, hostages were taken at the U.S Embassy in Tehran, an event that led to the complete rupture of political relations between the two countries and to U.S.-imposed economic sanctions against Iran that continue to this day.

Relations between the American and Iranian people today are markedly different from their governments'. Hundreds of thousands of Iranians live in the USA. These people are decent U.S. citizens; most of them are educated, and many have prosperous businesses. Many young Iranians wish to visit or emigrate to the USA, seeking out its first-rate universities, its social, civic and creative freedoms as well as its economic opportunities. The people of America have always been welcoming to Iranian immigrants. American visitors to Iran, in turn, are warmly welcomed by the Iranian people.

This is not true, however, across all of the Middle East. That is because the United States has protected and defended the actions of the rulers of non-democratic, Islamic governments in the Middle East and has forgotten the people who must live under those regimes. As a result, many people of the Middle East distrust the U.S. government, for there is a proverb that says, “My enemy's friend is my enemy as well.”

In Iran, however, the feelings of the people for America are the opposite because the U.S. government has never supported nor defended the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran. Therefore, its people are not sensitive to the rhetoric of the U.S. government.

Many Iranians clearly understand that the cultures and people of the two countries are separate and distinct from their respective governments. This is the reason that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is more popular among the young Arabs than among the young Iranians.

The U.S. government must realize that the positive feelings of the Iranian people will continue only if it does not initiate a military attack against Iran. The Iranian people are exceedingly proud of their 2,500-year history and culture. Iran as a country is larger and greater than its rulers and exists apart from any government in power at any particular time.

If America attacks, however, Iranians will unite, forgetting their differences with their government, and they will fiercely and tenaciously defend their country.

DOJ_NMG_0074922

That is why misguided commentaries from even supposed experts such as Princeton Middle East scholar and author Bernard Lewis are irresponsible. Lewis recently wrote that an atomic Iran would most probably use atomic weapons against Israel and America. Lewis even outrageously predicted that Aug. 22, a date that corresponded on the Islamic calendar with the date in which Muslims commemorate the night of prophet Mohammed's prophetic mission — could be a possible time for an Iranian attack on Israel.

The government of the United States must listen to those who are more enlightened with regard to Iran's issues and the complexity of U.S.-Iran relations. It is only then that it can reach informed, realistic and sustainable decisions regarding its differences with Iran.

The differences between the governments of Iran and the United States must end one day, and the sooner this takes place, the better.

The American government must accept the fact that Iran is the most important country in the Middle East because of its strategic location, population, wealth, natural resources, army and scientific achievements. It cannot be talked down to or treated as if it's a powerless Third World country.

And the Iranian government must also accept the fact that after the downfall of the Soviet Union, the United States is the one and only superpower — a reality that should preclude pejorative political remarks. Only through recognition of these facts can a solution for resolving the conflicts be reached.

The conflict must be resolved through direct negotiations. Negotiations must be explicit, overt and to the benefit of the people, not to the governments, of these two countries. These negotiations must be engaged at three levels in both countries: the executive, the legislative and among their respective citizens through non-governmental organizations.

With a realistic viewpoint, any difference can be resolved. Let us gaze into the future instead of dwelling on the past.

Shirin Ebadi, a lawyer in Iran, won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2003 for her efforts on behalf of human rights and for democracy, which she continues today. She also is author of the book Iran Awakening: A Memoir of Revolution and Hope.

The Six-Million Person Question (WSJ)

By Mark Bowden

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

"As to the Holocaust, I just raised a few questions. And I didn't receive any answers to my questions."

-- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, interviewed in Time magazine in September 2006.

When Mr. Ahmadinejad visited the U.S. last month, he backed off slightly from his earlier position that the Holocaust was a myth. The systematic extermination of six million Jews by Nazi Germany in the 1930s and 1940s, an atrocious historical fact that is as thoroughly documented as a fact can be, remains a living memory for thousands of survivors. My guess is that someone in Mr. Ahmadinejad's circle has pointed this out to him since he publicly doubted it last December.

The president of Iran is a man for whom facts are mere fodder for political purposes, but there is little political advantage in making a fool of yourself on a world stage. So he has now retreated to the last refuge of all intellectual scoundrels, calling for "more research." And he has adopted a slightly different critical tack, which he repeated in numerous forums during his recent trip to New York. In Time it went like this: "I said that during World War II, around 60 million were killed. All were human beings and had their own dignities. Why only six million?"

Here, if I understand it correctly, he is asking: Why, in a war where 60 million were killed, has the West made such a big deal out of the deaths of six million Jews? Were the other deaths not equally terrible? Was the world not equally impoverished by each of these losses?

This seems a fair question, and I can think of a good answer. I'm sure others can think of even better ones than mine. But since Mr. Ahmadinejad has complained about not receiving any, for what it's worth, I'm happy to offer this one:

It is a tricky business, rating the moral depredations of the human species, because just when you have settled on the worst, somebody somewhere achieves a new low. In the 20th century alone, communism and its variants in the Soviet Union, China and Cambodia have been responsible for the slow and rapid execution of millions. Millions more perished in the saturation bombing campaigns and the atom bomb blasts of World War II. Conflict and murderously misguided idealism were big players in the atrocity game, and accounted for the deaths of many times more innocents than Adolf Hitler and his Final Solution.

The Holocaust haunts us more than these others for a good reason. The Final Solution was the deliberate act of a government to exterminate a portion of its own people. It employed the resources of the state -- its policy makers, planners, intellectuals, legal system, police and military, industry, transportation system and to a large extent its people -- to single out a particular group of citizens, systematically demonize and isolate them, and then count them, label them, strip them of everything, round them up, ship them to concentration camps, kill them and incinerate them. It attempted to squeeze some last value out of the most fit among those doomed, by employing them as slave labor or subjecting them to medical experimentation before killing them, and even then looked for ways to make saleable products out of their remains.

DOJ_NMG_0074923

This horror began in peacetime, so the nation was not lashing out in self-defense, nor was it being threatened in any concrete way. In the early 1930s, when the state-driven process of isolating and demonizing Jews began, Germany had rebuilt itself after its defeat in World War I, and was the most powerful nation on the European continent. Indeed, it would soon sweep across its borders and conquer every country within its reach. Its science, medical and technological prowess were the envy of the world.

The Holocaust disturbs us so deeply because it demonstrates that none of the things we associate with the advancement of civilization -- peace, prosperity, industrialization, education, technological achievement -- free us from the dark side of the human soul. Just as there is evil in the heart of every man, there is evil at the heart of even the most "civilized" human society. It is a humbling recognition. Man and society are both capable of the most appallingly depraved behavior. Only in the case of society, it occurs on an industrial scale.

The lives lost in the firebombing of Dresden or the nuclear flash over Hiroshima are no less significant, and the military choices that brought about those deaths remain profoundly disturbing, but they at least took place in the context of war. Whole societies were caught up in a life-or-death struggle.

What the Holocaust demonstrates is the danger of a one-party state. It shows what can happen when a group of true believers, convinced of the superiority of their own ideas, have unchecked power. They are then free to rewrite history to suit their political ends, and crush those who disagree or protest . . . or who worship God in a different way.

Like, say, the mullahs in Iran.

Mr. Bowden, a national correspondent for the Atlantic Monthly, is the author of "Guests of the Ayatollah" (Atlantic Monthly Press, 2006).

Rice: Nuclear Test A 'Provocative Act' (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, October 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday a North Korean nuclear test would be "a very provocative act," and she prodded Asian nations to rethink their relationships with the North Koreans.

The top U.S. diplomat said the United States would have to assess its options should such a test be carried out, but she did not elaborate.

"It would be a very provocative act by the North Koreans," Rice said during a press conference in Cairo, second stop on a Middle East tour. "They have not yet done it, but it would be a very provocative act."

Rice's warning reflected widespread concern within the Bush administration. She stressed, however, that a North Korean test was an issue "for the entire neighborhood" and not just for the United States.

"A North Korean nuclear test ... would create a qualitatively different situation on the Korean peninsula," Rice said. "I think that you would see that a number of states in the region would need to reassess where they are now with North Korea."

The remarks appeared directed primarily at China and South Korea.

White House spokesman Dana Perino complained about North Korea's "provocative announcement" and said other countries should join in pressing Pyongyang to avoid testing.

A test "would be directly contrary to the interests of all of North Korea's neighbors and to peace and security in the Asia-Pacific region," Perino said in a written statement.

The United States has long urged China, Pyongyang's only ally, to exert more pressure on North Korea to return to stalled diplomatic talks.

South Korea, divided from its northern neighbor for more than 50 years, has sought better relations and eventual reunification. Seoul is a key U.S. ally but often tries to smooth over rhetorical and other disputes between Washington and Pyongyang.

Pyongyang has said it has nuclear weapons, but it has not conducted any test known to outsiders to prove its claim. South Korea's spy agency has said the North could test a nuclear bomb at any time.

North Korea announced Tuesday that it would conduct a nuclear test in the face of what it claimed was "the U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war." The statement from Pyongyang gave no precise date when a test might occur.

The North regularly uses the United States as a foil, and has used similar language in the past. The latest threat may carry more weight, however, because it follows the test-firing of seven missiles in July, including one believed to be capable of reaching the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0074924

Although the long-range missile failed during flight, tests of both a nuclear device and a missile theoretically able to deliver it to U.S. shores would give the North considerable bargaining power.

The U.S. and its allies have been trying to lure the North back to stalled international efforts to persuade Pyongyang to scrap its nuclear weapons program.

The North has pushed for direct talks with the United States, something Washington says it will not do outside the framework of the stalled six-nation talks. The North has refused to return to the disarmament talks because of U.S. financial restrictions imposed for its alleged illegal activity, including money laundering and counterfeiting.

Many experts believe the North has enough radioactive material to build at least a half-dozen or more nuclear weapons.

"They are an active proliferator," said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "And were they to test and were they then to proliferate those technologies we'd be living with a proliferator and obviously we'd be living in a somewhat different world."

Rumsfeld, in Managua, Nicaragua, for meetings with Central and South American foreign ministers, declined to say whether Pyongyang's announcement had triggered any changes in the U.S. alert status.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, told The Associated Press on Tuesday that the U.S. would bring up North Korea's statement for discussion in a regular meeting of the U.N. Security Council. The Council is expected to talk about it on Wednesday.

Bolton said the Council should embark on "preventive diplomacy" and not just a "knee-jerk reaction" to the North Korean threat.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said a North Korean nuclear test would be an "unacceptable threat to peace and stability" and further isolate North Korea from the rest of the world.

The U.S. and other countries have imposed financial sanctions on Pyongyang.

Vice Adm. John Morgan, the Navy's chief of strategy and plans, told reporters that a possible test is "something we're very concerned about. We think there needs to be a diplomatic solution to this. We think the international community is working hard to achieve that."

___

Associated Press writers Foster Klug, Barry Schweid, Robert Burns and Peter Spielmann contributed to this report.

North Koreans Say They Plan A Nuclear Test (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 3 — North Korea announced Tuesday that it intended to conduct its first nuclear test, prompting warnings from Tokyo to Washington that an underground explosion would lead to a sharp response and could undermine the security balance in Asia.

North Korea did not say when it would try to test a weapon, and experts inside and outside the Bush administration said the announcement itself was a negotiating ploy, intended to force the White House into lifting economic sanctions and holding one-on-one talks with North Korea.

American intelligence officials said they saw no signs that a test was imminent. But they cautioned that two weeks ago, American officials who had reviewed recent intelligence reports said American spy satellites had picked up evidence of indeterminate activity around what is thought to be North Korea's main test site. It was unclear to them whether the activity was part of plans for a test, or perhaps a feint related to last month's visit to Washington by President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea.

At that meeting, Mr. Bush and Mr. Roh discussed the possibility of a test, and Mr. Roh said the event would "change the nature" of South Korea's policy of economic engagement with the North, Mr. Roh told Americans he met afterward.

But the two leaders did not appear to have a coordinated strategy, and a senior Asian diplomat in Washington said Tuesday that "no one is quite sure how to respond" if the North conducted a test in the near future.

In public, the Bush administration's response was muted and left the American response as unclear as the North Korean threat.

North Korea has long possessed plutonium fuel to manufacture nuclear weapons, and American intelligence agencies say they believe the country expanded its fuel stockpile in recent years so that it could now make roughly six to eight weapons, and perhaps more. That inventory was increased, North Korea says, after the eviction of international inspectors in early 2003, just as the Bush administration was focused on the invasion of Iraq.

North Korea claimed more than a year ago that it possessed a "nuclear deterrent," but the absence of a test has created a diplomatic ambiguity, allowing China to raise doubts about how far the country had progressed, and giving Washington room after President Bush's declaration in his first term that he would never "tolerate" a nuclear-armed North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0074925

It is unclear whether the North Koreans have determined that ambiguity is no longer in their interests. In a statement issued Tuesday, North Korea's Foreign Ministry said that "the U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war and sanctions and pressure compel the D.P.R.K. to conduct a nuclear test, an essential process for bolstering nuclear deterrent, as a self-defense measure in response." North Korea's official name is the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

But earlier this month a North Korean general, Ri Chan-bok, told a visiting American expert, Selig S. Harrison, that no test was necessary.

Mr. Harrison quoted General Ri as saying last week: "If we have an underground test it could have radioactive leakage. These rumors are spread by U.S. agencies to smear us. I have never heard indications of a nuclear test in our government or armed forces."

In a statement, Frederick Jones, the National Security Council spokesman, said a test would "severely undermine our confidence in North Korea's commitment to denuclearization" and "pose a threat to peace and security in Asia and the world."

"A provocative action of this nature would only further isolate the North Korean regime and deny the people of the North the benefits offered to them" in six-nation talks that have not reconvened in more than a year, the statement said.

But behind closed doors the announcement touched off a flurry of meetings, as officials wrestled with uncertain intelligence, questions about whether China or South Korea could prevent a test and the possibility that a test could take place before the Congressional elections.

The American statement did not draw the lines in the sand that marked the nuclear standoffs of the 1990's, when the Clinton administration began reinforcing American forces on the Korean Peninsula in response to a threat by the North to convert its supply of spent nuclear reactor fuel into bombs. President Clinton's advisers recommended at the time that if the North began to move that supply to a plant where it could be fashioned into bomb fuel, the president should order an airstrike to destroy the plant. Mr. Clinton never had to face that choice.

But American officials, who declined to be named because they were not authorized to speak about North Korean policy, have recently said the administration assumes that sooner or later, North Korea will conduct a test. "You could argue that it wouldn't be an all-bad thing," one administration hawk said, "because it would finally unify the Chinese, and the Russians and the South Koreans," all of whom have been reluctant to pressure North Korea.

Michael Green, who handled North Korea issues for the National Security Council until he left the White House last year, said, "I think that the evidence has grown, especially with the missile launch, that North Korea has its own escalation ladder, and they would agree to postpone a test only for the right price."

Mr. Green said he thought it was unlikely that North Korea's price would be met, and he said he thought the North had "calculated that they can take the heat from China and Japan, and they are not losing much from South Korea anyway."

In Tokyo, North Korea's sudden announcement was the first international test for Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, a nationalist who has vowed to make security a top priority. Mr. Abe warned North Korea against the test in stern terms rarely heard in the cautious language of Japanese diplomacy.

"Japan and the world absolutely will not tolerate a nuclear test," he told reporters, in a statement worded more sharply than the Bush administration's. "The international community would respond harshly."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters in Cairo, where she met with several Arab counterparts on regional issues, including Iran's nuclear program, that the announcement was disturbing and that a nuclear test would be "a very provocative act by the North Koreans."

For First Time, N. Korea Announces Plans For Nuke Test (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 4, 2006

CAIRO — North Korea announced Tuesday that it will conduct a nuclear test, the first such declaration from the nation.

The prospect that North Korea could take a major step forward in its nuclear weapons development sparked condemnation and concern in foreign capitals.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in Cairo for a meeting with Arab foreign ministers, said a North Korean test would be "a very provocative act." The Bush administration has said it wants a diplomatic solution to the dispute with North Korea.

Rice said the Bush administration "would have to assess what options we have" but did not detail them. The United States has already imposed economic sanctions on North Korea for its refusal to return to six-nation talks about its nuclear program.

North Korea gave no date for a test and said it was committed to "the denuclearization of the peninsula."

The country has warned in the past that it might test a nuclear weapon. The statement Tuesday was the first time it announced its intent to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0074926

North Korea blamed U.S. threats “and sanctions and pressure” for its decision to conduct a nuclear test, a key step in the manufacture of atomic bombs. North Korea said the test was a “self-defense measure.” The communist government said it wanted to “settle hostile relations” between North Korea and the United States.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said today that Japan “could not accept if North Korea were to conduct a nuclear test.” South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun, meanwhile, called for a “cool-headed and stern” response, his office said.

North Korea is believed to have enough plutonium for as many as a dozen bombs, according to the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Most of the material has been created since 2003, when North Korea withdrew from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and resumed activity at its Yongbyon nuclear facility that had been suspended since 1994.

Rice stressed that the current dispute was not just between the United States and North Korea, but between North Korea and its “neighborhood.”

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, raised the issue during a Security Council meeting.

The council, which condemned North Korea this year for conducting a series of missile tests, agreed to hold further discussions today.

Multilateral talks on North Korea's nuclear program have been stalled for almost a year. The nation has boycotted the six-nation talks in protest over U.S. financial restrictions imposed for its alleged illegal activity, including counterfeiting.

David Straub, a former State Department official, said he believes the North Koreans “will go through with it.”

A nuclear test “would pose an unacceptable threat to peace and stability in Asia and the world,” State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in a statement.

North Korea To Conduct Nuclear Test (AP-Y)

By Bo-Mi Lim And Christopher Torchia

AP, October 3, 2006

North Korea triggered global alarm on Tuesday by saying it will conduct a nuclear test, a key step in the manufacture of atomic bombs that it views as a deterrent against any U.S. attack. But the North also said it was committed to nuclear disarmament, suggesting a willingness to negotiate.

The contradictory statement fits a North Korean pattern of ratcheting up tension on the Korean Peninsula, a Cold War-era flashpoint, in an attempt to win concessions such as economic aid. The strategy has had mixed results in recent years as the totalitarian regime sinks deeper into isolation and poverty, with China serving as its lifeline for food and fuel.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called North Korea's announcement "a very provocative act." It came as the standoff deepened over Iran's nuclear program, with senior U.N. diplomats saying six world powers would begin negotiations Friday in London on possibly imposing sanctions against Tehran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment.

It was the first time the North had publicly announced its intent to conduct a nuclear test. Previously, it had warned that it might conduct a test, depending on U.S. actions.

"The U.S. extreme threat of a nuclear war and sanctions and pressure compel the DPRK to conduct a nuclear test, an essential process for bolstering nuclear deterrent, as a self-defense measure in response," said a statement by the North's Foreign Ministry and carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency. DPRK stands for Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

Yet it said it wanted to "settle hostile relations" between the North and the United States, and that it "will do its utmost to realize the denuclearization of the peninsula."

Many North Korea watchers believe the country's dictator, Kim Jong Il, knows that all-out confrontation with the United States would lead to his destruction. Even if Kim seeks negotiations, though, the risk of a miscalculation that spirals out of control cannot be ruled out.

The North Korean statement did not say when a nuclear test might occur, but the prospect drew rebukes from Japan, South Korea and the United States. The allies, along with China and Russia, had participated in the stalled six-party talks aimed at getting the North to give up its nuclear ambitions.

The announcement was not a big surprise to many observers of North Korea because U.S. intelligence reports previously had indicated that Pyongyang might be preparing a nuclear test. Many experts believe the North has enough radioactive material to build at least a half-dozen or more nuclear weapons.

In Cairo, Egypt, Rice said the United States would have to assess its options if the North carries out the test, without detailing what those options were. She stressed, however, that a North Korean test was an issue "for the neighborhood" and not just for the United States.

"It would be a very provocative act," Rice said. Still, she said, "they have not yet done it."

The White House, which has denied it has any intention of attacking the communist nation, also denounced the threat.

DOJ_NMG_0074927

"A provocative action of this nature would only further isolate the North Korean regime and deny the people of the North the benefits offered to them in the six-party talks that they so rightly deserve," said Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

In Finland, European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana said such a test "is always bad news."

Japan's foreign minister, Taro Aso, called the North's nuclear test plans "totally unforgivable," and said Japan would react "sternly" if the North conducted the tests, according to Kyodo News agency.

The presidential office said South Korea had raised its "security level" and that security officials planned to hold an emergency meeting Wednesday. The United States keeps about 29,500 troops in South Korea, a legacy of the 1950-53 Korean War.

China, North Korea's ally and chief benefactor, had no immediate comment. North Korea counters U.S. influence in the region, but China is believed to be increasingly frustrated with North Korea's go-it-alone belligerence.

In a worst-case scenario, a North Korean nuclear test could prompt Japan to seek its own nuclear deterrent, intensifying historical tensions with China and South Korea, both of which suffered under Japanese colonial rule in the early 20th century.

A test could also strain the alliance between the United States and South Korea, which has sought to engage its neighbor.

The United States is likely to seek a military solution to the North Korean problem only as a last resort, partly because of the burden of conflict in Iraq and Afghanistan.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton raised the issue before a regularly scheduled meeting of the U.N. Security Council on Tuesday. He said he urged members "to come up not just with a knee-jerk reaction ... but to develop a coherent strategy to convince them that it's not in their interest to engage in nuclear testing."

But France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere said he wants a swift council statement, and China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said the best place to deal with the threat is in the six-party talks. Wang urged stepped up efforts to get the North to return to the stalled talks.

After a brief discussion, members decided to meet Wednesday morning to address the issue.

North Korea has sometimes made a splash with statements or military actions on important anniversaries at home, or political events such as elections in South Korea and the United States.

The test declaration came ahead of congressional elections in the United States in November and shortly before the expected election of South Korea's foreign minister, Ban Ki-Moon, as secretary-general of the United Nations.

North Korea staged a series of missile tests to coincide with July 4, needling the United States on its Independence Day. But no talks or concessions were forthcoming.

Six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear activity have been stalled for almost a year. Pyongyang skipped the talks in protest over U.S. financial restrictions imposed for alleged illegal activity, including money laundering and counterfeiting.

"If they feel they are not getting interaction with us, they tend to do things to get our attention," said Charles Kartman, a U.S. nuclear negotiator with North Korea under the Clinton administration. "The tools that they have are all bad ones. They don't really have anything else going."

Top diplomats from the five permament members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany will attend Friday's meeting in London to discuss what to do about Iran's nuclear program, the U.N. diplomats said. The six nations have offered Tehran a package of economic and political rewards if it agrees to renounce uranium enrichment; sanctions are possible if is doesn't.

The officials spoke on condition of anonymity, citing an agreement not to pronounce the end of talks before European Union envoy Javier Solana and chief Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani speak on Wednesday.

The officials said, however, that the Security Council could meet as early as Monday to start work on a resolution imposing the first of a series of sanctions meant to make Iran turn course.

N. Korea Pledges Nuclear Test (WP)

By Anthony Faiola And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

Need Cited to Deter Threat From U.S., But No Date Is Set

TOKYO, Oct. 3 -- North Korea declared Tuesday that it would conduct a nuclear test to bolster its defenses against the United States, raising tensions in the region and marking the communist government's first unambiguous pledge to prove it has become a nuclear power.

Though North Korea has previously said it possesses nuclear bombs -- U.S. intelligence officials have estimated it could have as many as 11 -- a test detonation would dramatically change the region's power dynamics. Analysts have said the United States and area neighbors including China, Japan and South Korea would be forced to deal far more harshly with the North Koreans.

DOJ_NMG_0074928

A test would be a "very provocative act," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a visit to Cairo. It would create a "qualitatively different situation on the Korean Peninsula" that would spill over into the entire region, she said. Rice declined to predict what the U.S. response might be.

In a statement issued through the official KCNA news service, North Korea's Foreign Ministry said the government would "conduct a nuclear test under conditions where safety is firmly guaranteed." The statement did not say when the test might occur, but added that the North's "nuclear weapons will serve as reliable war deterrent for protecting the supreme interests of the state and the security of the Korean nation from the U.S. threat of aggression."

The declaration follows reports in recent months, based on intelligence agency findings, that the secretive communist state might be preparing a test site in its barren northeast. Observers greeted the reports with some skepticism, partly because North Korea is widely known for brinkmanship.

High-level officials from the United States, Japan, South Korea and China immediately began exchanging calls Tuesday to discuss a response, according to Asian diplomatic sources. These countries have been part of six-party talks attempting to persuade North Korea to give up its nuclear program. Large numbers of intelligence analysts and policymakers who usually split their time among a host of issues, including Iran, were devoted Tuesday exclusively to the North Korean statement.

The reaction was particularly sharp in Japan, which sees itself as a primary target of North Korean aggression. "If they conduct a nuclear test, it will not be forgiven," Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, told reporters Tuesday night. "The international community will deal with the situation firmly."

Before his election last week, Abe suggested that Tokyo should study whether Japan's constitution would allow a preemptive strike on North Korean missile bases.

Several analysts and diplomats said a test would in effect mean that North Korea's absolute ruler, Kim Jong Il, had played his last card in the standoff over the country's nuclear program. Observers suggested that the threat might be an attempt to force an easing of the economic pressure against the North that has risen dramatically in recent months.

Analysts said the threat might also reflect attempts by Kim to appease the North Korean military, which is still smarting from a failed test of its new intercontinental Taepodong-2 missile in July.

"North Korea's final goal is survival, and a test is their final option," said Ahn Yinhay, professor of international relations at Korea University in Seoul. "Given the current situation -- the enormous pressure from the U.S.'s hard-line policy -- the North Koreans may think they have no other means to try to get out of this deadlock. They may think they have nothing else to lose."

Many observers say there would be a great deal to lose. A nuclear test would make it far more difficult for Pyongyang's chief benefactors -- China and South Korea -- to continue to provide billions of dollars worth of economic aid and trade, money that has helped Kim prop up his government.

Rumors of a nuclear test have surfaced almost every year since 2002, when North Korea began an escalating series of actions regarding its nuclear program -- including kicking out U.N. weapons inspectors and reprocessing spent fuel rods.

A sense of new urgency has been building in diplomatic circles in recent months. Last week, Christopher R. Hill, the Bush administration's special envoy to the stalled six-country talks, publicly warned that a test would be viewed by world powers as a "very serious" escalation.

The last country to conduct a nuclear test was Pakistan, in 1998, when it detonated five bombs underground in response to tests two weeks earlier by India.

Some scientists question whether North Korea has the technology to conduct a test safely -- leaking radiation is a major concern.

Lee Sang Deuk, vice speaker of the South Korean National Assembly, said in an interview in Washington last month that in late August intelligence agencies had detected unusual movements of troops and equipment around a complex of caves believed to contain a nuclear test site. Cables were laid and tents erected. A U.S. official confirmed that there had been signs of an impending test other than Tuesday's statement.

North Korea has frequently provided the world with early warnings of dramatic moves and has often chosen symbolic dates for them. A series of missile tests took place during the July 4 weekend, and Tuesday's statement came as South Korea was marking its national day.

"A decision to test is a political calculation, not a technical one," said one intelligence officer. The officer said analysts believed that the Pyongyang government issued the statement in part to gauge international reaction before making a final decision. "It doesn't mean they won't test, but it gives them a chance to roll back, or be coaxed back if they want to," said the officer, who agreed to discuss some of the classified analysis on condition of anonymity.

A U.S. government official said the North Koreans might also be trying to refocus international attention on their issues at a time when Iran is becoming the administration's main concern.

DOJ_NMG_0074929

A major concern among U.S. officials is the potential reaction by Japan. U.S. nuclear analysts have worried for years that a North Korean nuclear test might lead Japan to break with decades of nonproliferation commitments and speed toward its own weapons capability. Japan's nuclear industry is highly advanced, giving the country the ability to make nuclear weapons within months if it chose to do so.

Frederick Jones, spokesman for President Bush's National Security Council, shared White House concerns in prepared comments that said a test "would severely undermine our confidence in North Korea's commitment to denuclearization and to the Six Party Talks and would pose a threat to peace and security in Asia and the world."

North Korea's nuclear capabilities have grown significantly during Bush's tenure. When Bush came into office six years ago, intelligence agencies estimated that North Korea had the capability to make one or two nuclear weapons. Those sources now put the number as high as 11.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack called North Korea's announcement an "unacceptable threat" to peace and stability in Asia and in the wider world. The Bush administration will continue to work with its allies in the six-party talks to discourage "such a reckless action," the statement said.

Linzer reported from New York. Staff writer Robin Wright, traveling with Rice, contributed to this report.

North Korea Deepens Weapons Rift With Plans For Nuclear-Bomb Test (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad, Sebastian Moffett, Gordon Fairclough And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

North Korea said it will test a nuclear bomb, antagonizing its neighbors and the U.S. and deepening the international standoff over the country's weapons program.

A test by North Korea would dramatically alter the balance of power in East Asia, where China is the only confirmed nuclear power. It would also strain relations between the U.S. and China, who view the North Korean threat in very different terms.

The Bush administration argues a nuclear test would increase the threat of attack on Japan and the U.S. "Were they to test and were they to proliferate this technology, we'd be living...in a somewhat different world," U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said. Mr. Rumsfeld declined to speculate on any U.S. military preparations in response to a potential nuclear test.

North Korea's foreign ministry, announcing its plans yesterday in a statement distributed by the country's official news agency, didn't set a date for the test. It said it would be conducted "in a condition where safety is firmly guaranteed." U.S. intelligence sources said in mid-August that they detected activity suggestive of bomb-test preparations at a mountain in northeast North Korea.

For several years, North Korea has said it has nuclear bombs. Amid some doubts as to its true weapons capabilities, a nuclear test would provide the first confirmation. In July, it test-fired seven missiles, including a long-range missile designed to cross the Pacific Ocean that misfired. The launch led the United Nations Security Council to issue sanctions against North Korea.

Pyongyang said in its statement that the threat of nuclear war and sanctions from the U.S. force it to undertake a test. It said that its goal is "to settle hostile relations" between it and the U.S.

Following the announcement, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called the threat of a test "a very provocative act." The White House said in a statement that a test "would pose a threat to peace and security in Asia and the world."

The U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, said the U.S. would bring up North Korea's actions within the Security Council this morning after rebuffing a push by other countries to issue a sharp press statement on the test threat. Mr. Bolton declined to speculate on what action the U.N. might take but said the emphasis was "to develop a coherent strategy to convince" the North Koreans "that it's not in their interest to engage in nuclear testing." The Security Council could move ahead on some sort of measure, but it is unlikely China or Russia would agree to a sharply worded resolution.

The U.S. and its allies have few clear alternatives to U.N. diplomatic action. The U.S. has repeatedly shied away from suggestions it might strike North Korea militarily, a move China and South Korea would strongly oppose. There also are lingering divisions within the Security Council over whether to seek stiffer sanctions on North Korea.

Japan was quick to react to Pyongyang's bomb-test statement. "Japan and the world would definitely not tolerate a nuclear test" by North Korea, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said in Tokyo. "If the test is carried out, I believe the international community would respond harshly."

In Seoul, high-level South Korean officials met yesterday to refine a plan they had developed in recent weeks specifically in response to a possible nuclear test. President Roh Moo Hyun said last month that "if North Korea goes ahead with a nuclear testing, the situation will become a totally different one from what it has been."

There was no immediate response from China, which is Pyongyang's closest ally. But it is likely a North Korean nuclear test would anger Beijing. Chinese leaders worry a successful test by North Korea would lead Japan to build up its military capabilities and perhaps consider developing its own nuclear weapons -- something experts say Tokyo could probably do in less than a year, given its large plutonium stockpiles.

DOJ_NMG_0074930

"The security mood in Japan would be affected by a test, and the Chinese understand that," said a senior U.S. official. It is unclear what pressure China might bring to bear on North Korea not to conduct its test or how it might punish leader Kim Jong Il if it does. China remains most concerned about potential chaos in North Korea if the Kim regime should collapse.

North Korea has pushed to meet with the U.S. in two-way talks. But amid past broken agreements with Pyongyang, the U.S. insists on meeting North Korea's leadership in broader arenas such as the U.N. or six-nation talks that include the two Koreas, China, Japan and Russia.

N. Korea Plans A Nuclear Test (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

TOKYO — World leaders lashed out at North Korea's vow Tuesday to test a nuclear bomb sometime "in the future," but offered no clear plan for dealing with aggravated tensions over the dictatorship's nuclear weapons ambitions.

U.S. intelligence officials said they had been monitoring recent movement of people and vehicles around at least one suspected test site. But because North Korea has never conducted a nuclear test, it is difficult for intelligence agencies to determine how close the regime may be to setting off a bomb.

The North Koreans did not elaborate on when a test would occur or whether it would be conducted below ground, which experts say is most likely, or in the atmosphere.

Showcasing a nuclear capability would almost certainly deepen North Korea's diplomatic and economic isolation, and could escalate the military buildup in northeast Asia, where grievances run deep and suspicions between capitals are high.

North Korea's Foreign Ministry said Tuesday that a test of the nation's nuclear capability was a necessary response to Washington's financial squeeze on the country, which it described as a "de facto declaration of war." In recent months, Washington has accused Kim Jong Il's regime of counterfeiting U.S. currency and using foreign banks to launder drug money, and has increased pressure on banks around the world not to handle transactions with Pyongyang's military and political elite.

"The U.S. extreme threat of nuclear war and sanctions and pressure compel [North Korea] to conduct a nuclear test, an essential process for bolstering [our] nuclear deterrent, as a corresponding measure for defense," the North Korean statement said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, traveling in Egypt, said a test would be "a very provocative act."

In Japan, a country within North Korean missile range and where hostility to Kim's regime is a hallmark of its new hard-line government, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe warned that "Japan and the world would definitely not tolerate a nuclear test."

And the South Korean government, which has been reluctant to take a hard line against its volatile neighbor, expressed concern over the announcement and said President Roh Moo-hyun would visit Beijing on Oct. 13 to discuss it.

But there was no immediate consensus on what measures should be employed to defuse the latest threat.

China, North Korea's neighbor and key economic partner, urged calm and restraint.

In New York, the United Nations Security Council declined to issue a formal admonition, noting that it had passed a tough resolution in July demanding that North Korea end all provocative acts and return to six-party talks aimed at dismantling its nuclear weapons program in return for security guarantees and economic incentives.

That resolution followed North Korea's July test firing of a long-range Taepodong 2 missile and a surprising burst of shorter-range missiles, in defiance of similar warnings.

U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John R. Bolton said the Security Council would meet today on finding a more effective way to discourage Pyongyang from conducting a nuclear test.

The North Korean move adds complexity to nuclear diplomacy as the Security Council seeks ways to dissuade Iran from continuing its nuclear enrichment activities. Pyongyang's defiance underscores the limited power economic sanctions exert over authoritarian governments prepared to let their civilian populations suffer in order to acquire a nuclear capability.

Kurt Campbell, a former deputy assistant secretary of Defense for Asia and the Pacific, called the Korean peninsula "the land of lousy options" and said the U.S. was limited in what it could do to diplomatically or forcibly prevent a test.

"It is a profound and deep failure for the United States and China if North Korea tests a nuclear weapon," he said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, traveling in Nicaragua, suggested that a test by North Korea could lead to the further spread of nuclear technology.

"They are an active proliferator," Rumsfeld said. "And were they to test and were they then to proliferate those technologies, we'd be living with a proliferator and obviously we'd be living in a somewhat different world."

DOJ_NMG_0074931

While the Defense secretary expressed concern that a test would increase the possibility of a bomb falling into rogue hands, others warned that a proven North Korean capability could encourage other countries in the region, such as Japan, to push for a nuclear arsenal of their own.

North Korea is estimated to have sufficient plutonium for as many as 13 weapons. By 2008, Pyongyang could have the capability to develop as many a 17 nuclear weapons, according to the Institute for Science and International Security, a nonpartisan Washington group headed by David Albright, who has worked with the International Atomic Energy Agency on nuclear inspections.

The United States, which has about 30,000 troops stationed in South Korea, is using imagery and heat sensors in trying to track North Korean activity at suspected test sites.

Pentagon officials said they were concerned about the possibility of a nuclear test, and they emphasized that the United States was trying to find diplomatic means of preventing the North Koreans from carrying one out.

"We think there needs to be a diplomatic solution to this," Vice Adm. John Morgan, the Navy's chief of strategy and plans, told reporters Tuesday. "We think the international community is working hard to achieve that."

Although North Korean government rhetoric and activity around the test sites have heated up, intelligence officials do not believe a test is imminent.

"No one can say with certainty whether it will happen — no one, that is, but Kim Jong Il," said a U.S. intelligence official, speaking on condition of anonymity when discussing intelligence data. "It could happen with little or no warning. We don't have a wonderful timetable that says they have to do 14 things to prepare for a test and they have done seven of them. There is no precedent for assessing how North Korea does its test preparations."

U.S. officials could not say what type of test the North Koreans might conduct. They believe an underground test is more likely but have not ruled out the possibility that Kim would order an aboveground test, which could produce a large mushroom cloud and spread radioactive dust.

Some observers say North Korea may be bluffing and that the talk of a test is to counter the Bush administration's pursuit of economic sanctions.

Washington says it cannot tolerate what it describes as criminal activities among the Pyongyang regime and foreign banks, and says its global campaign against those transactions is separate from the nuclear weapons issue.

The administration recently sent diplomatic feelers to Pyongyang about restarting the six-party talks. But those overtures have floundered over North Korea's insistence that the U.S. first stop what Pyongyang sees as an attempt to break the regime through an expanding campaign of financial sanctions.

Donald Gregg, president of the Korea Society and a former U.S. ambassador to South Korea, said he thought that Pyongyang's threat was serious, but that a test would be a strategic error.

"They have been working for this for a long time, they have threatened it, and they have said flatly that they have nuclear weapons," he said. "But it will heighten their isolation."

N. Korean Move Comes Amid Bid For Talks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

North Korea's announcement yesterday that it will conduct a nuclear test came just as the United States, along with South Korea, was launching a new effort to persuade the government in Pyongyang to return to long-stalled disarmament talks.

Top aides to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have been shaping the new approach, which began after a summit meeting last month between President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun. Rice has described the next six-week period as crucial, saying she hopes to make a trip to Northeast Asia soon to test her ideas.

But U.S. officials said yesterday that the government in Pyongyang, which closely monitors U.S. statements, appears to have concluded that there is no benefit in reaching a deal. Some analysts suggested that North Korea is bluffing to force the United States to begin bilateral negotiations, something the Bush administration has rejected as being a reward for bad behavior.

Instead, Pyongyang's gambit could embolden hawks in the administration who advocate confronting North Korea with a stepped-up campaign of isolation and sanctions, perhaps even a naval blockade. Some officials have privately argued that a nuclear test by North Korea would be a clarifying event that would make the problem apparent to the rest of the world.

This is the second time in recent months that Pyongyang has abruptly dismissed peace feelers from the United States. In July, Rice had also been prepared to fly to Asia to launch a new effort to restart the six-nation talks aimed at ending the impasse over North Korea's nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0074932

A senior Chinese official delivered a message to the North Korean government that, if it did not conduct a ballistic-missile test, Rice was prepared to put a lot on the table, including formally ending the Korean War that erupted five decades ago and discussing the military structure on the Korean Peninsula, U.S. officials said.

The initiative was developed after months of debate among Bush's top advisers. It would have sought ways to encourage North Korea to open up its economy -- much as China did in the 1970s under the leadership of Deng Xiaoping -- and would have indicated a U.S. acceptance of Kim Jong Il's rule.

On July 4, Pyongyang gave its answer: It tested a missile. Rice then scrubbed her trip because of the sudden outbreak of war in Lebanon. The U.N. Security Council -- with the surprising support of China, North Korea's main benefactor -- passed a tough resolution condemning the missile test. U.S. officials began preparing to reimpose some sanctions that had been lifted when North Korea agreed to freeze its nuclear program in 1990s -- but held off an announcement at the request of South Korea.

"The North Koreans hate being ignored, and they are tempted to do things to get attention," one senior administration official said recently, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive diplomacy. "We have wondered whether we should try to give the North Koreans another chance, but the North Koreans are not doing anything to show that such a move would meet a promising reply."

Yesterday's North Korean Foreign Ministry statement, issued through the official KCNA news service, put the onus on the United States for the failure of diplomacy. "Nuclear weapons will serve as reliable war deterrent for protecting the supreme interests of the state and the security of the Korean nation from the U.S. threat of aggression," the statement said.

The proximate cause of North Korea's refusal to return to the talks is a Treasury Department action against a bank in Macao called Banco Delta Asia, which the agency had identified as the main conduit for bringing North Korean counterfeit dollar bills into the international system. The Treasury had determined that senior officials at the Macao bank accepted large deposits of cash and agreed to place the bogus money into circulation. Treasury officials also believed that the bank accepted multimillion-dollar wire transfers from North Korean front companies that were deeply involved in criminal activities.

The bank is reputed to hold the private accounts of Kim. the North Korean leader, and his family.

Last year, four days before North Korea reached an agreement with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea on a "statement of principles" to guide the nuclear negotiations, the Treasury formally designated the bank as a "primary money-laundering concern." Banco Delta Asia quickly teetered on the edge of collapse, and banks around the world began to curtail their dealings with North Korea for fear of being similarly tainted.

After the impact of the Treasury action became clear, North Korea refused to return to the six-party talks.

Before North Korea's announcement yesterday, U.S. and South Korean officials had said they were looking at ways to wrap up the Treasury's investigation of the Macao bank as a way to remove that impediment to the negotiations. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill noted last month that the Treasury action concerned only 40 accounts holding about $24 million.

But, now, Pyongyang has dramatically raised the stakes. U.S. officials immediately moved to put North Korea on the agenda of the U.N. Security Council, saying that, for the moment, the time for positive gestures has passed.

Rice Tries To Persuade Sudan On Darfur (AP)

AP, October 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made a passionate plea to the international community on Tuesday to persuade the government of Sudan to reverse itself and open the bloodied Darfur region to U.N. peacekeepers.

Dispensing with traditional diplomatic understatement, Rice cited U.N. reports that tens of thousands of people, or even hundreds of thousands, perhaps, cannot be reached with food and water.

Women who go out for firewood are regularly raped, she said. Villages are attacked by militia. by rebels and by government forces.

"The international community does have a responsibility to protect the most vulnerable," Rice said at a news conference amid Mideast peacemaking efforts. "What is going on in Darfur now cannot be tolerated."

In fact, the situation in Darfur took up a large part of the discussion Rice had in the Egyptian capital with foreign ministers and other officials from eight Arab countries, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said.

Rice's plea followed one on Monday by President Bush, who sent a message this summer to President Omar al-Bashir urging entry of a U.N. peacekeeping force. Bush was rebuffed.

In August, the U.N. passed a resolution that would give the United Nations authority over peacekeepers in the Western Sudanese province of Darfur. The resolution is meant to give more power and funding to a force, now run by the African Union, that has been unable to stop the humanitarian catastrophe there.

Rice said a U.N. force could be drawn principally from Muslim African countries and from North Africa and possibly Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0074933

"We need to work urgently to have the government of Khartoum accept what is now a U.N. Security Council resolution," she said.

At least 200,000 people have died and some 2 million have been displaced since rebels from Darfur's ethnic African population revolted in 2003. The next year, after a long internal debate, the Bush administration accused the government of genocide.

The Arab-dominated Khartoum government is alleged to have unleashed Arab militias, known as the janjaweed, against the ethnic African villagers.

"This is not a challenge to the sovereignty of Sudan," Rice said of the proposed dispatch of U.N. peacekeepers. "This is certainly respected. But we need to deal with the terrible humanitarian situation there."

U.N. Front-runner Vows To Push Reforms (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, October 4, 2006

SEOUL — South Korea's foreign minister, the favorite to be the next U.N. secretary-general, promised Tuesday that if chosen for the job, he will work to reform the world body and to find a peaceful resolution to the international standoff over North Korea's nuclear program.

Ban Ki Moon, 62, cemented his position as Kofi Annan's likely successor after an informal poll Monday of the 15 members of the U.N. Security Council. Fourteen nations, including the five veto-wielding members, voted in favor of Ban. He received one vote of "no opinion."

Each of the five other candidates received at least one "no" vote from the five permanent members of the council: Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

The 192-nation General Assembly will hold a formal vote on a new secretary-general next week, probably Monday. The assembly traditionally follows the Security Council's recommendation.

If Ban prevails, his selection will have been marked by unprecedented speed, consensus and calm. In years past, the choice of a U.N. chief has often involved rancorous negotiations, numerous ballots and handshake deals. Annan, who steps down Dec. 31, was himself a compromise candidate in 1996. He emerged late in the process after the United States blocked Boutros Boutros-Ghali's bid for a second five-year term.

Ban would be the eighth secretary-general in the United Nations' 60-year history. The secretary-general oversees an organization with 92,000 peacekeepers around the world and a $5 billion annual budget. Among programs that fall under the U.N. leader's purview: fighting hunger, assisting refugees and slowing the spread of HIV/AIDS.

In Seoul, Ban said that if elected, he will push for critical reforms.

"There have been many changes around the world during the past 60 years … various threats that we have not experienced in the past," Ban said. "So it is true that there have been doubts and criticism over whether the U.N. has responded appropriately and effectively."

He pledged to help resolve the dispute over North Korea's nuclear program by applying his expertise in dealing with the communist nation.

Ban said he would focus on his role as the world's top diplomat and leave day-to-day operations to a deputy.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said he had "a lot of respect" for Ban, though he later told reporters he was disappointed there weren't more contenders for the position. Earlier, Bolton had dropped his opposition to the custom of rotating the secretary-general's job among regions, which put Asia at the front of the line. The last Asian secretary-general was U Thant of Burma, who served 1961-71.

The other candidates were U.N. Undersecretary-General Shashi Tharoor of India; Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga; Surakiart Sathirathai of Thailand, who was deputy prime minister until a military coup last month; former Afghan finance minister Ashraf Ghani; and Jordan's U.N. ambassador, Prince Zeid al-Hussein. Jayantha Dhanapala of Sri Lanka, a former U.N. disarmament chief, withdrew from consideration last week.

South Korean Homecoming At The U.N. (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 4, 2006

BAN KI-MOON WAS BORN in the city of Chungju on June 13, 1944, while Korea was still suffering under occupation by Japan. A year later, the victors of World War II split the land of his birth in half, with the Soviet Union administering the part north of the 38th Parallel and the United States taking control of the southern part, including Chungju. Two weeks after Ban's sixth birthday, a massive North Korean army under communist leader Kim Il Sung invaded the South, providing the United Nations with its first and most trying test as a force in world affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0074934

Today, Ban is poised to become secretary-general of the organization that, with U.S. leadership, pushed the North's armies back into their territory and then oversaw reconstruction of the shattered South. There are few nations where the United Nations is as widely respected, or has played as fundamental a role, as South Korea. Which is why it is fitting that a South Korean should lead the organization during what may well be another turning point.

Ban's selection isn't yet official, but after winning a straw-poll vote by the Security Council on Monday, he is almost certain to get the formal nod from the group next week, after which his approval by the full General Assembly should be little more than a formality. The process has been highly unusual both for its speed and lack of rancor — which is either a positive sign or a signal of the U.N.'s approaching demise, depending on one's outlook.

Ban is a soft-spoken, low-profile career diplomat who last year represented South Korea in the six-nation nuclear talks with North Korea and who was probably chosen because he made the fewest waves among the candidates. Being the unanimous pick of countries as divergent as the U.S., China, France and Russia requires an astonishing degree of either diplomatic skill or utter blandness. U.N.-bashers are already accusing Ban of buying votes and of being too bureaucratic to push through the reforms the organization so badly needs. Yet being a consensus-builder, a good listener and a committed multilateralist with an optimistic view of the U.N. aren't bad qualities in a secretary-general. The firebrand approach so favored by the U.N.'s sharpest critics might sound attractive on Op-Ed pages, but it almost never accomplishes anything useful in an international forum.

The U.N. secretary-general, in the words of outgoing officeholder Kofi Annan, is "the world's most impossible job." Ban will have to oversee the herculean task of reforming a body that has been nearly paralyzed by corruption scandals, hard-to-resolve conflicts in such places as Darfur and Lebanon and a growing rift between rich and poor nations. Ban is no Bill Clinton — this page's pick for the job, who was somehow overlooked by the Security Council — but he has the skills and experience to be a success.

Annan's Financial Form To Be Secret (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 4, 2006

NEW YORK -- U.N. officials said yesterday that they will not publicly release a financial disclosure form filed by Secretary-General Kofi Annan last month -- 10 months after he ordered all senior U.N. officials to file the forms.

A spokesman said Mr. Annan submitted the questionnaire -- under a policy implemented in response to international outrage over U.N. involvement in the Iraq oil-for-food scandal -- on Sept. 22.

"The secretary-general has filed the forms," Stephane Dujarric confirmed yesterday. But, he said, "We will not be making it public."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, did not return a call asking about that decision, but other critics of the world body argued that the disclosure form should be made public.

"Kofi Annan has not gone far enough. He should make the financial disclosure publicly available for outside scrutiny," said Nile Gardiner, director of the Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom at the Heritage Foundation. "The culture of secrecy remains intact in the upper echelon of the United Nations."

Mr. Annan implemented the disclosure-form policy as one of several moves to reform the institution in the wake of the oil-for-food scandal. Massive fraud was uncovered in a $64 billion program run by the United Nations that allowed Saddam Hussein's Iraq to sell a limited amount of oil.

Mr. Annan was cleared of personal involvement in the scandal, but questions were raised about the conduct of son Kojo, who worked for a company that won a major oil-for-food contract.

Among other reforms, Mr. Annan ordered the creation of an ethics office and established a policy to protect whistleblowers who expose corruption within the organization. The General Assembly agreed to the changes during the 2005 World Summit.

Until this year, U.N. undersecretaries-general were required to submit disclosure forms and declare gifts of $10,000 or more. Mr. Annan then declared that assistant secretaries-general and authorities in the U.N. procurement office also should file the forms, and reduced the gift limit to $250.

Mr. Dujarric told reporters in January that Mr. Annan would be among the first to file the disclosure form.

Asked whether he had filed his form at a press conference last month, Mr. Annan carefully answered: "I honor all my obligations to the U.N., and I think that is as I have always done." But the secretary-general is not technically an employee of the United Nations and, therefore, not legally obliged to do so.

Many Annan advisers were urging him to make good on his promise, but the chief U.N. legal counsel, Nicolas Michel, instructed the secretary-general not to, said a Secretariat official.

"Michel told him he didn't have to do it, that it would set a precedent that future secretaries-general would have to follow," said the official, who spoke on the condition of not being identified. "I don't know why anyone thinks that would be a bad thing."

DOJ_NMG_0074935

During the probe into the oil-for-food program, Mr. Annan met with investigators from the Independent Inquiry Committee, led by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, and provided documents from six banks and three credit-card companies from 1998 to 2004.

"He lives within his means and has accumulated a retirement fund through savings," said the committee's report, which noted that his income was based on his U.N. salary and a rental property.

"The secretary-general contributes heavily to charity and to the support of his extended family. ... The records produced do not raise concerns about the secretary-general's financial stability nor do they reveal any payments or transactions that appear suspicious or improper."

The U.N. secretary-general receives $259,097 a year, after taxes. He also lives rent-free in a four-story mansion on Sutton Place, with a grassy back yard that slopes down to the East River. The house, which does not belong to him or to the United Nations, is on loan from a charitable foundation.

In addition, the secretary-general receives an allowance of about $25,000 a year for business entertaining, and he can keep the frequent flier miles he accrues when traveling on commercial airlines.

Rumsfeld Stays Mum On Nicaragua Politics (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 3, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld criticized Venezuela's hostile politics and longtime adversary Cuba during a three-day stay in Central American, but avoided any talk about another old antagonist.

Asked repeatedly about the Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega, who is leading in the presidential polls here, Rumsfeld stayed mum.

"I don't get involved in politics in the United States," Rumsfeld said more than once when questioned by reporters during a gathering of defense ministers from the Western hemisphere. "So you can be certain I don't get involved in politics in Nicaragua."

U.S. officials, however, are watching Nicaragua's upcoming elections very closely, mindful that a win by Ortega could be another destabilizing force in a region where democracy has slowly taken hold.

Ortega, whose socialist government was a major adversary of the United States in the 1980s, led the overthrow of dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979 and fought the U.S.-backed Contra rebels as Nicaragua's president from 1985-1990.

Rumsfeld made a passing reference to Cuba in his formal remarks to the ministers, and on Tuesday he said the island nation would be welcome in the conference when it becomes a "free and democratic country."

And he was blunt about the concerns being raised by Latin American leaders about Venezuela President Hugo Chavez' billion-dollar weapons buildup.

"I don't know of anyone threatening Venezuela, anyone in this hemisphere," Rumsfeld said when asked if he believed the Venezuelans' contention that the arms purchases were strictly for defense.

Chavez grabbed headlines recently when he called Bush "the devil" and slammed U.S. leaders for trying to block his country from taking a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

U.S. officials have long considered Chavez a destabilizing force. And they have suggested that Venezuela would make the Security Council unworkable if the nation were to win its bid against U.S.-backed Guatemala for a rotating council seat.

Rumsfeld met with Central American defense ministers on Tuesday, and later with Nicaraguan President Enrique Bolanos.

He said it is important for the Central American countries to continue to work together on counterterrorism, counter-narcotics, natural disasters and other threats. But he agreed that as one country cracks down on drug trafficking, the problem may migrate to another country.

After his meeting with Bolanos, Rumsfeld said he was pleased with the progress the Nicaraguans have made in their effort to destroy a cache of about 1,000 Soviet-era surface-to-air missiles. However, he noted that the job is not yet complete. U.S. officials have considered the missiles a potential threat to civil aviation.

___

On the Net:

Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

Hijacker Surrenders After Forcing Turkish Airliner To Southern Italy (WP/AP)

By Max Frigione, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

BRINDISI, Italy, Oct. 3 -- A Turkish man hijacked a jetliner carrying 113 people on an Albania-to-Turkey flight Tuesday and forced it to land in southern Italy, where he surrendered and released all the passengers unharmed, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0074936

Two senior Turkish officials said the hijacker was seeking political asylum. An Italian security official said the man had a message for Pope Benedict XVI, but he said he did not know what it was.

Earlier accounts from the plane's operator, Turkish Airlines, said that the Boeing 737-400 had been hijacked by two Turks and that they were protesting the pope's planned visit to Turkey next month.

Turkish Transport Minister Binali Yildirim said the hijacker was seeking to evade military service in his native Turkey. "It has nothing to do with the pope's visit; it was a simple attempt of seeking political asylum under the influence of psychological problems," Yildirim said.

The passengers got off the plane about two hours after it landed in Brindisi, a town on southern Italy's Adriatic coast. The jet was on a darkened tarmac, with a firetruck carrying the airport's chief of security parked nearby.

The passengers were being questioned one by one by Italian authorities to confirm their identities and rule out any possibility that the hijacker had an accomplice.

The plane was making a routine flight from the Albanian capital, Tirana, to Istanbul when it was seized. A man burst into the cockpit and said, "There's two of us," leading authorities to believe that the man was not acting alone, according to an Italian security official in Brindisi. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the news media.

The captain issued an alert that the plane had been hijacked. The plane's crew later contacted Italian air traffic controllers and asked to land in Brindisi. The plane was escorted to the ground by two Italian military jets, according to the Italian air traffic agency ENAV.

The hijacker was identified as Hakan Ekinci. He had converted to Christianity and was an army deserter and anti-militarist who fled to Albania this year, according to the private Dogan News Agency and NTV television in Turkey.

Ekinci, 28, sent a letter to Benedict on Aug. 30 asking for help to avoid returning to military service in Turkey, Dogan reported.

"I am Hakan Ekinci, I am a Christian and I never want to serve in a Muslim army," he said in the letter, according to Dogan, which said it had obtained the letter from a blog on the Internet. "I am begging you for help as the spiritual leader of us, Christians' world."

Unswayed By West, Russia Continues Georgia Blockade (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

MOSCOW Oct. 3 -- Russia signaled Tuesday that it would not lift a transportation blockade on Georgia despite the release of four Russian officers detained on espionage charges and calls from the European Union and the United States for the two countries to find ways to ease tensions.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Tuesday that his country had "no plans for the time being" to restore postal and transportation links, including commercial flights and train service, that were severed Monday as the four military officers were about to be released.

"One must not feed off Russia and insult it," Lavrov said at a media briefing Tuesday that was marked by harsh language. "The Georgian leadership must understand this."

Relations between the two countries have worsened since Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili came to power in early 2004 on the promise of taking his country into the NATO military alliance and out of Russia's sphere of influence. Tensions are also heightened by two breakaway regions in Georgia -- South Ossetia and Abkhazia -- that receive support from Moscow.

Saakashvili has said he is determined to reassert Georgian sovereignty over the two areas, which are patrolled by Russian peacekeepers.

In Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja of Finland, which holds the rotating E.U. presidency, said Moscow's sanctions seemed disproportionate and warned against "more acute measures." On Monday, the U.S. State Department also called on Russia and Georgia to take steps to "de-escalate tensions in the days and weeks ahead."

"We think that hot rhetoric on either side or sanctions is not a good idea," Daniel Fried, assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, said in a telephone interview. "This is a time for reflection and for both sides to work together. . . . It's too bad Russia is not taking the opportunity to de-escalate."

But Lavrov was not in a charitable mood. "There are attempts by some figures to say that the Russian officers have been released, the situation has calmed down and let's do things as before," he said. "We don't want to do things as before."

The Russian foreign minister accused Georgia of illegally acquiring Soviet- or Russian- made arms in Europe, and he said the sellers, whom he did not identify, were violating a ban on transferring those weapons to third parties.

He said Russia was "seriously worried by total militarization in Georgia," noting a call-up of reservists by the government.

DOJ_NMG_0074937

"The Georgian budget is not very big," Lavrov said. "Money is coming via different channels, including illegally from Russia, where this money is largely made by criminal methods. These channels will be blocked, too."

Lavrov provided no details, but the statement appeared to be a reference to remittances sent back to Georgia by some of the estimated 300,000 Georgian immigrants here; some estimates put the number of Georgians in Russia, many of them here illegally, closer to 1 million. The population of Georgia is 4.6 million.

Russian lawmakers scheduled a debate on a bill that would bar Georgians from transferring money home.

"These measures will not give the desired results and in the end will hurt Russia itself," Georgia's Foreign Ministry said in a statement Tuesday.

Lavrov also noted that Georgia had arrested the Russians after Saakashvili had visited Washington and NATO had agreed to an intensive dialogue with the country on membership.

"We certainly make note of the assurances of our U.S. colleagues that they have constantly tried to keep the Georgian leadership from abrupt moves," Lavrov said. "But the chronology was the way I have just explained -- a visit to Washington, NATO's decision, hostage-taking -- and the charges were laughable and groundless."

Georgian Vineyards Hit By Russian Frost (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 4, 2006

TELAVI, Georgia -- In the shadow of the Caucasus Mountains, the grapes are heavy on the vines and ripe for harvesting. Zurab Ramazashvili, owner of the Telavi Wine Cellar, cradles a bunch in his hand, plucks a single grape and savors its bursting juices.

"I'm very optimistic about our wine this year," he said, adding with a rueful smile, "But where to sell it?"

People have been making wine in this rugged and poor corner of eastern Georgia for millennia, a tradition that survived nationalization in the Soviet Union and the disarray of communism's collapse. But another storm has blown over the mountains from Russia and into Kakheti, Georgia's storied winemaking district.

Earlier this year, Russian health officials banned the import and sale of all wine from Georgia, citing impurities. It was a body blow to Georgia's second-largest export industry, which sold nearly 80 percent of its wine to Russia.

Georgians read the ban as political retribution for the country's increasingly strained relations with the Kremlin, which reached a new pitch of animosity following the detention of four Russian military officers, who were stationed in Georgia, on spying charges. The two countries have been at odds since Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili came to power in early 2004 and immediately adopted pro-Western policies that included a desire to join the NATO military alliance.

"This year the front line in the economic war is here in the vineyards of Kakheti," Saakashvili said in a meeting with ministers in early September.

The impact of the wine ban was immediate -- from the fields where the vines burrow deep into the parched earth to wineries that have invested millions of dollars in new equipment in recent years. Georgia's annual production has plummeted from nearly 50 million bottles in 2005 to a projected 20 million bottles this year, according to Georgian vintners, wiping out jobs and investments.

In 2005, for instance, the Telavi Wine Cellar sold nearly 2.5 million bottles of wine in Russia, about 70 percent of the winery's entire output. This year, with the Russian market lost, Ramazashvili projects that he will sell only 1.7 million bottles. "It hurts," said Ramazashvili, "and breaking into new markets is a time-consuming and costly process."

"You can't get a decent price for the grapes now," said Keto Boglotsishrili, 70, as she and her family harvested Rkatsiteli, a Georgian variety whose seeds were discovered here in clay jugs dating to 3000 B.C. Prices for the white grapes have fallen about 30 percent since last year.

"It's almost not worth being out here," said Boglotsishrili's husband, Shota, as he bent to cut bunches of grapes on a warm fall afternoon.

But the Russian ban could also help diversify an industry that had become too reliant on one market and paid too little attention to the quality of the wine it was producing.

"It will take a certain amount of time to recover from this slump, maybe some years, but this can be a blessing in disguise," said Zurab Chkhaidze, co-owner of the Askaneli Brothers winery. "We will have to find new markets and make new and better products."

Officials in Moscow said they acted because Georgian wine, as well as wine from Moldova, was laced with pesticides and other impurities. Russia also banned Georgian mineral water and agricultural produce and this week cut off all transportation links between the two countries.

DOJ_NMG_0074938

More than 600,000 gallons of wine already in the country were destroyed, and vintners such as Chkhaidze, who had 40,000 bottles inside Russia at the time of the ban, lost hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The Georgian restaurants that dot Moscow were suddenly forced to serve wine from Western Europe and the Americas. "It's not a substitute at all," said Gocha Markelia, manager of Alaverdy restaurant in Moscow. "We grew up -- and I mean both Russians and Georgians -- drinking Georgian wine, and Chilean or French wines are very alien to us. Our clients don't like those wines and don't want them, but there's nothing we can do."

Vintners here agree that some of the wine sold as "Georgian" in Russia was impure. But they stress that it wasn't actually Georgian and that most of it was counterfeited in Russia.

Last year, 150 million bottles of "Georgian" wine, much of it plonk, was sold on the Russian market, although Georgia produced only 50 million bottles in 2005. Cheap Moldovan, Romanian, Hungarian and Bulgarian wine was relabeled as Georgian and sold in Russia, where Georgia's wines, particularly semisweet and semi-dry varieties, have been beloved since the armies of the czar swept in here in the 18th century.

"The Russian market was very easy -- too easy. You could sell anything," said George Margvelashvili, the president of Tbilvino, a winery based on the edge of Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, that produces some of the country's finer vintages. "This crisis is forcing new ideas into the industry -- how to produce better and better wine and how to market it."

Margvelashvili's company and other vintners are now attempting to break into new markets from China to the United States, where he is currently negotiating with wine brokers. But he said it will be at least three more years before his factory is back to 2005 levels of production. Last year, he sold 1.5 million bottles, with 650,000 going to Russia.

"This year we'll be very, very lucky if we sell 800,000 bottles," said Margvelashvili, who has had to lay off 40 of the 125 people who worked at the winery. "Last year we bought 2,600 tons of grapes at harvest time. This year nothing, because we have enough stock to carry us."

To absorb this year's harvest, grapes are being diverted into the manufacture of juices and pure spirit, and Georgian companies have been buying some of the harvest, describing their purchases as a public service. The army is also buying grapes to feed its soldiers.

The Georgian government is also enforcing a quality-control system to root out the persistent problem of counterfeiting. Saakashvili complained at his meeting with ministers that he recently ordered a glass of Mukuzani at a Georgian restaurant in Krakow, Poland, but it bore no relation to the dry, deep red made from grapes grown in Kakheti.

"I tried the wine and it would have been better if I hadn't," said Saakashvili. "It was water with alcohol and dye."

The government has also begun advertising Georgian wine in countries such as Ukraine, where sales are soaring, and officials acknowledge that the standoff with Russia has drawn worldwide attention to the vineyards here.

"Russia has provided us with a lot of free publicity because of its actions," said Mikheil Svimonishvili, the Georgian agriculture minister, who is spending the harvest season from mid-September to mid-October in Kakheti. "We're coping, and I believe this is going to have a positive impact."

In Graft Inquiry, Chinese See A Shake-Up Coming (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 3 — When Shanghai's party boss was detained in an anticorruption probe last week, Chinese were rattled by news of the first purge of a high-ranking Communist Party leader since 1995. But the investigation's scope and its ultimate goals are wider, as the party's two most powerful officials aim to shake up the leadership and wipe out resistance to their policy agenda, party officials and analysts say.

The investigation, the largest of its kind since China first pursued market-style changes to its economy more than a quarter-century ago, was planned and supervised by Zeng Qinghong, China's vice president and the day-to-day manager of Communist Party affairs, people informed about the operation said.

They said Mr. Zeng had used the investigation to force provincial leaders to heed Beijing's economic directives, sideline officials loyal to the former top leader, Jiang Zemin, and strengthen Mr. Zeng's own hand as well as that of his current master, President Hu Jintao.

Aside from frightening officials who have grown accustomed to increasingly conspicuous corruption in recent years, the crackdown could give Mr. Hu greater leeway to carry out his agenda for broader welfare benefits and stronger pollution controls, which may prove popular in China today.

Some critics fear that it may also consolidate greater power in the hands of a leader who has consistently sought to restrict the news media, censor the Web and punish peaceful political dissent.

DOJ_NMG_0074939

The high-level purge began on Sept. 25, when Chen Liangyu, the Shanghai party leader and a Politburo member, was removed from his office on corruption charges. Party security forces had already detained high-ranking officials in Shanghai, Beijing, Tianjin, Fujian and Hunan. Mr. Chen is the most powerful person removed from office since 1995, when the Beijing party leader was purged, also on corruption charges, during a power struggle.

Several party officials and well-informed political observers said they believed that the investigation had not yet reached its climax. They say Mr. Zeng hopes to dismiss two fellow members of the Politburo Standing Committee, Jia Qinglin and Huang Ju, who are under pressure to take "political responsibility" for corruption that has occurred in Beijing and Shanghai, their respective areas of influence.

If he succeeds in removing officials who serve on the nine-member Standing Committee, the party's top leadership, the purge will amount to the biggest political shake-up since 1989, when Deng Xiaoping ousted Zhao Ziyang, then the party's general secretary, after the crackdown on democracy protests in Beijing.

It would also be likely to seal Mr. Zeng's reputation as China's political mastermind, who mixes personal ambition with a nearly legendary ability to deliver results for his superiors. Officially ranked No. 5 in the party hierarchy, he is widely seen as exercising more authority within the party than anyone except Mr. Hu.

Chinese politicking takes place under a heavy veil of secrecy, and speculation about what happens in Zhongnanhai, the Chinese leadership compound, has been intense since Mr. Chen's detention last week.

It is rarely possible to get authoritative confirmation of political maneuvers in China. The people who discussed the situation with a foreign reporter did so on condition of anonymity, citing fears of retribution.

The course of the anticorruption campaign may shift if central leaders face a strong backlash at the party's annual Central Committee meeting, which will be held Oct. 8-11. One well-placed political observer said he doubted that Mr. Huang or Mr. Jia would be forced from office before their expected retirement next year.

Even so, the weakened position of the two men and their patron, Mr. Jiang, whom Mr. Hu and Mr. Zeng pushed from his last post in 2004, could have a significant impact on Chinese policy and leadership decisions.

Mr. Jiang's old loyalists, often referred to as the Shanghai faction, tended to favor fast economic growth, a relatively high degree of provincial autonomy in economic affairs, loose controls on investment and bank lending and close ties between the party and the country's rising class of private businessmen.

Mr. Hu, 63, and Mr. Zeng, 67, have at least for now forged an alliance that dominates party leadership, party officials say. They advocate slower and more stable growth, greater attention to social inequality and pollution, and an expansion of state support for education, medical care and social security.

Most of the officials singled out so far in the anticorruption sweep are seen as closer to Mr. Jiang and as having ignored central directives to tamp down state-led investment. That, party officials say, shows that the continuing legal investigation serves as a cover for a political campaign to change the party's policy direction.

Mr. Zeng plans to use the Central Committee meeting to elevate Mr. Hu's political slogan, "harmonious society," into an official "theory."

The catch phrase covers a range of policies intended to restore a balance between the country's thriving market economy and its neglected socialist ideology, primarily by paying greater attention to peasants and migrant workers who have benefited much less than the white-collar elite in China's long economic boom.

At the meeting, party leaders will discuss "the theory of building a harmonious socialist society," party officials said. In effect, Mr. Zeng is promoting Mr. Hu's concept into doctrine, to be taught alongside the theories of Mao, Deng and Mr. Jiang.

People informed about Mr. Zeng's planning described that step and others as part of a carefully calculated series of political moves that began last spring.

They said Mr. Zeng had instructed the inspectors responsible for enforcing party discipline to investigate activities in the political strongholds of Beijing, Shanghai and Tianjin, where he suspected that senior party officials were allowing rampant profiteering by relatives and friends, and where the leaders owed their positions mainly to Mr. Jiang.

Those urban enclaves, whose leaders enjoy considerable autonomy, had also defied repeated efforts by Mr. Hu and Wen Jiabao, the prime minister, to rein in bank lending in overheated sectors like real estate.

Anticipating that Mr. Jiang might seek to protect his allies, Mr. Zeng first moved to mollify him by rolling out a tribute: the publication of his collected works. Party units nationwide were instructed to purchase and study the three-volume collection of speeches and essays, a financial and political windfall.

The crackdown initially focused on lower-level officials in the big cities. When investigators gathered evidence to implicate Mr. Chen, the Shanghai party boss, Mr. Zeng summoned him to Beijing, presented him with the pending indictment and pressed him to resign, these people said. He was said to have refused.

DOJ_NMG_0074940

Faced with the prospect of a hostile purge, the first of its kind affecting a Politburo member since 1995, Mr. Zeng and Mr. Hu sent Mr. Chen's file to Mr. Jiang, asking for his advice, a person close to Mr. Zeng's office said.

Confronted with evidence of high-level corruption in Shanghai, Mr. Jiang approved removing Mr. Chen, the people said.

Armed with that victory, Mr. Zeng has pushed to create a new standard of "political responsibility," modeled after a code seen by him to prevail in American politics, which holds senior leaders responsible if their underlings disgrace the party, people informed about his thinking said.

That new standard could be used against Mr. Huang, a former Shanghai party boss and a Jiang loyalist, and Mr. Jia, who supervised Beijing.

"The old standard for senior party members was legal guilt," said one person who spoke about Mr. Zeng's thinking. "Under the new standard you could lose your post for mismanagement even if they can't prove you put one cent in your own pocket."

Others raised doubts that the purge would reach people that high up the hierarchy. The ruling party risks undermining its own authority if it acknowledges that corruption extends into the most elite ruling circle, they said.

More generally, Mr. Zeng's prominent role has raised questions about his influence relative to Mr. Hu's, party officials said.

Mr. Hu holds the posts of party general secretary, head of the military and president of China, the country's three most important. Mr. Zeng, though he runs the party's main coordinating office, is outranked in its official hierarchy not only by Mr. Hu but also by three other Standing Committee members.

Moreover, until Mr. Hu and Mr. Zeng unexpectedly joined forces in 2004 to push Mr. Jiang into full retirement, Mr. Zeng was seen as close to Mr. Jiang. The two worked side by side since they served in Shanghai together in the 1980's.

But Mr. Zeng's campaign to remove some Jiang loyalists may end up strengthening his own hand as well as Mr. Hu's, some party officials suggested. The reason is that Mr. Zeng has become the standard-bearer for a wide array of political interests.

The son of one of Mao's first security chiefs, Mr. Zeng maintains close ties to the sons and daughters of Communist China's founding fathers and has relatives in the military. He has supporters among those who favor deeper capitalist-style changes to the economy and financial system.

Some Chinese intellectuals say he has signaled an openness to political change. Mr. Hu, in contrast, is viewed as cautious and doctrinaire.

Mr. Hu has sought to promote officials he trusts from his days as a provincial official in western China and as the head of the national Communist Youth League in the 1980's. Though he now has broad authority, his traditional base is considered narrower and less influential than that of Mr. Zeng.

The political dance between the men underlines uncertainties about the political succession scheduled to take place in 2007. At that time the party will hold a congress, as it does every five years, to approve a new lineup of officials for the Politburo as well as other top party, government and provincial positions.

Party officials say that while Mr. Hu and Mr. Zeng have worked together to consolidate their own power, they have not agreed on choices for the Standing Committee or some top provincial posts. That suggests that their alliance possibly temporary and that the country's politics could remain volatile.

"I think that at this point neither of them has the power to dictate the future," one party official said. "They need each other, but that does not mean they trust each other."

Lucrative Return Israeli Investors Find Opportunity In Romanian Roots (WSJ)

By Joel Millman

The Wall Street Journal, October 4, 2006

BUCHAREST -- In 1993, Moshe Arbel returned to Romania, 45 years after he arrived in Israel with thousands of other children orphaned by the Holocaust. He found his mother's grave, hired caretakers to maintain it for $12 a month, and spotted something else -- opportunity.

Romania was a country stirring to life economically after the fall of communism, he told his employer, Givat Haim, a kibbutz that makes Prigat-brand fruit juice. "I said, 'Back me and I'll make money in Romania.' They said, 'Romania? There's more money in Netanya [a nearby town] than in all of Romania.' Meshuga -- crazy -- they called me," Mr. Arbel recalls.

With a $175,000 loan from the kibbutz, the 63-year-old marketing specialist began bottling Prigat fruit juices in Romania, turning the brand into the country's top seller. This summer, he sold the Romanian unit for about $7 million to PepsiAmericas, a Minneapolis-based bottler.

In a historical twist, the children of the Romanian Holocaust are playing a leading role in modernizing the land of their parents' tragedy. Israeli expatriates have started local businesses in agriculture, retailing, real estate and heavy construction. Branch offices of firms based in Tel Aviv and Haifa handle everything from hotel management to insurance to car leasing. Many of the office parks and shopping malls rising in Bucharest's suburbs are being financed by Israeli hedge funds, while Israeli engineering firms are managing European Union road and water projects in the countryside.

DOJ_NMG_0074941

The Israeli presence is so large that Bucharest hotel lobbies and restaurants buzz with Hebrew speakers. On Thursday nights, the two-hour flights between Bucharest and Tel Aviv are packed with Israeli business commuters heading home for family weekends -- and Israeli gamblers bound for Bucharest's casinos, four of which are operated by Israeli entrepreneurs. Israeli licensees in Romania market Kodak film, Pepsi and Cadbury Schweppes soft drinks and Tuborg beer.

Businessmen here estimate that Israelis have invested as much as $2 billion in Romania over the past 15 years, a huge sum given Israel's population of six million. Much of the investment has been routed through third countries, mainly in Western Europe, to take advantage of tax deals. Counting such indirect investment, Romania ranks with the U.S., China, India and Western Europe as a top destination for Israeli capital, says the nation's commercial attaché in Bucharest.

For Israel, whose trade with its Arab neighbors is limited, Romania represents a growth market. Apart from catering to a Romanian market of 22 million, Israeli firms located here can take advantage of regional trade pacts to export duty-free throughout Europe. Starting Jan. 1, when Romania joins the EU, the estimated 30,000 Israelis who also have Romanian citizenship will gain EU citizenship and ultimately be able to work, study and travel freely across Europe.

As a result, thousands more Israelis are queueing up for joint citizenship. "We call them 'born-again Romanians,' " jokes Michael Faint, an animal-feed merchant from the United Kingdom based in Bucharest.

Romania benefits, too, from the Israeli connection. Israelis provide money and technical expertise to a nation that must build its economy to EU standards. Israeli agricultural companies play an especially large role in revamping Romania's farm sector, which was set back by Communist-era mismanagement. "Israeli companies are helping to make a modern Romania," says Jose Iacobescu of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, who says that Israeli firms employ between 150,000 and 200,000 Romanians.

Tangled History

Israel and Romania have a tangled history. During World War II, Romania was ruled for two years by the fascist Iron Guard, but was one of the few Axis supporters never occupied by German troops. Due to shifting borders, 200,000 Romanian Jews were living in Soviet territory when Hitler's forces invaded, and many died.

Yet 350,000 Romanian Jews survived. Most migrated to Israel, where they so dominated their new society that much of what is considered traditionally Israeli has Romanian origins, including Israel's national folk dance, the hora. Under the Communist regime of Nicolae Ceausescu, Romania was the one Soviet-bloc nation that never broke ties with Israel. The two states even collaborated on intelligence matters.

However, lingering anti-Semitism still makes Romania a tricky place for Jews to do business. Last December, an ultranationalist group, Dacia Nemuritoare ("Immortal Dacia," Romania's Bronze Age name), listed the country's top Jewish entrepreneurs and the law firms and banks they work with. A weekly publication of a right-wing minority party, Greater Romania, published a column last year that claimed that Jews with dual citizenship were planning a stealth "depopulation" of the country by dismantling the public-health system and forcing natives to emigrate for work.

Worried about being targets of prejudice, some religious Israelis doff their yarmulkes upon arrival in Bucharest. Many companies register offshore, which obscures their Israeli roots. Strauss International Ltd., a well-known Israeli chocolate maker, sells Romania's leading brand of roasted coffee, called Elite. Its Romanian operation is part of its Amsterdam-registered subsidiary. "Romanians are completely unaware of the Jewish origin" of these brands, says Stefan Liute, a Romanian who works for Grapefruit, a Bucharest brand consultant.

Indeed, Prigat researchers discovered that many Romanians think the brand name, which means "fruit of the wine press" in Hebrew, dates to Romania's pre-Communist era. But Mr. Arbel, the company's head, says account representatives faced resistance from some Lebanese and Syrian restaurateurs who have flocked to Bucharest.

Romanian-born Israelis began returning in great numbers around 1990. The post-Communist government published lists of about 9,000 properties, including hundreds of factories and hotels, that were seized either by Nazi sympathizers after 1940 or by Communists after 1948. Israelis filed claims for lost holdings, as did ethnic Hungarians, Germans and other groups. So far, more than 200,000 claims have been made, and about 80,000 have been adjudicated. Romania doesn't categorize them by ethnicity.

Successful claimants often flipped Bucharest properties to Israeli developers, who spruced them up for sale to Austrian, German, Greek and Italian businessmen entering the country. Israelis with dual citizenship were also buyers, benefiting from a government policy that encouraged sales to Romanians living abroad, says Jacob Fonea, a dentist from Haifa who today heads the Romanian-Israeli Chamber of Commerce.

Dr. Fonea, who was born in Iasí near the Soviet border, was unable to regain factories once owned by his family. But he remained in Romania and founded the AIE Group, which bought a former state-owned woolens weaver and a bankrupt tableware company, among other firms, and now exports a variety of goods to Europe. He says AIE has annual sales of around $100 million and employs some 7,000 Romanians.

DOJ_NMG_0074942

Israelis of Romanian descent created a web of businesses. When Prigat needed a juice bottler, it turned to Amraz Ltd., Israel's largest producer of plastic containers, which set up a local factory. Now Amraz is exporting plastic bottles into Croatia and France.

Similarly, Israeli architects work for Israeli developers who hire Israeli construction firms across the country. Israeli hedge funds are buying farmland to be managed by Israeli agronomists who tap Israeli kibbutz members to run farms. Romanian authorities say there are about 3,500 companies registered in Israel that do business here. There are another 2,000 Romanian businesses owned by Israelis but registered in third countries, according to diplomats and businessmen.

These close commercial ties date back to the collapse of the Ceausescu regime. Israeli contractors reconditioned Soviet-supplied MiG fighters for Romania's air force and later, with U.S. permission, sold surplus U.S. F-16s to Romania.

At the same time, many Romanians headed to Israel for jobs when their country plummeted into recession during the 1990s, and Palestinian unrest prompted Israel to rely less on Arab laborers and recruit guest workers abroad. Eventually about 200,000 Romanians joined Thais, Chinese and Filipinos working in Israel. Bucharest now bustles with Hebrew-speaking cab drivers who bought their vehicles with cash earned in Israel. Hebrew-speaking Romanians became a ready work force for returning Jews.

With Romania's economy growing at 5.6% a year over the past five years -- twice as fast as Israel's -- the country has become a magnet for ambitious young Israelis who feel stifled at home. "Our country is saturated," complains Moran Morgenshtern, a 32-year-old veterinarian who worked this summer breeding heifers in Romania. "If I ever want to run my own farm, I'll probably do it here."

Ms. Morgenshtern's employer, Tnuva Central Cooperative for the Marketing of Agricultural Produce in Israel Ltd., is Israel's largest food concern. Founded as a dairy cooperative in 1926, Tnuva today has a 70% share of the Israeli market and now looks abroad to expand. Romania has a special lure: Once it joins the EU, it will get immediate access to the huge European dairy market, which Israel has had little luck in cracking, so long as Romanian producers can meet EU sanitary and food-safety standards.

Tnuva says it can meet those standards and help Romanian farms do the same. It also cautions Romanian farmers that if they can't boost their agricultural productivity, they will be swamped with cheaper agricultural imports from more efficient farms in Western Europe. "I warn the Romanian people, 'Follow me or else you will end up slaves of the West,' " says Yoram Israeli, a 55-year-old, former kibbutz member who runs Tnuva Romania, and who is jokingly called "Moses" around his Bucharest office.

Two-Stage Strategy

Mr. Israeli has a two-stage strategy. First, Tnuva is building a yogurt-processing plant in Romania to make and sell Yoplait yogurt with milk produced locally. (Tnuva already licenses and sells Yoplait, a French brand, in Israel.) Afterward, Tnuva hopes to sell Romanian dairy products throughout Europe.

This year, Tnuva bought its first Romanian farm, a former Communist collective near the village of Adunatti Copãceni, and imported a herd of 1,200 dairy cows from Germany. A few weeks before the first cows arrived, workers, many Romanian gypsies, restored concrete barns that had been stripped of metal fixtures, including roofs, by local scavengers. Israelis cleaned the site thoroughly after inspectors discovered leucosis bacteria in pools of stagnant water. That could have infected dairy cows and disqualified their milk for sale.

The Israelis sought local dairymen who can meet EU standards. Next, Tnuva hopes to persuade co-op members to advise local farmers, invest in Romanian dairies and share technical know-how. "It's like playing matchmaker," says Rafi Shaul, the Tnuva executive in charge of hunting for local partners.

Mr. Shaul, a chain-smoker with a thinning gray ponytail, works with Costel Caras, a 48-year-old Bucharest native who began farming in 1994. Mr. Caras turns to Mr. Shaul for advice on everything from how to mix feed to how to qualify for EU farm aid.

Tramping through an overgrown pasture in July, Mr. Shaul praised Mr. Caras's placement of a concrete corral and the cleanliness of his herd's stalls. He winced at the sight of Mr. Caras's creaking water pump. "Some of these farms," Mr. Shaul muttered, "look like Israel 50 years ago."

Later, over a lunch of Romanian cheese and eggplant snacks, Mr. Caras complained that a wholesaler twice neglected to make pickups at his farm, forcing him to dump his product. If that keeps happening, he'll go broke.

Tnuva competes here from France's Groupe Danone SA and the Netherlands' Friesland Foods. Mr. Shaul said he suspects brokers may be punishing Mr. Caras for working with Tnuva. Mr. Shaul advised the farmer to be careful.

"Don't worry about me. I am a free man," the Romanian said. "We need Tnuva. We don't want just one buyer here."

DOJ_NMG_0074943

An African Dumping Ground (NYT)

The New York Times, October 4, 2006

Globalization brings wealth and opportunity to many people around the world. But to poor slum dwellers in the failing state of Ivory Coast, it has brought horrible sickness and death after hazardous waste, shipped nearly halfway around the world, was stealthily dumped in backyards around Abidjan. This need not and should not have happened.

As reported in Monday's Times by Lydia Polgreen and Marlise Simons, the waste — a fuming mix of petrochemicals and caustic soda — that started out in the Mediterranean and ended up in Africa could have been safely disposed of earlier in its journey. But Trafigura, the Swiss trading company that leased the tanker, balked at paying European prices. Instead, 85,000 people ended up seeking medical treatment, and at least eight have died.

The details and legal responsibilities are still being sorted out. But the lesson is plain. Without strict, and strictly enforced, international rules on waste disposal, dangerous cargos will find the course of least resistance, least cost, and least regulation, scarring the lives of some of the world's poorest, worst governed and most defenseless people.

This story began in July, when a Greek-owned Panamanian-flagged tanker, leased by Trafigura, stopped in Amsterdam and attempted to unload its waste. That fell through when a Dutch company that had contracted to do the job for $15,000 found far more noxious material in the ship's hold than it had been led to believe. Completing safe disposal there would instead cost $300,000, plus perhaps as much again in delays.

That sent Trafigura looking for cheaper alternatives. But for a company that had revenues of $28 billion last year, it was not a prohibitive price — especially considering what happened. The ship moved on to several more ports, ending up in Abidjan, where Trafigura hired a local disposal company that did the nocturnal backyard dumping.

Trafigura says the Ivoirian authorities told it that the local company could do the job safely. If that is true, those officials were recklessly incompetent. In any case, a stronger system of international regulations — backed up by a threat of fines or other penalties — might have forced Trafigura to think twice about whom it was hiring.

Unless such regulations are tightened and reliably enforced, the sick and the dead in Ivory Coast will have suffered for nothing. And the whole story will soon be repeated in some other country where costs are low, rules are slack, and, as an inevitable result, human life is cheap.

DOJ_NMG_0074944

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Wednesday, October 04, 2006 7:08 PM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: DOJ Daily News Wrap

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP
October 4, 2006

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs (202) 514-2007

THURSDAY'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Attorney General Participates in Hispanic Heritage Month Event (OPA)
This afternoon, the Attorney General participated in an event celebrating Hispanic Heritage Month at the Department of Justice.

Justice Department Sends Letter to House of Representatives Regarding Foley Communications (OPA)
This morning, the Office of Public Affairs confirmed that the Department sent a letter to the House of Representatives requesting preservation of records regarding Congressman Foley's alleged communication with House Pages.

Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals Grants Motion Pending Appeal in ACLU v. NSA (Civil)
In a unanimous decision, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals today granted a motion allowing the NSA's Terrorist Surveillance Program to continue operation. The ruling from a three-judge panel gave little explanation for the decision. In the three-paragraph ruling, judges said that they balanced the likelihood an appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides and the public interest. The American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit seeking to stop the program on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say it has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

Talking Point:

- This program is both critical to preventing terrorist attacks and fully consistent with law.
- We are pleased to see that it will be allowed to continue while the Court of Appeals examines the trial court's decision, with which we strongly disagree.

Petition filed by CIA High Value Detainee (Civil)
The Baltimore Sun is running a story on a story about a petition filed on behalf of Majid Khan, who was recently moved to Guantanamo after the President announced that he was in custody of the CIA in the high value detainee program. According to the Sun, his petition contests his status as an enemy combatant and describes his volunteer work with the Islamic Society of Baltimore as essentially teaching computer skills, which is a little different from the description suggested in the biography the U.S. government released in September. According to the Sun, in his petition also talks about returning to the United States after his wedding in 2002 to work so he could support his family. The Sun is wondering how those claims square with the government's view of what he involved with when he in the United States.

Talking Point:

- We have recently received the petition and are reviewing it. However based on initial review we will oppose the petition.

FBI and FDA Agents Search Produce Companies to Determine Source of E.Coli Outbreak (USAO–Northern District of California)

Two search warrants were executed today by the FBI and FDA Office of Criminal Investigations against Growers Express and Natural Selection Foods in connection with the outbreak of E.Coli, announced U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan of the Northern District of California.

Talking Points:

- There is no indication in this investigation that leaf spinach was deliberately or intentionally contaminated.

- We are investigating allegations that certain spinach growers and distributors may not have taken all necessary or appropriate steps to ensure that their spinach was safe before they were placed into interstate commerce.

- The investigation has not revealed any evidence of a new or continuing threat to public health in connection with the matters under investigation.

City Of Indianapolis Agrees to Make $1.86 Billion in Improvements to Sewer System (Environmental and Natural Resources Division)

The city of Indianapolis has agreed to make an estimated $1.86 billion worth of improvements to resolve longstanding problems with overflows from its sewer system, the Justice Department and Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) announced today. Indianapolis will make the improvements over 20 years to reduce the number of overflows—which currently occur approximately 60 times per year—to four or fewer times per year. The city will also pay a penalty of $1,117,800, which will be divided evenly between the United States and Indiana. The city also will spend $2 million on a supplemental environmental project to eliminate failing septic systems.

Talking Points:

- With today's consent decree, the city of Indianapolis is taking an important step toward complying with the Clean Water Act.

- The Department is pleased that we have reached a resolution to these matters, and the city has agreed to make the necessary improvements and committed funds to ensure significant improvements to reduce untreated sewer discharges.

DOJ Inspector General Report Alleges that Prisons Not Effectively Monitoring Terrorists' Mail (Bureau of Prisons)

Today, numerous media outlets including The Associated Press, USA Today, and The Washington Post published stories on a DOJ Inspector General report which alleges that mail for convicted terrorists and other dangerous federal inmates isn't being fully read by prison authorities, posing a risk to national security. The Bureau of Prisons issued a statement in responding to the allegations this afternoon.

Talking Points:

- The most dangerous and sophisticated inmates are housed in the most restrictive conditions allowed in order to ensure that they cannot influence others or use other inmates to send or receive messages.

- We are continually reviewing our procedures to ensure that not only are high risk individuals housed safely and securely but that other inmates, our staff and the public are protected from them.

- To implement these recommendations system-wide will require significant additional resources, primarily staff. The Bureau will pursue the necessary resources through the Federal budget process.

- We appreciate the Office of the Inspector General's very candid report and will ensure that the report's recommendations are acted upon as soon as possible.

Another Louisiana Man Pleads Guilty To FEMA Fraud (USAO–Eastern District of Louisiana)

Jermaine White, of Gray, La., pleaded guilty to making false statements regarding his application to the Federal Emergency Management Association (FEMA) for disaster assistance benefits, announced U.S. Attorney Jim Letten of the Eastern District of Louisiana. According to the factual basis, after Hurricane Katrina struck Louisiana, White applied for expedited assistance funds from FEMA, the $2,000 which many evacuees received from FEMA. White indicated in his application that his primary address was a home located in Houma, La. that he had essential needs for "food, clothing or shelter," and that he had "disaster related moving and storage expenses," when in truth he never occupied or rented this rental property. According to the owner of the property, the home was vacant and was not leased to anyone during Hurricanes Katrina or Rita.

Nightline* Interviews FBI Assistant Director Burrus (FBI)

Today, Eileen Murphy, a Producer for ABC News' Nightline program interviewed Chip Burrus, FBI Assistant Director for the Criminal Investigative Division, regarding FBI efforts to combat mortgage fraud. It is unclear when the story will run.

THURSDAY'S EXPECTED EVENTS/RELEASES:

9:15 A.M. CDT	Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will deliver remarks at the annual conference of the U.S. Business Leadership Network, immediately followed by a media availability. Marriott City Center The Ballroom 30 South Seventh Street Minneapolis, Minn. OPEN PRESS
9:00 A.M. PDT	Regina Schofield, Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Justice Programs, will deliver keynote remarks regarding Department activities in Indian Country at the National Congress of American Indians Annual Conference. Sheraton Grand Sacramento 1230 J Street Sacramento, Calif. OPEN PRESS

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, October 5, 2006 8:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, October 05, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061005.pdf; dojclips061005.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 5, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Court Allows Bush Administration To Continue Warrantless Surveillance Program During Appeal (AP) 6
Federal Wiretapping Program To Continue During Court Challenge (DEN) 6
Wiretap Program Allowed During Appeal (WT) 7
Eavesdropping Will Continue During Appeal (FREEP) 7
Man Linked To Sears Tower Plot Working On Weapons Plea Deal (AP) 8
Toledo Terrorist Suspect El-Hindi Will Remain Behind Bars (TOLB) 9
Al-Qaeda's Far-Reaching New Partner (WP) 9
In 30-Year-Old Terror Case, A Test For The U.S. (WP) 12
NY Judge Suggests Ashcroft, Mueller May Remain In Lawsuit (AP) 14
Judges Zero In On Treatment Of A Detainee (NYT) 15
U.S. Seeks Immunity In 9/11 Detention Case (LAW) 16
Security At Supermax Slammed In Fed Report (RMN) 18
Waterboarding Historically Controversial (WP) 20
Claims And Counterclaims (WSJ) 21

Homeland Response:

Closing The Books On Dubai Ports (HILL) 22
The Politics Of Ports (WSJ) 24
EU Considering Sanctions On U.S. Over Visa (UPI) 25

War News:

GOP Lawmaker Calls For Rumsfeld To Quit (AP) 25
Kerry Vs. Frist (WT) 26
Cabinet Cleaning Long Overdue: Bush Should Heed Advice Of Departed Chief Of Staff (BOSH) 27
Rumsfeld Soldiers On Despite Criticism (AP) 27
U.S. European Commander Confirms Quotes In Book (WP) 28
Imperfect Picture Of Rumsfeld At War (FT) 29
Sad Choice On Security: GOP Arrogance Vs. Democratic Weakness (RC) 30
The Ghost Of The Oval Office (NYT) 32
Tenet's Coming Memoirs (WT) 33
Attacks In Baghdad Kill 13 U.S. Soldiers In 3 Days (WP) 34
Fight To Clear Baghdad Of Insurgents Gets Fiercer (USAT) 36
Baghdad Bombings Hit "All-time High" (WT) 36
Iraqis Suspend Police Brigade (LAT) 37
Iraq Suspends Police Brigade In Baghdad (NYT) 39
Iraq Pulls A Police Brigade For Alleged Involvement In Death Squads (MCT) 41
Iraq Pulls Police Brigade Out Of Service (AP) 42
Military Hones A New Strategy On Insurgency (NYT) 43
"Just A Comma" Becomes Part Of Iraq Debate (WP) 45
Troops Polled Say Armed Forces Stretched Too Thin Overseas (PPG) 46
Congress Sets Aside $20M For Wars' Ends (AP) 47
Behind The Victory Money Lies Vietnam (NYT) 48
The Hunt Continues (NSWK) 48
Not Guilty Pleas From 2 Marines In Iraqi's Death (WP) 49
Uncertainty, Violence Darken Afghans' Hope (USAT) 50
Reconstruction Seen Key To U.S. Exit (WT) 53
Kerry Chides Frist For Taliban Comments (AP) 54

Corporate Scandals:

HP Insiders Indicted In Corporate Spy Scandal (LAT) 54
Dunn Charged Over HP Leaks (FT) 55
Dunn, Four Others Charged In Hewlett Surveillance Case (WP) 55
California Charges Dunn, 4 Others In H-P Scandal (WSJ) 57
HP Scandal May See Felony Charges (USAT) 59
Ex-Leader Among 5 Charged In Hewlett Case (NYT) 60
Investigations Continue At HP (USAT) 62
California Attorney General Charges HP Insiders, Detectives In Spy Probe (FINDLAW/AP) 63
Ex-Hewlett-Packard Chair Dunn Charged In Leak Case (Update9) (BLOOM) 64

Five Indicted In HP Scandal, But Former GC Escapes Charges (LAW) ... 66
Jobs Knew Apple Manipulated Some Option Grants (WSJ) .. 68
Jobs Didn't Know Of Stock Options' Accounting Issues (USAT) ... 69
Apple Says Jobs Knew Of Options (NYT) ... 70
Apple CEO Apologizes In Options Scandal (WP) ... 71
Apple Presents Stock Option Findings To Feds (LAW) ... 72
Lay's Lawyers Want Judge's Ruling To Wipe Record Clean (HC) ... 73
Judge Orders Ex-Kmart Execs To Trial (FINDLAW/AP) ... 73

Criminal Law:

Order On Documents Signals Justice Dept. May Pursue Foley (WP) ... 74
DOJ Asks House To Preserve Foley Materials (RC) ... 75
Foley's Ex-aide Resigns; Probe Intensifies (AP) ... 77
Investigators To House: Keep Foley Documents (CNN) ... 78
NATIONAL Foley Probe Shifts Into Higher Gear, But Not In Florida (SCRIPPS) ... 80
Justice Department Asks House To Preserve Foley Office Records (BLOOM) ... 81
FBI's Foley Case Eyes Legal 'Gray Area' (AP-Y) ... 82
Legal Case Against Foley Could Be Tricky To Build (LAT) ... 83
Foley's Actions May Not Be Crime At Federal Level (WSJ) ... 84
E-mails To Teens Said To Fall In Gray Area Of Law (FLSUNSEN) ... 85
Ethics Panel Faces Decisions Over Foley (AP-Y) ... 86
McCain Calls For Investigation Of Complaints About Foley (AP) ... 87
Aide Says He Reported Foley 3 Years Ago (AP-Y) ... 88
House Aide's Resignation Adds To Focus On Timing Of Warnings (WSJ) ... 89
Ex-Foley Aide: Tip Given 2 Years Ago (USAT) ... 90
Senior Congressional Aide Questions Hastert Timeline (LAT) ... 91
Ex-Foley Aide Roils Timeline (RC) ... 93
Hastert Faces Increased Pressure To Resign (MCT) ... 95
The Price Of Foley (NATLRVW) ... 96
Rift Among GOP Leaders (HILL) ... 97
Majority Whip Slams Handling Of Foley Scandal (WT) ... 99
Longtime Republican Was Source Of E-mails (HILL) ... 100
Early Warning On Foley Cited By Former Aide (NYT) ... 102
Foley Allegedly Had Shown Up Drunk At Dorm (AZREP) ... 103
A Complex And Hidden Life Behind Foley's Public Persona (NYT) ... 104
Assertion By Foley Angers Victims Of Abuse By Clergymen (NYT) ... 107
Getting Beyond Foley (WSJ) ... 107
Real Scandals, And Fake Ones (NYT) ... 109
The Warning Signs About Hastert's Leadership Were There October 5, 2006 (RC) ... 109
A Tear In Our Fabric (NYT) ... 111
An Amish Community Grieves For Its Little Ones (WP) ... 112
Amish School Survivors Struggle After Killings (NYT) ... 114
Shooter's Relatives: No Recall Of Being Molested (USAT) .. 115
Kin Say Amish Gunman Didn't Molest Them (FINDLAW/AP) 116
Schools On Guard After Recent Shootings (WP) ... 117
Bush Offers Sympathy To Keyeses, Vows To Address Problem (DENP) ... 118
Spellings Say Religious Leaders Will Have Role At Conference (AP) ... 119
Pellet Gun Leaves 6 Hurt At Md. School (FINDLAW/AP) ... 119
When Schools Turn Deadly (BOS) ... 120
Justice Dept. Aims To Block Taiwan In Spy Probe (NYS) ... 120
Fee-office Inquiry Yields No Charges (KCS) ... 121
Expert: Internet Ban A Boon To Gambling Industry (AP) ... 122
Law Is Unlikely To Corral Internet Gambling (WSJ) ... 123
Earth Liberation Front Members Plead Guilty In 2001 Firebombing (SEATT) ... 124
2 Plead Guilty In UW Arson (SEAPI) ... 126
2 Women Plead Guilty In UW Ecoterrorism (AP) ... 127
Seattle Woman Pleads Guilty In 2001 UW Firebombing Attack (AP) ... 128
Pressure Builds In Probe Of Bryant (PHI) ... 129
2 More Plead In A.C. Corruption Case (AP) ... 129
Two Atlantic City Councilmen Plead Guilty To Bribery (PAC) 130
Two More Plead In A.C. Corruption Case (PHI) ... 130
3rd Prison Guard Pleads Guilty In Sex-for-contraband Scandal That Ended In Florida Shootout (AP) ... 131
Judge Won't Throw Out Porn Case Against Karr (WP/AP) ... 131
Parents Of 21-year-old Charged With Kidnapping Bride-to-be (USAT) ... 132
Limited Duty, Full-Time Pay (WP) ... 133

Civil Law:

Privacy Group Sues FBI (AP-YBIZ) ... 136
Feds Recoup Nearly $1.5 Billion In Fraud Cases (HILL) ... 137
U.S. To Stop Seizing Prescription Drugs Imported For Personal Use (WP) ... 138
Election Commission Alters Rule On Money Used For Recounts (NYT/AP) ... 139

DOJ_NMG_0074951

Civil Rights:

2 Plead Guilty In Fatal Cuban Migrant Smuggling Case (FINDLAW/AP)....140
Utah To Receive $900,000 To Combat Human Trafficking (DESERET)....140
Charges In Fatal Arrest Involving Seven (AP)....141
Race Cited As Boys Town Barrier (WT)....142
LULAC Investigates Man's Arrest (ARN)....143
Court Filing Says Worley Not Cooperating On Voter Project (AP)....143
Group Honors Noted Crusader Against Quotas (NYT)....145
City Council To Settle 6 Lawsuits Against LAPD For Nearly $3.6 Million (LAT)....145
Governor Declares State Of Emergency For Calif. Prisons (LAT)....146
Poor, Black And Dumped On (NYT)....147
Censoring Ourselves Is No Way To Fight Terrorism (LAT)..148

Antitrust:

Court Weighs MedImmune Bid To Sue Genentech Over Patent (WSJ)....149
MedImmune Asks For Right To Sue (WP)....150
Supreme Court Hears Biotech Patent Case (AP-YBIZ)....151
Shaw Group Pays For Westinghouse Stake (AP-Y)....152
EU Pledges More Trade Deals (AP)....153
Op-ed: Eurocrats' Anti-competitive Agenda (WT)....154
GM Ends Renault-Nissan Alliance Talks (FT)....155
G.M.'s Talks On A Partner Fall Apart (NYT)....156
How Wagoner Wins As Ghosn Alliance Talks Fail (WSJ)....158
GM Won't Join Nissan, Renault (WP)....159
GM Drops Alliance Talks Over Lack Of Compensation (USAT)....160
VW Buys Stake In Rival MAN, Girding For Tie-Up (WSJ)....161
With Vista, Microsoft Gets Tough On Piracy (WP/AP)....162

Environment/Indian Affairs:

FBI Executes Search Warrants On California Spinach Companies (MCT)....163
2 Produce-Packing Plants Searched In Spinach Probe (WP)164
FBI Seeks E. Coli Clues At 2 Produce Firms (LAT)....165
Agents Search 2 Spinach Facilities (USAT)....165
US Opens Criminal Inquiry On Health Measures Taken By Spinach Growers (NYT)....166
FBI, FDA Search Spinach Facilities In E. Coli Probe (Update1) (BLOOM)....167
2 Firms Searched In FBI Spinach Probe (FINDLAW/AP)....168
BP Takes Royalty Fight To Court (AP)....169
GAO: Feds Lose Money On Salvage Logging (AP-Y)....170
Interior Dept. Reports Computer Abuse (AP-Y)....171
Pollution Investigation Scours The Toilets Of The Upper Crust (USAT/AP)....171
House Panel Prods EPA To Speed Probe Of Pollutants, Abnormal Fish (WP)....172
CAHOKIA: Suit Seeks Payback For Landfill Cleanup (SLPD)173
Topping 2006 Ballots: Eminent Domain (CSM)....173
Federal Court Dismisses Suit On Navajo Employment Preferences (AP)....175

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Bonds' Trainer May Get Out Of Prison (AP)....175
BALCO Chemist Subpoenaed (CNN)....176
Feds Raid Bay Area Pot Clubs (KGO)....177
California: Marijuana Seized (NYT)....177
MARIJUANA RAID DEFENDANTS APPEAR IN U.S. COURT (BCN)....177
Agents Raid Medical Marijuana Dispensary (KCAL)....178
Police Raid Local Legal Marijuana Dispensary (KESQ)....178
DEA Raid Of Palm Springs Caregivers (DS)....178
Carmi Man Sentenced For Role In Meth Conspiracy; Springerton Man Pleads (CT)....179
Bikers Arrested On Drug Charges (FREEP)....180
22 Charged And Dozens Of Weapons Seized In Crackdown Of Motorcycle Gang (DN)....180
Kiel In Practice (AP)....181
Kiel Pleads Not Guilty In Drug Case; Feds Hint Drugs Stolen (SDUT)....181
Baltimore Has A New Way To Treat Heroin Addicts (USAT)182
Baltimore To Train Doctors In Addiction Treatment (AP)....183
Colombia Asks US To Extend Trade Preferences (WSJ/DJ)183
Two Sides To Body Search (KNOXNS)....184
Strip Search Leads To Calls For Dept. Of Justice Investigation (WATE-TV)....185
Community Members Voice Concerns Over Suspect's Arrest In East Knoxville (WBIR-TV)....186
"Outrageous Stripping Of Dignity"? (WVLT-TV)....187
NYPD On Alert Over World's Smallest Gun (WABC-TV)....187
Five Arrested For Gun Sales At Flea Market (AP)....188
Beer Drinkers Beware: 4 Percent Of U.S. Hops Crop Burns (AP)....188

Immigration:

Bush's Megaphone Unable To Reach Above The Din (NYT)189
Bush Throws Red Meat To Faithful In Red State (MINNST)190
Bush Ties Campaign To National Security (AP-Y)....191

DOJ_NMG_0074952

Bush Signs Homeland Security Bill (AP-Y).....191
Bush Signs The Fence Bill (WT).....192
Bush Speaks In PV At GOP Fund-raiser (AZREP).....193
Bush Gaffe Points To Munsil's Lack Of Name Recognition (PBJ).....194
Did Bush's California Visit Shore Up Safe Members? (RC) .195

Tax:

2nd Circuit Grants Stay In KPMG Trial Over Legal Fees (LAW).....196

Congress-Administration:

Lawmaker Defends Page Program (CHIT).....196
Ally Calls For Hastert To Suspend Page Program (WT).....198
LaHood: Send The Pages Home (RC).....199
Alumni Of Page Program Emerge As Some Of Its Biggest Defenders (WSJ).....200
A Page Protection Act: The Path To Saving A Historic Program (RC).....201
Energy Dept. Scales Back Polygraph Tests (AP).....203
Jobs Search Process Frustrates Many Young Recruits (WP)204
A Blow To Labor (WP).....205
Not Separate, But Ecumenical (LAT).....205
The Irony Of NASA's Nobel (NYT).....206

Other News:

Wall St Rally Sends Dow To Record Close (FT).....206
Shares Surge Amid Hopes For Lower Rates (NYT/BLOOM)207
Blue Chips Hit Another Record, Climb Past 11850 (WSJ)....208
Dow Bounds To Another High, Inspiring Other Indexes (USAT).....209
Dow Blasts Beyond Record-High Close (WP/AP).....210
Wall Street's New High Buoys Main Street (CSM).....211
Industrials Revolution (WSJ).....212
Fed Chairman Urges Entitlement Program Reforms (MCT)212
Bernanke: Savings Situation Getting Dire (USAT).....213
Fed Chiefs See 'correction' In US Housing (FT).....214
Bernanke Expects Housing Slide To Rein In Second-Half Growth (WSJ).....215
Housing Correction Worries Fed (USAT).....217
Housing Hurts, Bernanke Says (WP).....217
Fed Chief Says Housing Is In A 'Correction' (NYT/BLOOM) 218
Gasoline Prices Could Fall More (WSJ).....219
Opec Set To Back Production Cut (FT).....221
Grandparents Enrich Kids (USAT).....222
How Can The Democrats NOT Win The House ... And The Senate? (RC).....222
GOP Forced Off Issues It Wants To Run On (USAT).....223
Democrats Hop On Foley Scandal (SPTIMES).....225
Analysis:Democrats Not Charging Ahead (AP-Y).....226
GOP Mishandled Crisis Management, Say Experts (HILL)..227
What Goeth Before The Fall (WP).....229
Dumping The GOP Too Facile (SEAPI).....230
Ballot Battle Brews Over Foley's GOP Replacement (MH)...231
McHenry Seeks Sworn Dem Account (HILL).....232
Washington Wire (WSJ).....233
Lieberman Assails Lamont Over Commitment To Israel (NYT).....237
Murtha Accused Of Bribe Cover-up (WT).....238
Rep. Sherwood Apologizes In Ad (HILL).....239
Long Odds (WSJ).....239
McCain Allies Plot For 2008 (RC).....240
Is Obama Ready To Roll? (NSWK).....241
Of Pain And Campaigns (WP).....242
Feingold Puckers Up To 527s (RC).....245
City Considers Plan To Let Outsiders Run Schools (NYT)...246
At Harvard, Religion Course May Be Required (WSJ).....248
The Reliable Source (WP).....249
Buchanan's Favorite Tactic: Immigration Fear-mongering (USAT).....249
Deeper And Deeper (NYT).....250
Schwarzenegger's Cynicism On HIV Prevention (LAT).....251
Pyongyang Warned On Weapon Testing (WP).....251
U.S. Sternly Warns North Korea Not To Conduct A Nuclear Test (NYT).....252
N Korean Nuclear Test 'just Matter Of Time' (FT).....253
Warnings To Pyongyang Underline Global Concern (FT)...255
Seoul Continues Outreach To North Korea (WSJ).....255
Abe Aims To Flex Japan's Muscles (WSJ).....256
Asia Confronts North Korea On Nuke Test (AP).....257
U.S. Asks U.N. To Condemn Threat (WT).....259
Security Council Mulls Response To North Korea Nuclear Test Threat (AFP-Y).....260
What If North Korea Tests A Nuclear Bomb? (CSM).....261
Answering North Korea (WP).....263
The North Korea Nuclear Puzzle (LAT).....263
Pyongyang Phooey (WSJ).....264
Mistrust Set To Scupper Iran Talks (FT).....265
Iran: Sanctions Won't Derail Enrichment (AP).....266
U.S., Europe Seek Sanctions Against Iran (MCT).....268
New Nuclear Debate In Iran (NYT).....269
Rice Cites Concern For Palestinians, But Low Expectations Mark Visit (WP).....270

DOJ_NMG_0074953

Abbas Says Talks With Hamas On Unity Government Falter (NYT) 271
Rice Bolsters Abbas Amid Palestinian Crisis (FT) 272
Palestinian Unity Talks Collapse (AP) 273
Rice, Abbas Discuss Ways To Ease Crisis In Middle East (USAT) 274
Rice: U.S. Wants To Help Palestinians (AP) 275
Rice Focuses On Small Steps To Mideast Peace (LAT) 276
Abbas Declares Failure Of Talks With Hamas (WT) 278
Frustration As U.S.-India Nuke Deal Languishes (HILL) 279
Moscow Takes Harsh Action Against Georgia (WT/AP) 280
Dispute With Russia Threatens Georgia (NYT) 281
Turkish Hijacker Acted Alone, Officials Say, Rejecting A Larger Plot (NYT) 282
Commission Says I.R.A. Has Halted Terror Activity (NYT) 283
Report Says IRA Has Ended Paramilitary Activity (FT) 284
IRA Ends Terrorism, Panel Finds (WT/AP) 284
Panel Says IRA Has Halted Terrorism (USAT) 285
IRA No Longer Terror Threat, Monitors Say (LAT) 286
Nations To Form Land-Mine Removal Center (AP) 287

DOJ_NMG_0074954

TERRORISM NEWS:

Court Allows Bush Administration To Continue Warrantless Surveillance Program During Appeal (AP)

By Dan Sewell, Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

CINCINNATI – The Bush administration can continue its warrantless surveillance program while it appeals a judge's ruling that the program is unconstitutional, a federal appeals court ruled Wednesday.

The president has said the program is needed in the war on terrorism; opponents argue it oversteps constitutional boundaries on free speech, privacy and executive powers.

The unanimous ruling from a three-judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals gave little explanation for the decision. In the three-paragraph ruling, judges said that they balanced the likelihood an appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides and the public interest.

The Bush administration applauded the decision.

"We are pleased to see that it will be allowed to continue while the Court of Appeals examines the trial court's decision, with which we strongly disagree," Deputy White House press secretary Dana Perino said in a statement.

The program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people the government suspects have terrorist links. A secret court has been set up to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the government says it can't always wait for a court to take action.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled Aug. 17 that the program was unconstitutional because it violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers.

The Justice Department had urged the appeals court to allow it to keep the program in place while it argues its appeal, claiming that the nation faced "potential irreparable harm" and would be more vulnerable to a terrorist attack. The appeal is likely to take months.

"This program is both critical to preventing terrorist attacks and fully consistent with law," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

The American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit in January seeking to stop the program on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say it has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets. Many said they had been forced to take expensive and time-consuming overseas trips because their contacts wouldn't speak openly on the phone or because they didn't want to violate their contacts' confidentiality.

The ACLU contends that the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which set up the secret court to grant warrants for such surveillance, gave the government enough tools to monitor suspected terrorists.

"We are confident that when the 6th Circuit addresses the merits of this case, it will agree that warrantless wiretapping of Americans violates the law and is unconstitutional," Melissa Goodman, an ACLU attorney, said in a news release.

Similar lawsuits challenging the program have been filed by other groups, including in New York and San Francisco. The issue could wind up before the U.S. Supreme Court.

On the Net:

6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals: www.ca6.uscourts.gov

Taylor's ruling: www.mied.uscourts.gov/eGov/taylorpdf/06%2010204.pdf

Information on the case from the ACLU: www.aclu.org/nsaspying

National Security Agency: www.nsa.gov

Federal Wiretapping Program To Continue During Court Challenge (DEN)

DOJ_NMG_0074955

Detroit News, October 5, 2006

President Bush's Terrorist Surveillance Program may continue while the courts decide whether it violates the U.S. Constitution, a federal appeals court ruled today.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor ruled the eavesdropping program unconstitutional on Aug. 17, but issued a short-term stay to give the government time to appeal.

Last Thursday, Taylor said her stay would expire this week unless the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals, which will review her ruling on the program's constitutionality, extends the stay. On Wednesday, as expected, the appeals court did so.

The appeal of the ruling itself has not yet been heard.

The program allows the National Security Agency to obtain wiretaps of calls into and out of the United States without first obtaining warrants from judges.

"I wouldn't read too much into it," ACLU Michigan director Kary Moss said of today's decision. "We feel that the judge (Taylor) wrote a good opinion and we will be in a very strong position moving forward."

Anthony Coppolino, a lawyer with the Justice Department in Washington, D.C., had argued that ending the program would put the country at greater risk of a terrorist attack by al-Qaida. He did not return a telephone call today seeking comment.

You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

Wiretap Program Allowed During Appeal (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

President Bush's terrorist surveillance program can continue while the Justice Department appeals a lower-court ruling that deemed the warrantless wiretapping operation unconstitutional, a federal appeals court said yesterday.

Mr. Bush has called the program essential to the global war against terror. Congress adjourned last week for the November elections before approving legislation that would allow the surveillance.

Critics argue that the program violates several constitutional rights, including free speech and privacy, and breaches limits on executive powers.

A three-judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati yesterday ruled that the program can continue pending an appeal. The three-paragraph ruling said the judges balanced the likelihood that the appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides of the dispute, and the public interest.

Established in 2002 and reauthorized more than 30 times, the program targets U.S. phone calls and electronic correspondence that involve known terrorists abroad.

On Aug. 17, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled the program unconstitutional, setting off a fierce debate on Capitol Hill. Mr. Bush, who is focusing his campaign speeches across the country on national security issues, demanded that lawmakers move swiftly to authorize the program, which he said has proved its value repeatedly.

The Justice Department urged the appeals court to allow the program to continue during the legal process, claiming "potential irreparable harm" to the nation if the surveillance is abandoned.

"The country will be more vulnerable to a terrorist attack," the government motion said, asking the appeals court to overrule the lower court. The U.S. District Court ruling barred the government from using the surveillance program "in any way, including, but not limited to, conducting warrantless wiretaps of telephone and internet communications."

The appeal is likely to take months. The 6th Circuit Court judges said the Justice Department met the standard for continuing the program by arguing that it prevents national harm.

The program, monitored by lawmakers from both parties, has been under scrutiny since the New York Times revealed its existence in December.

Critics say the Bush administration should work through a court set up for such cases, established under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. The administration says that court cannot always act quickly enough.

After the program was revealed, the American Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit seeking to end it.

Eavesdropping Will Continue During Appeal (FREEP)

DOJ_NMG_0074956

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, October 5, 2006

Ruling against spying is on hold

The Bush administration's warrantless domestic spying program can continue until a federal appeals court reviews a Detroit judge's decision to scrap the program as unconstitutional.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati on Wednesday granted the Justice Department's request for a stay of U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's Aug. 17 decision to halt the program.

The appeals judges -- Alice Batchelder, Ronald Gilman and Julia Gibbons -- said in a two-page order that they issued the stay after balancing the likelihood of the government winning its appeal against the harm to the parties and the public interest.

Michigan ACLU Director Kary Moss said she wasn't surprised by the decision.

"I wouldn't read too much into it," she said. "It's very common that an appellate court would want to preserve the status quo on an important case until they've had a chance to review all of the briefs."

There was no immediate comment from the Justice Department on Wednesday.

The ACLU sued the government in January on behalf of scholars, lawyers, nonprofit groups and journalists who said the NSA program had disrupted their ability to confer with clients, conduct research and engage in advocacy. They asked Taylor to declare the program unconstitutional.

Taylor agreed, ruling in August that the program usurped the power of Congress by eavesdropping without first obtaining warrants from the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court in Washington, D.C.

The 1978 law that created the court gives the administration the authority to perform electronic surveillance for up to 15 days without requesting a warrant, or up to a year if the attorney general certifies in writing and under oath that the surveillance is directed solely at a foreign power. The law also lowered the amount of evidence required to get a warrant.

The Bush administration says its surveillance program is a vital tool in the war on terror.

It was created after the 9/11 terrorist attacks and monitors phone calls and e-mail to and from the United States involving terrorism suspects and activities.

The Justice Department appealed Taylor's decision to the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Last week, Taylor agreed to postpone enforcement of her injunction for seven days so the Justice Department could try to obtain a longer delay from the appeals court.

The Justice Department urged the appeals court to allow the program to continue while the case is on appeal, saying that without the program, the nation would be more vulnerable to terrorist attack.

Man Linked To Sears Tower Plot Working On Weapons Plea Deal (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, October 5, 2006

MIAMI - A Chicago man with ties to a group accused of seeking to join al-Qaida and plotting to blow up the Sears Tower and other buildings is working with prosecutors on a possible plea agreement to federal weapons charges.

Sultan Khanbey, 51, was a leader in Chicago of the Moorish Science Temple religious sect and is heard on FBI tapes as telling the alleged Miami plot's ringleader that he hoped to enlist 10,000 people into a "Moorish nation," wearing green-and-black uniforms, to bring about revolution in the United States.

Khanbey, who was born Charles Stewart, is charged with illegal possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. Court records show he was convicted of rape in 1977 and attempted murder in 1973.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke scheduled a change of plea hearing Wednesday for Khanbey, but it was postponed until Oct. 25 to give more time for details of a plea agreement to be worked out, prosecutors said. Cooke said by then both sides should "be on the same sheet of music" in the case.

The gun charge arose from Khanbey's alleged connections to the seven men arrested in June in the terror plot, which authorities acknowledge never got beyond the early planning stage. Khanbey has previously told investigators he knew about the plot and might cooperate with prosecutors in that case.

The purported ringleader, Narseal Batiste, headed a Miami chapter of the Moorish Science Temple sect and had known Khanbey when both lived in Chicago, authorities have said.

A lengthy document filed by Khanbey in federal court discusses the sect's philosophy, including claims that U.S. laws and documents are "bogus and fraudulent" and that the ultimate goal of African-American people should be to "break free of the iron hand of the United States yoke and laws."

Khanbey came to the FBI's attention when he was invited to come to Miami last spring to discuss Batiste's plans, but a rift occurred between the two after Khanbey become suspicious that the FBI had infiltrated the Miami group, according to court documents.

On April 19, Khanbey conducted a "trial" at the group's warehouse headquarters in the Liberty City neighborhood to expel Batiste from the Moorish organization, federal prosecutors say. That same day in a heated argument, Khanbey fired a shot from a 9mm handgun past the ear of a self-described spiritual missionary and longtime Batiste adviser who uses the name Master G.J.G Atheea.

The handgun, it turned out, belonged to another member of the group, Lyglenson Lemorin, according to court documents. Khanbey had previously said the gun discharged accidentally when he was attempting to unload it.

Batiste, Lemorin and five others remain jailed without bail on charges of terror conspiracy and material support, which authorities have said included planning for attacks on the Sears Tower and government buildings in Miami, Washington and elsewhere. All have pleaded not guilty, with trial scheduled to begin March 5.

Their arrests were based on information obtained by two FBI informants, including one man of Middle Eastern descent who pretended to be an al-Qaida operative.

Toledo Terrorist Suspect El-Hindi Will Remain Behind Bars (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), October 5, 2006

A federal judge this afternoon denied a request for bond from terrorist suspect Marwan Othman El-Hindi, who took the stand in U.S. District Court in Toledo to make a plea for his own release.

Judge James Carr denied the request after hearing from Mr. El-Hindi and other witnesses during a court proceeding that spanned nearly four hours. Mr. El-Hindi pointed to his community involvement as a reason he should be released on bond while he awaits trial.

His attorneys were seeking his release on $20,000 bond. Mr. El-Hindi is currently incarcerated at the federal prison in Milan, Mich.

Mr. El-Hindi is charged along with Toledoan Mohammad Zaki Amawi and Sylvania resident Wassim I. Mazloum with conspiring to kill or injure U.S. troops and others in the Middle East and with providing the "support and resources" to do so. Mr. Amawi was also charged with twice threatening President Bush and with distributing bomb-making information. If convicted, they face a maximum of life in prison.

Attorneys Steve Hartman and Chuck Boss put El-Hindi's wife, Marwa Aboud, on the stand as she would have been the custodian for her husband if he was released. Wearing a burqa that covered everything but her eyes, she testified that six of Mr. El-Hindi's children by other marriages are now in New York, but the couple has a 14-month old daughter in Toledo.

A friend of Mr. El-Hindi, Muwahhid Adil of Toledo, testified that he has known the defendant about 14 years. The two met at an Islamic conference in Chicago.

Al-Qaeda's Far-Reaching New Partner (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

PARIS -- In a video released last month on the Internet, al-Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, declared that he had "great news." Al-Qaeda, he reported, had joined forces with an obscure Algerian underground network and would work in tandem with the group to "crush the pillars of the crusader alliance."

The Algerian partner, the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, had fought the Algerian government in a barbaric civil war for almost a decade. But Zawahiri said the new alliance had different targets in mind. "Our brothers," he said, "will be a thorn in the necks of the American and French crusaders and their allies, and a dagger in the hearts of the French traitors and apostates."

DOJ_NMG_0074958

Zawahiri's statement was the latest sign of how, with al-Qaeda's help, the Algerian network has rapidly transformed itself from a local group devoted solely to seizing power at home into a global threat with cells and operations far from North Africa.

Since 2003, the group known by its French initials GSPC has emerged as an umbrella for radical Islamic factions in neighboring countries, sponsoring training camps in the Sahara and supplying streams of fighters to wars in Iraq and Chechnya, according to counterterrorism officials and analysts in Europe and North Africa.

The network also has planted deep roots in Europe. In the past year, authorities have broken up cells in France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Switzerland, including one group that allegedly plotted to shoot down an Israeli airliner in Geneva.

On Sept. 1, the French Anti-Terrorist Coordination Unit issued a statement classifying the group as "one of the most serious threats currently facing France," Algeria's former colonial master. Ten days later, the assessment was given fresh urgency by Zawahiri's videotape, timed for the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. In it, he noted that Osama bin Laden, al-Qaeda's founder, had given his personal approval to the "blessed union" between the Algerian network and al-Qaeda.

Responding to Zawahiri's declaration, French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin said there was a "real and permanent" risk to France, in part because of its military involvement in Lebanon and Afghanistan, as well as its policy of forbidding Muslim girls to wear head scarves in public schools.

Pierre de Bousquet de Florian, the head of France's domestic intelligence service, added: "For our Islamist adversaries, our country is frankly in the Western camp -- the 'crusaders' in their words -- and we will be spared nothing."

Overcoming Differences

Al-Qaeda forged its alliance with the GSPC in spite of a long history of feuding with Algerian radicals.

The Algerian conflict, which has claimed an estimated 200,000 lives since 1991, at first attracted enthusiastic support from Islamic radicals around the world, including Zawahiri and other future al-Qaeda leaders. They sent money, fighters and supplies to the guerrillas, seeing the war as an opportunity to replace Algeria's secular, military-backed government with a fundamentalist Islamic state.

But their zeal was shaken when Algerian rebels led by another terrorist network, the Armed Islamic Group, or GIA, began slaughtering thousands of civilians. The GIA subscribed to an Islamic ideology called takfir , a belief that any Muslim who does not embrace strict, medieval codes of conduct is an apostate deserving of death.

Bin Laden, who was living in Sudan at the time, believed that killing fellow Muslims was counterproductive. So he sent an emissary to Algeria to demand that the GIA change its approach and pledge loyalty to the fledgling al-Qaeda network, according to European intelligence officials. The GIA refused.

As the massacres continued, bin Laden's allies in London and elsewhere wrote scathing denunciations of the Algerian group, a rejection that persisted for years.

The Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat -- its name is derived from a branch of fundamentalist Islam -- was founded in 1998 by a splinter group of Algerian rebels who wanted to reduce the number of civilian massacres. It quickly eclipsed the GIA, but it still struggled to win support from abroad.

That started to change after al-Qaeda launched the Sept. 11 attacks. With its territorial base in Afghanistan in jeopardy, al-Qaeda's leadership began looking for safer places to relocate.

In the fall of 2001, according to French and Algerian officials, bin Laden dispatched a Yemeni deputy to Algeria for talks with the radical group. The emissary was reported killed in September 2002 by Algerian security services, but his presence in Algeria marked a turning point, they said.

"Until 2001, the GSPC wasn't trusted by the rest of the international jihad," said Louis Caprioli, former director of international counterterrorism for the DST, the French counterintelligence service. "That's when the GSPC started to become international. It used to be focused solely on Algeria."

On the second anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, a leader of the Algerian group posted a statement on the Internet pledging the group's allegiance to al-Qaeda for the first time, adding: "We strongly and fully support Osama bin Laden's jihad against the heretic America." In March 2005, a successor leader, Abu Musab Abdel Wadoud, issued a similar statement praising bin Laden.

DOJ_NMG_0074959

Until recently, al-Qaeda's leadership had offered cautious or tepid responses. In the summer of 2005, bin Laden referred to "our brothers" in the Algerian network in a long statement on audiotape, but otherwise has not publicly embraced the group.

It became clear, however, that an alliance could bring benefits to both sides, analysts said. If the Algerians could win al-Qaeda's endorsement, it would erase their network's pariah status in radical Islamic circles, making it easier to raise money and logistical support. In turn, al-Qaeda would gain a local affiliate and an operational foothold in North Africa.

"The leadership of al-Qaeda doesn't have a secure base left anywhere else in the world," said Liess Boukraa, a terrorism expert and author in Algiers. "So al-Qaeda needs the GSPC at the logistical level. The GSPC needs al-Qaeda at the ideological level."

Al-Qaeda has pursued this strategy in multiple Muslim countries, partnering with local underground groups in an effort to extend its name and influence. In Iraq, al-Qaeda teamed with Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's insurgent group, prevailing on him to change its name to al-Qaeda in Iraq. The Kurdish group Ansar al-Islam and various organizations in Kashmir have similar ties with bin Laden's movement.

Analysts said the shift by the Algerian organization toward a global strategy was a tacit admission that its original goal -- seizing power in its home country -- had failed. The network continues to attack government targets in Algeria almost weekly, but it has taken heavy losses in recent years and is confined to remote areas in the mountains and desert.

Estimates of the number of active GSPC members, who constitute almost all of the remaining fighters against the Algerian government, run from 500 to 1,200 -- a sharp drop from the 40,000 Islamic extremists who took up arms against the government in the 1990s.

Algerian Interior Minister Noureddine Yazid Zerhouni said last month that Algerian security forces had killed or captured 500 Islamic fighters over the past year. In addition, about 250 members of the GSPC and other extremists have accepted the Algerian government's offer of political amnesty under a national reconciliation program, he said.

Mounir Boudjema, an expert on Algerian terrorist groups and editor of the newspaper Liberte, said the Salafist radical group is weaker than ever at home.

"In terms of strategy, they have lost," Boudjema said in an interview in Algiers. "The population doesn't want to have them anymore. The people in the villages refuse to give them blankets or water or food. The whole logistical network is falling apart."Training and Support

Even as it struggles in Algeria, the GSPC has rapidly extended its reach elsewhere in North Africa.

With al-Qaeda's backing, the network has partnered with other radical groups, including extremists in Morocco, Libya, Tunisia and Mauritania, according to Arab and European counterterrorism officials. There was little overlap among such factions in the past, officials said, but now many have turned to the Algerians for training and support.

"The message we get is that al-Qaeda has given delegation to the GSPC to coordinate their operations in the Maghreb region," said Chakib Benmoussa, the Moroccan interior minister.

"Al-Qaeda's objective is to have a base in the region of the Sahel," he added, referring to the remote stretch of North Africa that borders the southern edge of the Sahara and covers such impoverished nations as Mali, Mauritania and Niger.

In June 2005, about 150 of the Algerian group's fighters from different countries attacked a Mauritanian military outpost, killing 15 soldiers. Another of its cells kidnapped 32 European tourists in the Sahara in 2003 and reportedly received a $5 million ransom from the German government for their release.

Counterterrorism officials said the network operates training camps in the Sahara and Sahel that cater to fighters from countries bordering Algeria, but also recruits from Europe. The camps are small and temporary, consisting of four-wheel-drive vehicles and a few instructors who teach bombmaking and guerrilla tactics, said a U.S. counterterrorism official who has studied the network and spoke on condition of anonymity.

"It's all mobile and on the run. They'll rendezvous in a wadi for four or five days, then disperse," the official said, using an Arabic word for a streambed that is usually dry. "We're very much concerned about it. It's more than just a few guys. If you add it up, it's a substantial number of folks."

DOJ_NMG_0074960

Many veterans of the North African camps have traveled to Iraq, where they make up one of the biggest contingents of foreign fighters battling U.S. and Iraqi forces, according to counterterrorism officials and analysts.

According to a study released in March by the Saudi National Security Assessment Project, an adviser to the Saudi government, North Africans make up about 30 percent of foreign fighters in Iraq, with 22 percent from Algeria alone. U.S. military officials and independent analysts said other estimates have shown somewhat lower numbers of North Africans, but agreed that Algerians and the Salafist group are playing key roles in the conflict.

"The GSPC, they saw the handwriting on the wall," the U.S. counterterrorism official said. "If they just stuck to fighting the Algerian government, all they would be is a minor thorn in their side. So they had to reach out."

In Europe, meanwhile, the group has revived dormant networks of Algerian radicals who emigrated after the outbreak of the civil war 15 years ago, counterterrorism officials said.

In 1994, Algerians from the GIA hijacked an Air France jet and planned to crash it into the Eiffel Tower, but a commando unit stormed the plane and rescued passengers. The next year, another GIA cell carried out bomb attacks on the Paris subway.

The same group planned attacks during the 1998 World Cup in France. But French police disrupted the plots and initiated a continent-wide round of arrests that effectively knocked out the organization on European soil.

In reconstituted form, the Algerian underground in Europe is no longer fighting solely for a national cause. That has enabled it to recruit large numbers of Tunisians, Moroccans, Syrians and other extremists who do not hold a stake in the Algerian conflict, said Xavier Raufer, a terrorism specialist at the University of Paris and a former French intelligence officer.

In July, for instance, German authorities arrested a 36-year-old man of Moroccan descent in the northern city of Kiel and charged him with recruiting fighters to go to Iraq. Prosecutors said he was a member of al-Qaeda and knew members of the Hamburg cell that carried out the Sept. 11 attacks. Last November he had traveled to Algeria to receive explosives training at a GSPC camp.

In March, eight Moroccans and a Tunisian were arrested in Casablanca and accused of planning attacks in Italy, with targets including a church in Bologna and the Milan subway system, Moroccan and Italian officials said. The cell was charged with working on behalf of the GSPC and taking orders from a deputy in Algeria.

Many of the Salafist group's foot soldiers in Europe have never been to Algeria, but are motivated to join the network because of Islamic anger over conflicts in Iraq, Afghanistan and Israel, Raufer said. "For them, it's an easy time," he said of the recruiters. "When they preach, a lot of people are furious. A lot of Muslims are outraged at what's going on."

In 30-Year-Old Terror Case, A Test For The U.S. (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

HAVANA -- A quarter-century before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, a bomb ripped a gash in a civilian jetliner in the skies off Barbados.

The Cubana Airlines plane plummeted into the Caribbean Sea just before noon on Oct. 6, 1976. All 73 people on board died, including teenage members of Cuba's national fencing team who were returning to Havana after winning gold and silver medals at a tournament in Venezuela.

The attack marked a new era of fear. It was the first act of midair airline terrorism in the Western Hemisphere.

The 30th anniversary of the bombing is Friday, and it coincides with a critical juncture in the case of Luis Posada Carriles, a main suspect in the bombing who has been held on immigration charges in the United States for the past 16 months.

Posada Carriles's legal odyssey has turned into a diplomatic quandary for the Bush administration and a test of the president's post-Sept. 11 credo that nations that harbor terrorists are guilty of terrorism. While the United States does not want to free a terrorism suspect, it is also reluctant to send him to Cuba or Venezuela, countries that not only remain hostile to the Bush administration but that, according to court testimony of a Posada Carriles ally, also might torture him.

Attorneys for the Justice Department must respond by Thursday to a Texas magistrate's recommendation that Posada Carriles be freed by a federal judge because he has not been officially designated a terrorist in the United States and cannot be held indefinitely on immigration charges.

DOJ_NMG_0074961

"This is the moment of truth for the Bush administration," said Peter Kornbluh, a senior Cuba analyst with the National Security Archive, a nonprofit research library at George Washington University.

The prospect of freeing Posada Carriles, who is also a suspect in a series of 1997 hotel bombings in Havana that left one Italian tourist dead, has outraged Cuban leaders. Havana is papered with Cuban government posters and billboards invoking President Bush's position on harboring terrorists.

"It's as if you were to say to the American people that country X has found Osama bin Laden, who arrived without a passport or a visa, and that he is being held as an illegal immigrant but will not be sent back to the U.S.," Ricardo AlarcÃ³n, president of Cuba's general assembly, said in an interview.

Posada Carriles, 78, sneaked into the United States in March 2005. He did little to hide his presence in Miami's exile community and joked about being recognized at doctors' appointments. He wasn't arrested until he gave a newspaper interview and appeared at a news conference in May 2005, moves that seemed to taunt law enforcement officials.

At the time of his arrest, Posada Carriles, who was born in Cienfuegos, Cuba, had spent more than four decades engaged in fruitless schemes to kill Cuban leader Fidel Castro and topple his government. The immigration judge who oversaw Posada Carriles's case said his history "reads like one of Robert Ludlum's espionage thrillers, with all the plot twists and turns Ludlum is famous for."

Posada Carriles was trained by the CIA, along with other Cuban exiles, for the botched Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961. He eventually made his way to Venezuela, where he became head of the secret police surveillance division.

Venezuelan officials later accused him of masterminding the Cubana bombing, which claimed the lives of 57 Cubans, as well as passengers from Guyana and North Korea. But he escaped from a Venezuelan prison in 1985 while prosecutors were appealing his acquittal in a military trial.

Since then, he has survived a 1990 assassination attempt, which scarred half his face, and has managed to wriggle out of legal trouble while on the run in Central America. He was arrested in 2000 in Panama for allegedly plotting to set off 30 pounds of explosives during a speech by Castro at the University of Panama, but the charges were dropped.

Posada Carriles's attorney has said that his client, who has a heart condition, no longer plans violence against the Castro government.

"The Cuban government is in a very deteriorated condition, inexorably reaching its end, and I sincerely believe that nothing would help to go back to the past with sabotage campaigns," Posada Carriles said in a statement released by his attorney.

U.S. officials see the aging Castro opponent as a more sinister figure. A field officer at the Department of Homeland Security who follows Posada Carriles's case described him as a "present danger to the community" whose "propensity to engage in terrorist activities poses a national security risk to the United States."

All of which makes the actions of the U.S. government in the case puzzling to critics, who say Posada Carriles should be prosecuted or at least confined to prison. Even some Cuba hard-liners in the United States confide privately that the case has turned into an embarrassment for the United States.

"They're just dancing around," Wayne Smith, a former head of the U.S. Interests Section in Havana and vocal critic of the Bush administration's Cuba policies, said of prosecutors. "They have all kinds of evidence against him."

It's clear that the U.S. government would prefer to make Posada Carriles someone else's problem. According to court documents, the Department of Homeland Security failed to persuade seven countries to take him -- Canada, Mexico, Panama, El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Costa Rica. The magistrate in Posada Carriles's case said that the Justice Department could have legally held him for a longer period if it had officially certified him as a terrorist, but that prosecutors did not do so.

"The problem is that the American government created him, it taught him, and now it's hard for the government to punish him," Camilo Rojo Alvarez, son of a crew member who died in the 1976 attack, said in an interview.

Much of the evidence against Posada Carriles has been drawn from the U.S. government's own files, including declassified FBI and CIA documents. One declassified CIA intelligence report, citing information from informants, said Posada Carriles attended a $1,000-a-person fundraising and planning dinner for anti-Castro activities in September 1976 along with Orlando Bosch, another prime suspect in the Cubana bombing.

Not long afterward, the report stated, Posada Carriles said, "We are going to hit a Cuban airplane. Orlando has the details."

DOJ_NMG_0074962

Bosch was once in a position similar to that of Posada Carriles, and the outcome of his case unnerves Cubans now focused on Posada Carriles. In 1990, the administration of George H.W. Bush released Bosch from prison after he, like Posada Carriles, was caught entering the country illegally. Cuba had been the only country willing to take him, and the U.S. refused to send him to the island.

Bosch, an 80-year-old retired physician who now lives in a Miami suburb, has stopped just short of claiming that his and Posada Carriles's group was responsible for the Cubana bombing.

Earlier this year, he told the Spanish newspaper La Vanguardia that the Cubana flight was a "legitimate target." And in an Atlantic Monthly interview with "Cuba Confidential" author Ann Louise Bardach that is to be published this week, Bosch said: "We were at war with Castro, and in war, everything is valid."

Declassified documents state that the two men who placed the bomb on the Cubana flight worked for Posada Carriles. After getting off the plane in Barbados, one of the men called his girlfriend, who was also a Posada Carriles employee, and delivered a coded message to report the attack was successful. The message: "The bus was fully loaded with dogs."

NY Judge Suggests Ashcroft, Mueller May Remain In Lawsuit (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, October 5, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — A federal appeals court seemed reluctant Wednesday to give former Attorney General John Ashcroft, FBI Director Robert Mueller and others an early exit from a lawsuit saying they subjected detainees in a probe of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks to harsh conditions.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals listened for nearly two hours as lawyers for some of the 34 former and current government employees named in the litigation argued that their clients should get immunity or had no contact with two former detainees who sued in 2004.

Judge Jon Newman, part of a three-judge panel, asked Gregory G. Garre, a government lawyer representing Ashcroft and Mueller, why his clients should not at least provide written answers to questions posed by lawyers as the case proceeds.

Garre said it would be burdensome to force high-level officials to make those kinds of responses to lawsuits stemming from broad policies they issue during national crises.

But the judge did not let up.

"For all we know they were just doing other things and just leaving these people in atrocious conditions," the judge said.

The comment drew a spirited defense of Ashcroft and Mueller by Garre, who said there was "a monumental effort and employees worked tirelessly" as the United States launched the largest FBI probe ever to find those responsible for the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Later, the judge challenged Michael L. Martinez, a lawyer for the former warden at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn, for saying in court papers that complaints that the Quran was taken away from detainees or that guards banged on the bars of cells when detainees were praying proved the detainees were allowed to practice their religion.

The judge asked Martinez if he stood by his assertion that the references proved there were only minimal restrictions on the practice of religion.

"That's correct," Martinez said. "My client tenders that position."

The judge then called upon Garre as the only government lawyer before the appeals court to see if he agreed with Martinez's position.

"Specific allegations of abuse like that is not something that's condoned by the United States," Garre said.

The arguments came in a case brought by Ehab Elmaghraby and Javaid Iqbal, detainees who alleged that Ashcroft, Mueller and others implemented a policy of confining detainees in highly restrictive conditions because of their religious beliefs and race.

Elmaghraby, an Egyptian who worked at restaurants before he was held at the Metropolitan Detention Center from October 2001 until August 2002, settled his portion of the case after the U.S. government agreed to pay him $300,000. He was cleared of allegations he had terrorist ties but was deported in August 2003 after pleading guilty to credit card fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0074963

Iqbal, a Pakistani, was arrested at his Long Island home on Nov. 2, 2001, and charged with nonviolent federal crimes unrelated to terrorism. Two months later, he was moved to the Metropolitan Detention Center, where he was held in solitary confinement for more than 150 days without a hearing, according to his lawsuit.

He said he was subjected to physical and verbal abuse, including unnecessary strip searches, until he was cleared of any involvement in terrorism and deported after pleading guilty in April 2002 to fraud and being sentenced to 16 months in prison.

Elmaghraby and Iqbal were among 184 of 762 aliens arrested after the Sept. 11 attacks who were identified as being of high interest to the investigation and were held in maximum-security conditions. Eighty-four of the 184 detainees were housed in Brooklyn.

In September 2005, U.S. District Judge John Gleeson ruled that Ashcroft and Mueller could remain as defendants because the plaintiffs alleged they were personally involved in the creation or implementation of unconstitutional policies after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The appeals court panel didn't say when it would rule.

Judges Zero In On Treatment Of A Detainee (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

In sharp questioning, a three-judge panel yesterday challenged arguments by federal officials seeking dismissal of a Pakistani man's suit charging that because of his religion, race or national origin, he, like others, was held for months after 9/11 in abusive solitary confinement before being cleared of links to terrorism and deported.

In the mahogany and marble splendor of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in Lower Manhattan, lawyers for former Attorney General John Ashcroft and other government officials argued that the officials were entitled to immunity from the lawsuit filed by the man, Javaid Iqbal, who had been known as "the cable guy" to his Long Island customers before he was swept into a federal detention center in Brooklyn as were hundreds of other Muslim immigrants in the New York area.

From the start of yesterday's two-hour hearing, one of the judges, Jon O. Newman, showed particular impatience with the narrow legal defenses offered by the defendants in the case, which lawyers for Mr. Iqbal say seeks accountability for what they call serious constitutional violations by the nation's highest law enforcement officials. It is the first case of its kind to reach the appellate level.

Judge Newman was especially scathing in questioning the lawyer for Dennis Hasty, formerly the warden of the Metropolitan Detention Center, where Mr. Iqbal and 184 others designated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as "of high interest" were confined in a special unit where a 2003 Justice Department Inspector General's report found widespread abuse.

Mr. Hasty's lawyer, Michael L. Martinez, had argued in his brief that even if everything alleged in the lawsuit were true — as the appellate judges must assume at this stage of the litigation — Mr. Iqbal's treatment "never approached the level of a due process violation."

"Beatings?" Judge Newman asked. "Exposure to air-conditioning after standing in the rain? Needless strip-searches? Never approached a due process violation? If I thought your client really believed that, I've got to tell you, I'd be really troubled."

Judge Robert D. Sack was equally acerbic in commenting on a defense assertion that the complaint failed to link Mr. Hasty personally to what was going on at the detention center.

"He is the warden," Judge Sack said. "If he didn't know what was going on — I'm boggled twice in one argument."

Mr. Martinez replied that five years after 9/11 it was easy to criticize decisions made at the time. He cited legal precedents holding that "the courts are ill-equipped to second-guess what goes on in prisons."

Earlier, Judge Newman interrupted Lauren Resnick, the lawyer representing two former officials of the F.B.I., Michael Rolince, the agency's former chief of counterterrorism, and Kenneth Maxwell, a former special agent in charge of the F.B.I. office in New York, as she argued that the complaint was not specific enough in linking the F.B.I. supervisors to what another federal bureaucracy was doing in the detention center.

DOJ_NMG_0074964

"You don't think your clients had a major role in the decision not to release these plaintiffs?" Judge Newman asked. He was referring to findings by the Inspector General that detainees picked up on called-in tips were often designated "high-interest" and held in highly restrictive conditions until the F.B.I. cleared them, a process that took months because it was not a high priority.

"Are you telling me that they were unaware that they were being held in highly restrictive conditions?"

Instead of answering, Ms. Resnick kept repeating the legal position that the complaint itself was deficient in the way it made its accusations.

Earlier this year, the federal government agreed to pay $300,000 to another plaintiff in the same suit, settling his claim without admitting to wrongdoing. The government, which in a lower federal court lost its effort to dismiss Mr. Iqbal's lawsuit without testimony, is seeking to overturn that ruling. It also lost a similar motion in a companion lawsuit brought as a class action by other former detainees.

Mr. Iqbal eventually pleaded guilty to credit-card fraud and was deported to Pakistan.

Many legal arguments yesterday concerned Supreme Court rulings on governmental immunity. Judge Sack and Judge Jose A. Cabranes suggested that a case now pending before the Supreme Court might affect the question, and asked for memos by Oct. 9 on whether a delay would be appropriate.

Gregory G. Garre, a Justice Department lawyer representing Mr. Ashcroft and Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., said that context was everything in judging whether Mr. Iqbal's treatment, as alleged, violated any known constitutional rights.

"If there's anything that the court can take judicial notice of," he said, " it's that 9/11 was the most deadly foreign attack on domestic soil."

In his rebuttal on behalf of Mr. Iqbal, whose lawsuit was brought by the Urban Justice Center, Alexander A. Reinert argued that questioning officials was necessary to determine how 9/11 actually affected Mr. Iqbal's treatment.

Mr. Iqbal's lawsuit charges that Mr. Ashcroft and others created a discriminatory policy that was "applied to Mr. Iqbal in some of the most horrific conditions of confinement," he said, and that they knew or should have known it.

"They may believe the facts will disprove it," added Mr. Reinert, of Koob & Magoolaghan, "but that's exactly what discovery is for."

At the close of the hearing, Judge Newman questioned Mr. Garre, as the sole Justice Department lawyer, about another assertion in Mr. Hasty's brief. It contends that Mr. Iqbal's lawsuit itself shows there were "only minimal restrictions" on his ability to practice his religion, since he complained that his Koran had been routinely confiscated and that guards had banged on his cell door when he tried to pray, which demonstrated that he had been allowed to pray and to have a Koran.

In a tone of outraged incredulity, Judge Newman repeated the phrase "only minimal restrictions," first pressing Mr. Hasty's lawyer to say whether that was really his client's position or "just hyperbole by his lawyer," and finally asking Mr. Garre whether that was the government's position.

Mr. Garre replied, "Specific abuse like that is not something that's condoned by the United States."

U.S. Seeks Immunity In 9/11 Detention Case (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 5, 2006

Panel Considers Liability Of Government Officials

The personal liability of high-ranking officials for the mistreatment of Muslim men swept up after Sept. 11, 2001, and segregated at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn was sharply contested yesterday at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

For almost two hours, a three-judge panel peppered lawyers for top U.S. Department of Justice and FBI officials, the former warden of the detention center, and FBI and corrections supervisors who argued that Eastern District Judge John Gleeson was wrong to reject their claims of qualified immunity.

The appeal was brought by the government in the case of Javaid Iqbal, a Muslim of Pakastani origin who was arrested for credit card fraud during the post-9/11 sweep and detained for more than seven months in Brooklyn.

While Mr. Iqbal ultimately pleaded guilty to the charge, served his sentence and was deported, he claims he was placed in the detention center's solitary confinement unit because the FBI had designated him and more than 700 other Muslims as "high interest" subjects in the terror attacks.

Mr. Iqbal claims he was subject to beatings by guards, dragged along the ground in shackles, harassed while trying to pray and denied adequate medical care.

His mistreatment was one example, his lawyers say, of widespread detainee abuse at the detention center.

A report by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General issued in June 2003 criticized harsh conditions at the facility for the detainees.

Plaintiff's lawyers have cited the report in their suits against the government under the Federal Tort Claims Act and in individual lawsuits against former Attorney General John Ashcroft and former FBI Director Robert Mueller and other officials.

The report was particularly critical of the inconsistent manner in which the FBI, and then the Bureau of Prisons, imposed a "hold-until-cleared" of suspicion policy for the detainees.

Mr. Iqbal makes an equal protection claim as well as procedural and substantive due process claims.

Judge Gleeson ruled in 2005 that top officials would have to, at a minimum, answer some questions about the policy (NYLJ, Sept. 29, 2005).

Mr. Iqbal's co-plaintiff, Ehab Elmaghraby, has settled with the government.

Yesterday, Judges Jon Newman, Jose Cabranes and Robert Sack heard lawyers for the defendants take different tacks on whether or not the U.S. Supreme Court has set a heightened pleading standard for claims against which the defense of qualified immunity is invoked.

Each of the lawyers claimed that Mr. Iqbal's complaint stated only "conclusory" allegations that warranted a dismissal by Judge Gleeson.

Lauren Resnick of Baker & Hostetler represents two former FBI supervisors that Mr. Iqbal claims were responsible for his mistreatment due to his segregation under the "hold-until-clear" policy.

Ms. Resnick contended that the supervisors should not be held liable because the FBI did not "direct or request" that Mr. Iqbal and others be held in administrative segregation. On the face of the complaint, she said, his claim should be dismissed before discovery commenced.

But, Judge Newman said, "what really happens [to them] depends on whether they are [designated] high interest?"

When Ms. Resnick said that was not necessarily the case, Judge Newman responded, "So senior people at the FBI said that if they were walking around in the general population, that's OK with us ?"

Judge Newman then asked, "You are urging a higher pleading standard, are you not?"

Ms. Resnick said courts are split on the issue and, while acknowledging that the qualified immunity context is "unique," said courts would benefit from some clarification on this point from the U.S. Supreme Court.

Qualified Immunity Meaning

The lawyers were divided on the meaning of the Supreme Court's decision in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, (1998), in the context of qualified immunity - which protects officials from burdensome litigation and discovery in the course of performing their duties as long as they are not violating clearly established law.

Michael Martinez of Crowell Moring in Washington D.C., who represents the detention center's former Warden Dennis Hasty, said Crawford-El did not stand for the proposition that plaintiffs have to meet a heightened pleading standard-one that goes beyond simply giving notice to the defendant about the nature of the allegations.

But a body of law has developed over the years requiring more than notice pleading where qualified immunity is involved. Plaintiffs must "put forward specific non-conclusory allegations that establish things like improper motive," Mr. Martinez said. "We still require something more than bare-bones allegations."

"How is that not a heightened pleading standard?" Judge Sack asked.

Judge Newman asked whether or not there had to be "some discovery" on whether the warden knew what the correctional officers under his command were doing.

DOJ_NMG_0074966

"Unless he's [Iqbal] called into the warden's office and [the warden says] 'I'd like you here while I give my marching orders,' doesn't that mean that wardens are never liable?" the judge asked.

Mr. Martinez answered no and said the complaint only had to go further than saying Mr. Hasty, the warden "knew or should have known" about the abuse.

"But this was going on for months." Judge Sack said.

Principal Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre said Crawford-El stands for the proposition that a "trial court must exercise its discretion in a way that protects the substance of a qualified immunity defense"-with the goal being to avoid "burdensome litigation" and plaintiffs are required to show more to survive a prediscovery motion to dismiss.

"Whether you think of that in terms of a heightened pleading standard or not, that's the standard," he said, adding that the complaint fails in that regard as to Mr. Ashcroft and Mr. Mueller.

Mr. Garre said he was "happy to defend" the "policy of holding post-9/11 detainees in a highly restricted environment until they were cleared by the F.B.I. That policy violated no clearly established constitutional right."

Burden of Proof

Alex Reinert of Koob & Magoolaghan, who represents Mr. Iqbal along with attorneys from the Urban Justice Center and Weil, Gotshal & Manges, said the defendants were assuming "adversarial discovery before the filing of a complaint," and his client went well beyond "conclusory" allegations.

The Crawford-El case, he said, was not about heightened pleading standards but about the burden of proof.

Crawford-El, he said, meant that a district court should use its discretion not to prevent "any discovery, just burdensome discovery."

The judges asked Mr. Reinert whether the actions of officials post-9/11 should be weighed in the context of the nationwide imperative to capture possible co-conspirators and prevent further attacks.

Regardless of the severity of the attacks, Mr. Reinert said, officials knew that "it's been clearly established for years that you can't put people in conditions of confinement" like those to which Mr. Iqbal was subjected.

Mr. Iqbal, he said, was subject to "horrific abuse" that was the direct result of a policy initiated from the top and he was "not getting hearings" like "everyone else in the MDC who was not Muslim was getting hearings."

He continued, "We made these allegations, your honor, but we don't have to prove them here," adding that the Supreme Court has said "there is no heightened pleading standard unless the rules say there is."

- Mark Hamblett can be reached at mhamblett@alm.com.

Security At Supermax Slammed In Fed Report (RMN)

By Lou Kilzer, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, October 5, 2006

Prison officials allowed convicted terrorists in the federal super-maximum lockup in Florence to communicate with outside radicals for years and subsequent steps taken to shut down the links have serious gaps.

That is one of the findings in a highly critical Justice Department report released this week on the handling of terrorists and gang leaders in federal prisons.

The so-called Supermax facility in Florence came in for special scrutiny because it houses the federal prison system's most dangerous inmates, including several involved in the 1993 bombing of New York's World Trade Center.

Three of the bombers sent at least 90 letters to Islamic extremists between 2002 and 2004, some of them aimed at recruiting suicide bombers, according to the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General.

Since then, the three bombers have been carefully monitored, but risks remain, according to the report.

Florence hired three full-time Arabic translators after the communications were uncovered, but translations are slow.

The damning report comes a little more than two weeks after grand jury indictments revealed that a Los Angeles street gang leader was able to continue to direct his drug dealing operations from the prison through coded messages.

DOJ_NMG_0074967

It raises fresh questions about funding levels for the prison, where leaders of the union representing correctional officers say staffing has dropped dangerously low and where four funding requests to improve security since 9/11 have failed, even as the facility has become home to more of the country's most notorious terrorist bombers.

Short staffing and lack of funding underlie the gaps that allowed the dangerous mailings to get out, according to the OIG report.

The FBI, which handles letters from the most dangerous prisoners, is supposed to produce translations within 60 days, according to the report. In reality, it sometimes takes as long as six to 18 months, the report says.

And even concentrating on the worst of the inmates may not be enough.

"These delays in translations . . . pose a security risk because plans for terrorist and criminal activities could be communicated to or by inmates through the mail or telephone and implemented by outside contacts before translations are completed and the intelligence gleaned from them shared," the report says.

Further, the three translators hired at Florence did not begin intelligence training until late last year, meaning that letters may have been translated but coded messages not detected.

"We found that the (Bureau of Prisons) lacks sufficient intelligence capability to adequately analyze information from inmate mail to detect terrorist activity," the report says.

The key problem is staffing.

When investigators showed up to review the situation at Florence they were told that on three consecutive days the week before, two or three of seven special investigative supervisors had been pulled for other tasks.

The person responsible for monitoring all communications said she was pulled the previous week on four of her five workdays "to fill a vacant post elsewhere in the institution."

Such assignments, she reported, happened frequently.

The report said that such staffing decisions "can have significant security consequences."

According to the report, the FBI "showed little interest in the 17 international terrorist inmates" in the Florence facility until the letters from the Trade Center bombers were uncovered.

The inspector general recommended several steps to tighten the ship at Florence by sharply increasing and improving communications monitoring.

State Rep. Buffie McFadyen, D-Pueblo West, says she believes the warden at the Florence facility "has done the best he can with the resources he has," but that those resources are inadequate.

"Florence is still not staffed to the minimum level that is necessary," said McFadyen, who has taken a special interest in safety and funding for the prison in her district.

Felicia Ponce, a Bureau of Prisons public relations specialist, said Wednesday that prison officials "are continually reviewing our procedures" and that they appreciated the inspector general's "very candid report and will ensure that the report's recommendations are acted upon as soon as possible."

But Ponce sounded a cautionary note: "To implement these recommendations systemwide will require significant additional resources, primarily staff."

And to do that, she said, the bureau would turn to "the federal budget process."

The probe was launched after the March 2005 discovery that Florence prisoners Mohammed Salameh, Mahmud Abouhalima and Nidal Ayyad - all convicted for the 1993 World Trade Center plot - had communicated with various outside extremists.

In one instance, a letter from Salameh was found in the possession of Mohamed Achraf, who authorities said was plotting to blow up the National Justice Center in Madrid, Spain.

A member of a Spanish terror cell also was using letters from Florence to recruit other members. Salameh even managed to send a letter praising Osama bin Laden to Arabic newspapers.

The Florence Supermax prison has held a who's who of criminals, including Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski, Oklahoma City bomber Terry Nichols and Zacarias Moussaoui, the 9/11 conspirator dubbed "the 20th hijacker."

Conclusions need no translation

DOJ_NMG_0074968

The federal Office of the Inspector General released this week a highly critical report on the Supermax prison in Florence, saying that:

• Staff failed to read all of the mail of high-risk prisoners.
• The facility does not employ enough proficient translators.
• It was slow to train translators in intelligence techniques.
• It didn't hire its first staff member dedicated to translation until 2005.
• Less than 50 percent of inmate calls were monitored.
• It randomly monitored only 1.8 percent of inmate mail during a test period.

Waterboarding Historically Controversial (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Key senators say Congress has outlawed one of the most notorious detainee interrogation techniques -- "waterboarding," in which a prisoner feels near drowning. But the White House will not go that far, saying it would be wrong to tell terrorists which practices they might face.

Inside the CIA, waterboarding is cited as the technique that got Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the prime plotter of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, to begin to talk and provide information -- though "not all of it reliable," a former senior intelligence official said.

Waterboarding is variously characterized as a powerful tool and a symbol of excess in the nation's fight against terrorists. But just what is waterboarding, and where does it fit in the arsenal of coercive interrogation techniques?

On Jan. 21, 1968, The Washington Post published a front-page photograph of a U.S. soldier supervising the questioning of a captured North Vietnamese soldier who is being held down as water was poured on his face while his nose and mouth were covered by a cloth. The picture, taken four days earlier near Da Nang, had a caption that said the technique induced "a flooding sense of suffocation and drowning, meant to make him talk."

The article said the practice was "fairly common" in part because "those who practice it say it combines the advantages of being unpleasant enough to make people talk while still not causing permanent injury."

The picture reportedly led to an Army investigation.

Twenty-one years earlier, in 1947, the United States charged a Japanese officer, Yukio Asano, with war crimes for carrying out another form of waterboarding on a U.S. civilian. The subject was strapped on a stretcher that was tilted so that his feet were in the air and head near the floor, and small amounts of water were poured over his face, leaving him gasping for air until he agreed to talk.

"Asano was sentenced to 15 years of hard labor," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) told his colleagues last Thursday during the debate on military commissions legislation. "We punished people with 15 years of hard labor when waterboarding was used against Americans in World War II," he said.

A CIA interrogation training manual declassified 12 years ago, "KUBARK Counterintelligence Interrogation -- July 1963," outlined a procedure similar to waterboarding. Subjects were suspended in tanks of water wearing blackout masks that allowed for breathing. Within hours, the subjects felt tension and so-called environmental anxiety. "Providing relief for growing discomfort, the questioner assumes a benevolent role," the manual states.

The KUBARK manual was the product of more than a decade of research and testing, refining lessons learned from the Korean War, where U.S. airmen were subjected to a new type of "touchless torture" until they confessed to a bogus plan to use biological weapons against the North Koreans.

Used to train new interrogators, the handbook presented "basic information about coercive techniques available for use in the interrogation situation." When it comes to torture, however, the handbook advised that "the threat to inflict pain . . . can trigger fears more damaging than the immediate sensation of pain."

DOJ_NMG_0074969

In the post-Vietnam period, the Navy SEALs and some Army Special Forces used a form of waterboarding with trainees to prepare them to resist interrogation if captured. The waterboarding proved so successful in breaking their will, says one former Navy captain familiar with the practice, "they stopped using it because it hurt morale."

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, the interrogation world changed. Low-level Taliban and Arab fighters captured in Afghanistan provided little information, the former intelligence official said. When higher-level al-Qaeda operatives were captured, CIA interrogators sought authority to use more coercive methods.

These were cleared not only at the White House but also by the Justice Department and briefed to senior congressional officials, according to a statement released last month by the Office of the Director of National Intelligence. Waterboarding was one of the approved techniques.

When questions began to be raised last year about the handling of high-level detainees and Congress passed legislation barring torture, the handful of CIA interrogators and senior officials who authorized their actions became concerned that they might lose government support.

Passage last month of military commissions legislation provided retroactive legal protection to those who carried out waterboarding and other coercive interrogation techniques.

Claims And Counterclaims (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin Jr., Lee A. Casey

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Tocqueville's trenchant observation, that sooner or later all political issues in America are "resolved" into legal questions, has certainly withstood the test of time. Our policy disputes are regularly fought out on "legal" or "constitutional" grounds, both in and out of the courts, and nowhere is this more evident than in the debates over the war against al Qaeda.

The national "dialogue" over how the U.S. should respond to the threat of radical Islam is replete with claims and counterclaims about whether the Bush administration has violated the law by holding captured jihadist prisoners without trial, by intercepting al Qaeda communications without judicial warrants, by subjecting detainees to stressful interrogations, and so forth. In fact, almost all of this clamor arises from a basic dispute over whether the U.S. is -- or should be considered -- at war with al Qaeda and its allies, or whether it should address the threat of transnational terrorism as a law-enforcement matter -- as most of its European allies have done.

There is little doubt that the Democratic Party leadership, and no small portion of the rank-and-file, find the president's rhetoric of war distasteful -- and more than a little embarrassing -- and reject the underlying notion that the U.S. is, or could be, engaged in a legally cognizable armed conflict with al Qaeda and other jihadists. Nowhere was this better displayed than in Bill Clinton's recent meltdown during his interview with Chris Wallace of Fox News. Mr. Clinton protested (rather too much) that he really had been committed to killing Osama bin Laden, and insisted that he did his best to accomplish this goal.

That may well be true. But then as now, Mr. Clinton views the relevant policy choices through a law-enforcement prism. Granting the former president's ardent desire to see off bin Laden, his administration was mired for years in arguments over whether, consistent with a Cold War executive order forbidding "assassinations," the CIA could kill bin Laden, or whether U.S. agents would instead have to attempt a practically impossible capture -- i.e., an arrest. Paralyzing concerns were also expressed by Clinton administration officials that any attempt to kill bin Laden might cause civilian casualties, even though wartime collateral damage is permissible, provided it is not disproportionate to the military advantage being gained. This rejection of the laws-of-war model continued even after bin Laden proved his belligerent intentions in a series of attacks on American citizens and U.S. military assets overseas.

In the aftermath of 9/11 -- and despite the fact that congressional Democrats joined Republicans in passing an "authorization for the use of military force" against those responsible for the attacks -- most continued to operate in a "law enforcement" mode. Democratic critics of the Bush administration have opposed virtually every measure the president has taken to guard against new attacks on American soil, including the USA Patriot Act, the National Security Agency's warrantless electronic surveillance program, data mining, access to international banking data, and the use of traditional military commissions to try and punish captured terrorists. During the 2004 presidential campaign, John Kerry made clear his belief that al Qaeda was a law-enforcement problem.

DOJ_NMG_0074970

The Democratic message was, and remains, that the peacetime balance of individual rights and community interests is sufficient to meet the threat -- along with additional passive, and uncontroversial, defenses such as hardening cockpit doors and giving more monies to first responders. There have, of course, been notable exceptions to this rule -- such as Sen. Joe Lieberman -- but his steadfast support for both the war on terror in Afghanistan and in Iraq cost him the Democratic nomination for re-election to his seat.

By contrast, President Bush immediately recognized that al Qaeda, and the larger jihadist movement it represents, is not simply a new and especially violent street gang or drug cartel that could be handled by more and better policing. Only the government's full complement of war powers would be sufficient to meet the immediate threat to American lives and interests, and to take the fight to the enemy. He sought and obtained Congress's express authorization for military action, and has not looked back. For his pains, the president has been ruthlessly vilified by his political opponents and maligned as everything from the idiot tool of big-oil interests (and his own vice president), to a devious crypto-autocrat determined to transform the presidency into some kind of late Roman emperorship.

The president's critics, and especially those in Congress now running for re-election, should honestly admit that their differences are, by and large, matters of policy which can and should be debated as such. The question is not whether the president has broken the law, whether domestic or international, but which legal paradigm -- war or law enforcement -- makes the most sense in meeting the threat. Those who believe that captured al Qaeda operatives should be treated as ordinary criminal defendants (rather than unlawful enemy combatants), entitled to all of rights enjoyed by civilians in the federal and state courts, should stop pretending that this result is compelled by the Geneva Conventions or the U.S. Constitution. Instead, they should acknowledge making a policy choice that advantages jihadists beyond the legally required level, explain why they believe this to be right and just, and how they think it will checkmate al Qaeda.

In particular, they must answer key questions, such as how a law enforcement system designed to punish and deter, rather than prevent, criminal conduct can hope to discover and pre-empt future suicide attacks before they take place -- especially after 50 years during which progressives have demanded, and achieved, increasingly greater protections for criminal defendants.

Since the Democrats are certainly not suggesting our criminal justice system return to the pre-Warren Court's days, the pros and cons of the law-enforcement model need to be laid out explicitly, and with particulars, before the American people. Similarly, supporters of the law-enforcement model must explain on what legal basis American forces could attack al Qaeda bases overseas, and any "criminal suspects" who may be present at those sites, if the U.S. is not engaged in a war. It was, of course, that very dilemma that prevented President Clinton from killing Osama bin Laden when he may well have had the opportunity.

Sadly, the Democratic voices in Congress, like Talleyrand's Bourbons, have learned nothing. They continue to attack President Bush's policies at every turn and have never answered these questions. They rightly fear that the American people will not agree that jihadists, who recognize no law but their own religious convictions, should be granted the due-process rights of ordinary citizens accused of criminal conduct, or that our own civilian population must accept greater risk of attack to vindicate a vision of personal privacy and individual autonomy that may be laudable in peacetime, but which no state could preserve during war -- and hope to win.

Messrs. Rivkin and Casey, lawyers in Washington, served in the Department of Justice under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Closing The Books On Dubai Ports (HILL)

By David Marchick

The Hill, October 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0074971

Six months after Congress exploded over the proposed acquisition of six American port operations by Dubai Ports World, Congress has left town without sending foreign investment-related legislation to the president.

The fact that this legislation failed to become an election-year imperative reflects a rapid evolution in thinking in Congress across the political spectrum, thanks to the leadership of House Republicans like Roy Blunt (Mo.), Deborah Pryce (Ohio) and Michael Oxley (Ohio); and Democrats like Barney Frank (Mass.), Carolyn Maloney (N.Y.) and Joseph Crowley (N.Y.). Blunt and Frank built on earlier good work by Sens. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) and Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), who had the foresight to hold hearings well before the Dubai Ports deal made CFIUS (the Treasury Department's Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States) a four-letter word.

While the door is still open for passage of new legislation during the post-election legislative session, to close the book on the Dubai Ports fiasco the president should issue an executive order improving the process governing national security reviews of foreign investment.

No issue seized the attention of the American people this spring more than the proposed investment by DP World. A remarkable 41 percent of Americans said they followed the issue — only two percentage points fewer than those who said they followed the war in Iraq. This buzz on Capitol Hill resulted in nearly a dozen Congressional hearings over a three-week period, and the introduction of 20 bills that would have restricted foreign investment in one way or another.

Once the political controversy died down, Congress was able to take a broader look at the issue. Four factors tempered congressional enthusiasm for radical reform legislation, including proposals to prohibit foreign investment in broad sectors of the U.S. economy.

First, foreign companies have operations in every state and congressional district in the country, and members of Congress heard from these companies and employees in their districts. More than 5 million Americans are employed by U.S. affiliates of foreign-owned companies.

Second, American jobs also depend on U.S. investment abroad. As the largest investor in the world, no country has more to lose if other countries start creating barriers to foreign investment. In the past six months, the Russian government has proposed new legislation to restrict investment in "strategic" sectors. China has adopted new regulations to block foreign investments that threaten China's "economic security." U.S. investors have faced political backlash in Korea, Venezuela and Bolivia. Restrictions imposed by our government would almost certainly fan similar moves abroad.

Third, Congress learned that the existing process for conducting national security reviews of foreign investments has real teeth. Despite errors in communicating with Congress, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, the interagency group that handles these reviews, has a strong record of protecting national security.

Fourth, and finally, the Bush administration has implemented significant changes in the CFIUS process. Key agencies have beefed up their staffs. The Director of National Intelligence has enhanced coordination among the intelligence agencies. CFIUS has improved its communication with Congress. These changes have already had an impact: The caseload is up by almost 50 percent over last year, and the number of second stage reviews conducted this year are on pace to exceed the previous three years combined.

Nevertheless, some action to institutionalize and build upon these reforms is needed. Without such action, Congress may lack the confidence that the process has improved and will feel the need to step in to block future transactions.

The president should quickly issue an executive order institutionalizing these changes and incorporating the most important features of the House and Senate bills. For example, CFIUS could issue more detailed reports to Congress on transactions it has reviewed. The administration could clarify the factors it considers in conducting national security reviews of foreign acquisitions. Certain cases could be reviewed by higher-level officials. And CFIUS could provide clearer guidance on how to protect "critical infrastructure" assets that truly are vital to U.S. national security. To ensure political buy-in from the Congress, the administration will need to undertake serious and extensive consultations with Congress before issuing an executive order.

In addition to these steps, the President should clarify U.S. policy toward foreign investment. Presidents Carter, Reagan and George H.W. Bush each issued formal policies that welcomed foreign investment. This president should do the same. Further, the administration should work through the G-8 and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development to beat back the myriad initiatives abroad that would create new obstacles for foreign investment.

DOJ_NMG_0074972

Political and protectionist pressures against foreign investment will inevitably crop up periodically. The challenge for American leaders is to resist these pressures. With the trade winds from the Dubai Ports World debate having died down, the President has the opportunity to act to ensure that the most dynamic economy in the world continues to benefit from foreign investment.

David Marchick is a partner at Covington & Burling and author of the book, "US National Security and Foreign Direct Investment" (Institute for International Economics, 2006). Covington & Burling represents U.S. and foreign investors that seek approval for foreign investments by CFIUS. The firm was not involved with Dubai Ports World.

The Politics Of Ports (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

We had our suspicions earlier this year that the Congressional uproar over a Dubai company set to run six U.S. ports had far more to do with politics than it did national security. Congress has just proved that point.

How else to explain that the Congressmen most opposed to letting a friendly United Arab Emirates company invest in the U.S. spent most of last week ensuring that felons could nonetheless work freely in secure areas of U.S. docks. That was the upshot of Congress's recently completed Port Security Act, if it is still worthy of that name.

As we wrote last week, Republican Jim DeMint had included a provision in the Senate version of the port bill that would have barred workers who had been convicted of treason, espionage, murder and other serious felonies. It would also have put a seven-year time-out on felons who'd committed such crimes as bribery, identity fraud, extortion and kidnapping. This all was eminently sensible, given our ports remain one of our most vulnerable areas for infiltration by terrorists, and that people with criminal records are obvious targets for recruitment.

Sensible, that is, unless you operate in the world of union politics, where job preservation ranks above national security. Several longshoremens' unions and their labor allies made it a goal to tank the provisions under the cover of the House-Senate conference, claiming the categories were "too broad." By the time the final bill emerged into the light, everything save the prohibitions on those who commit treason, espionage, sedition and terrorist acts had disappeared. All other former convicts are still free to roam the docks at will.

Notably, nobody now wants to take credit for this handiwork. In fact, some Senators pushed to have only a voice vote on the measure when it was first introduced, so as to avoid having to go on the record opposing it. The critics instead waited to do their dirty work in conference, where we're told at least one of those carrying water for the longshoremen was none other than Representative Pete King (R., NY).

Mr. King was last seen spearheading the charge against Dubai Ports World, bashing the Bush Administration because it hadn't shown an appropriate "level of concern" about port security. Among his biggest worries was that the company didn't have safeguards "against things like infiltration by al-Qaeda" or "corruption." "How do we ensure that one of its employees is not working for our enemies?" asked Mr. King, in a February op-ed.

Good question, Congressman. Currently some 750,000 workers have unescorted access to secure port areas, including longshoremen, truck drivers and rail workers. Moreover, the government already has good reason to worry about the possibility that some of these people are corrupt enough to be bought. As OpinionJournal.com columnist John Fund noted, only last year the Justice Department filed a racketeering suit against the East Coast-based International Longshoremen's Association, claiming it was a "vehicle for organized crime."

This matters, given that the FBI's top counterterrorism official, Joseph Billy Jr., admitted recently that one of his big concerns was that old-fashioned mobsters would tie up with terrorists. Only recently, FBI agents stopped a man with alleged mob ties from selling missiles to an informant posing as a terrorist middleman. All this makes the corruption portrayed in "On the Waterfront" seem quaint.

Despite these worries, Mr. King (who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee, and should know better) was hardly alone in watering down the provisions. Senator Daniel Inouye (D., Hawaii) had pledged to protect the provision in conference, but in fact worked to gut it. Senator Ted Stevens (R., Alaska) helped. Representative Bennie Thompson (D., Mississippi), the ranking Democrat on Mr. King's Homeland Security Committee, also lent a hand.

DOJ_NMG_0074973

As for what happens now, there is some comfort in the fact the Department of Homeland Security is working on regulations that mirror the full DeMint provision. Yet the whole purpose of Congressional action was to codify such provision in law, to prevent some activist judge from throwing out the regulations, or a future President from modifying them under union pressure. We hear the DeMint team may take another run at this in the future, which is good news.

Especially because those who stripped the provisions are now running for cover. They probably remember the political fallout when former Senator Tom Daschle decided to play union politics, and led an effort to block the creation of DHS unless federal union work rules applied. Americans want to know their elected representatives are looking out for their security, not for union jobs.

EU Considering Sanctions On U.S. Over Visa (UPI)

United Press International, October 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 (UPI) -- The European Union will consider diplomatic sanctions against the United States Thursday, in a row over U.S. visa policy towards new EU members.

"Appropriate steps vis-a-vis the United States could be envisaged," said a report adopted Wednesday by the European Commission, the EU's executive arm. The report says such steps could include "temporarily restoring the visa requirement for U.S. nationals holding diplomatic and duty/official passports."

The row centers on the U.S. visa waiver program, under which nationals of 27 countries are able to visit the United States for business or pleasure for up to 90 days without a visa. Fifteen EU states are covered by the program

Because the EU has a common visa policy, all 25 member states admit U.S. citizens reciprocally, without the need for a visa. But 10 member states, including former communist countries that have become close U.S. allies and supported the United States in its war in Iraq, like Poland and Estonia, are denied entry to the visa waiver program.

EU officials say the United States has dragged its feet in working to admit them, and failed to provide objective, transparent criteria to countries, so they can work towards membership of the program.

"To date," wrote EU Commissioner Franco Frattini to his U.S. counterpart Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, "no tangible progress can be reported."

This failure to make progress is "no longer understandable and (sic) acceptable," writes Frattini.

The issue will be discussed at a meeting of European interior and justice ministers Thursday.

WAR NEWS:

GOP Lawmaker Calls For Rumsfeld To Quit (AP)

By John Christoffersen

AP, October 4, 2006

Rep. Chris Shays, who is facing a tough challenge from an anti-war Democrat, on Wednesday called for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to resign — a rare demand from a longtime Republican.

The Connecticut lawmaker also accused officials at the Defense Department of withholding information about the Iraq war from Congress.

"I am losing faith in how we are fighting this war," Shays, a longtime supporter of the conflict, said in an interview. "I believe we have to motivate the Iraqis to do more."

Shays, who was elected in 1987, said defense officials stopped cooperating with his congressional subcommittee after he proposed setting a timeline for troop withdrawals. Shays, who had previously opposed such a timeline, offered the plan in August following his 14th trip to Iraq since the war began.

Rumsfeld "simply is refusing to cooperate with a committee that oversees the Department of Defense," Shays said. "To me he has crossed the line."

DOJ_NMG_0074974

"I think Donald Rumsfeld needs to step down," said Shays, who is chairman of the House Government Reform subcommittee on national security, emerging threats and international relations.

The Pentagon had no comment and referred to Rumsfeld's recent remarks. Asked on a flight to Nicaragua earlier this week whether he would resign, Rumsfeld responded, "No, no, no." He said he had spoken to President Bush and he had voiced his support.

Questioned about Shays' complaint about a lack of cooperation, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said, "the Defense Department does work very closely with congressional members and committees that have oversight responsibilities."

Several congressional Democrats have clamored for Rumsfeld's resignation, but it's rare for a lawmaker in President Bush's political party to argue that the Pentagon chief should step down. Republican candidate Tom Kean Jr., who is seeking a Senate seat in New Jersey, also has called for Rumsfeld's resignation.

Shays is a moderate Republican who has voted against the party rank-and-file on a number of issues, including the environment. He also supports abortion rights and gun control.

Frustration among some in the GOP with the administration's handling of the war is not limited to Congress. During an appearance in Minnesota on Tuesday, former Secretary of State Colin Powell said, "stay the course isn't a good enough answer, because to stay the course you have to have a finish line."

Rep. Walter Jones, R-N.C., who has Camp Lejeune in his district, said he has repeatedly called for Rumsfeld to resign.

"I have felt this way for quite a while. . . . He reminds me so much of (Defense Secretary Robert) McNamara in the Vietnam War. He is arrogant and will not admit a mistake."

Shays is in one of the most competitive House races this year and his comments come just five weeks before the midterm elections. His opponent, Democrat Diane Farrell, has opposed the war and advocates an exit strategy for U.S. troops. Farrell lost to Shays by 4 percentage points two years ago.

Farrell's campaign pointed out that she has been calling for Rumsfeld's resignation for months and said this is just the latest change in Shays' position.

"He has supported the war from Day One," said Farrell campaign spokeswoman Jan Spiegel. "He has voted to give the president a blank check."

Shays made his comments after a debate with Farrell, which was dominated by questions about the Iraq war. Farrell said Shays started talking about timelines after Sen. Joe Lieberman lost the Democratic primary to anti-war candidate Ned Lamont. Lieberman is running as an independent.

Shays rejected the charge, saying he has attended funerals of soldiers and would not base his position on how to get re-elected.

Kerry Vs. Frist (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, yesterday ridiculed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist for trying to clarify his comment on bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the Afghanistan government.

"They're not clarifying. He did another Terri Schiavo diagnosis from a one-hour tape," Mr. Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, said of the Tennessee Republican.

On Monday, Mr. Frist said the war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and that he favored bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government.

The remarks drew immediate criticism from Democrats. They argued Mr. Frist was surrendering to the Taliban, who harbored the al Qaeda organization blamed for the September 11 terrorist attacks.

A Frist spokeswoman later said the senator believes Afghan tribesmen at risk of being lost to the Taliban should be brought into the government, not Taliban fighters themselves, the Associated Press reports.

Mr. Kerry, mentioned as a possible 2008 presidential candidate, was campaigning in New Hampshire for state Senate candidate Beth Roth.

DOJ_NMG_0074975

Cabinet Cleaning Long Overdue: Bush Should Heed Advice Of Departed Chief Of Staff (BOSH)

By Wayne Woodlief

Boston Herald, October 5, 2006

If he were still White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card told me yesterday he'd have this advice for President Bush: After November's midterm elections, start thinking about changes in your Cabinet and senior staff for a "fresh start" with a new Congress in a new year.

"That's usually a good time to make changes," said Card, as familiar now with "the cadences of Washington" as he was with Massachusetts mores as a young reformer in the Legislature during the '70s.

Speaking by phone from his home in suburban Virginia, Card said, "It would be good now, right after the elections, for the president to see how the ducks have settled and sit back and say, 'This is what I want to do and should I go out and find somebody new to help me do it.' Change with, say, four months left in his term wouldn't mean much. But change wth two years in his presidency could mean a lot."

So it isn't too late (though it's way overdue) for Bush or Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to do the right thing. Rumsfeld - whose blunders in the war in Iraq and its aftermath have been epic - either should step aside or be asked to go.

Card said he hasn't spoken with the president since the stirring release of Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," which includes Card's entreaties on Rumsfeld. "But he has sent an assistant to talk to me, make arrangements for us to get together. He is a good friend. We'll see each other pretty soon."

Card is one of the good guys in Woodward's book, which documents the deceptions, hubris and mistakes by the administration in Iraq. Card played the Great Facilitator for Bush, raised questions the president should consider, made things happen and, always, watched W's back.

When Card heard how many enemies Rumsfeld had made on Capitol Hill and among military leaders, he tried to prod the president to cut him loose. Card said he wasn't "on a campaign" to get Rumsfeld. But he had (more than once, according to Woodward's book) raised the question of change at Defense - and in other positions as well, including his own.

Card was focused enough on Rumsfeld to talk with first lady Laura Bush about him. She was distressed about the war, Woodward wrote, worried that Rumsfeld was hurting her husband. "He (the president) is happy with this. But I'm not," she said.

Presidential adviser and elections guru Karl Rove kiboshed one of Card's efforts to replace Rumsfeld (Card offered up 11 names, including former Secretary of State Jim Baker), after Bush's re-election in 2004. Rove argued that the Democrats were too contentious and the president should do nothing to cause hearings on a new nominee - and on the course of the war. "Jesus, no," as Woodward quoted Rove.

Yesterday, Card said, "Karl Rove is a healthy debater."

But, tellingly, Card did not admit he was wrong in that debate as he did about his advice on a tense 2004 election night captured in gripping detail in Woodward's book.

Card had tried to nudge fellow Massachusetts native Mary Beth Cahill, Sen. John Kerry's campaign manager, into a concession call after early exit polls showing Kerry winning proved inaccurate. She said no, and the clock ticked past 4 a.m., with Ohio still in play (though headed Bush's way).

Card and Bush intimate Jim Francis suggested that the president make headline news by joining his supporters and claiming victory. But others, notably aide Dan Bartlett, argued not to "jam" Kerry and pressure him, lest the senator's forces raise legal questions about electoral procedures in Ohio. "You cannot go out there and put a crown on your own head," Bartlett told Bush. The president replied, "Laura thinks the same thing."

The president made the right call then, and Card said yesterday, "I think that the right decision was made and that my counsel was not as accurate as others.' "

But Card surely was right in trying to have Rumsfeld replaced and Laura Bush surely right in seconding the feeling.

Now if only the president will take his wife's advice on Rummy as he did about Kerry on election night.

Rumsfeld Soldiers On Despite Criticism (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0074976

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 4, 2006

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld skirted around a sign warning of eruption danger. He climbed the crumbling, steep steps to the top of the Masaya volcano, carefully protecting his left arm, in a sling since surgery a month ago.

Much like his painstaking but determined ascent of the crater on a drizzly day this week, the 74-year-old Rumsfeld has endured withering attacks on his competence as the Pentagon's chief. Such perseverance has not come without signs of strain.

Rumsfeld returned to Washington on Tuesday from back-to-back trips to Europe and Central America. They coincided with the release of a U.S. intelligence report saying the war in Iraq was motivating terrorists, and the publication of another book critical of the Pentagon's handling of the war. Some lawmakers in Congress renewed their calls for his ouster.

As Rumsfeld shuttled through eight time zones, from the Balkans to Nicaragua, he displayed a mix of verve and vulnerability. He jousted with reporters on some days; on others, he avoided the spotlight.

When he did take questions about his future, Rumsfeld delivered an exasperated "No, no, no," he would not resign.

And in typical fashion, he parried back. The fallout was not affecting his job, he said, or his relations with other national leaders.

"They don't seem to pay a lot of attention to it, mostly you do," Rumsfeld told reporters. "That's all you guys do is read these books, you ought to get a life."

Democrats in Washington have made campaign-season demands that Rumsfeld resign. Some Republicans have distanced themselves from what they see as an increasingly unpopular war.

Some lawmakers even have softened their opposition to a timeline for withdrawal from Iraq, which Rumsfeld emphatically opposes.

"We cannot reconstitute the armed forces without his removal," said Rep. Neil Abercrombie, D-Hawaii, last week. "While some might view this as a political attack, one cannot change defense policy without changing the person in charge."

In a new book, Watergate reporter Bob Woodward wrote that White House staff had encouraged President Bush to fire Rumsfeld after the 2004 election. Asked about that, Rumsfeld said he spoke personally with Bush, who offered his full support.

During the early days of the trip, Rumsfeld did his best to stay out of the spotlight — which was then focused on the U.S. intelligence report concluding that the Iraq war has fueled terrorists and increased the danger of attack.

He spent the initial 11-hour flight to Montenegro cloistered with staff and his wife, Joyce, in a private compartment. Later in the trip, an expected briefing with reporters in Portoroz, Slovenia, was abruptly canceled. He went straight to his hotel room.

When he faced reporters in the Balkans the next day, he scolded them for asking him too many questions at a press conference, rather than directing their queries to other NATO defense ministers on the stage.

Rumsfeld was in occasional pain from surgery that repaired his rotator cuff; at time, he had trouble sleeping. Still, Rumsfeld kept up a frenetic pace of private and public meetings with his defense counterparts.

"Any suggestion that the secretary is either distracted or slowing down is so far off the mark that it's just nutty," Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff said.

Indeed, the secretary kept a rigorous schedule during the four-country tour.

When he arrived in Montenegro, he met with leaders for a few hours, then took a quick hop to Albania, where he met with his defense counterparts from the region.

He stayed there overnight, then made the 90-minute flight to Slovenia, toured a horse farm, then spent two days in meetings with NATO defense ministers. He flew home to Washington late last Friday, only to turn around and fly to Nicaragua Sunday morning for two more days of meetings with Western hemisphere defense ministers.

En route home Tuesday evening, he met with staff in his office on the plane, with a 4-inch stack of manila folders on the desk in front of him and a bulging briefcase at his side.

With all that reading, there would be no time to peruse the lengthy critique of the war in Woodward's book.

"I didn't read it," said Rumsfeld. "Obviously I doubt that I will."

U.S. European Commander Confirms Quotes In Book (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0074977

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

One of the highest-ranking generals in the U.S. military yesterday stood by views attributed to him in a controversial new book about the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq but said it was important to understand the context in which those views were expressed.

Marine Gen. James L. Jones, the U.S. commander for Europe, is quoted in "State of Denial," by The Washington Post's Bob Woodward, as believing that the war in Iraq is a "debacle" and that "The Joint Chiefs have been systematically emasculated by Rumsfeld." As Marine commandant, the post he held before moving to Europe, Jones was a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The book also quotes Jones as delivering a warning about working with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to Marine Gen. Peter Pace, who was about to become chairman of the Joint Chiefs. "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder," Jones reportedly told Pace.

Jones's confirmation of Woodward's account is especially noteworthy because in the book, Pace denies that Jones made such remarks to him. Also, Jones's comments suggest that active-duty generals are beginning to criticize the defense secretary and the Iraq war with the harshness that several retired generals have used recently.

Speaking at a Washington meeting of the Council on Foreign Relations, Jones said he had a long discussion with Pace in Stuttgart, Germany, in September 2005, and then met with Woodward in Brussels that December. He characterized both Pace and Woodward as old friends. Speaking of the book's account of the September conversation, he said, "I don't challenge Bob's characterization of it, except that had I seen [the book], I probably would have suggested that the tone was more critical than I intended it to be."

Jones, who plans to retire in a few months, repeatedly declined to discuss the specific wording of his comments to Woodward about Iraq. "I'm not going to get into recollections of adjectives," he said. "I did talk about Iraq with a concern that Iraq deserves."

"I don't think that Iraq is a debacle," Jones told reporters after the meeting. "Iraq is a big problem."

Jones insisted there is a sharp distinction between his private comments and the criticisms made this year by retired generals. "I do not associate myself with the so-called revolt of the generals," he said. "I believe that general officers, both active and retired, have an obligation to let their views be known," but should do so in a "helpful" way.

The bottom line on his conversation with Pace, he said, was that it was "two friends talking, one trying to help the other."

Jones said he has not discussed the comments in the book with Rumsfeld, who has been traveling this week. "We're a team, we're together, we have occasional family disagreements," he said after the meeting.

Imperfect Picture Of Rumsfeld At War (FT)

By Jacob Weisberg

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

An interesting exercise, if you have a taste for Washington anthropology, is to track the treatment of any significant figure through the three volumes of Bob Woodward's Bush-the-Warrior trilogy. I spent Wednesday reading all the passages about Donald Rumsfeld, US secretary of defence.

In Mr Woodward's first instalment, Bush at War, published in 2002, Mr Rumsfeld is a hero of September 11 and the triumphant commander of the US victory in Afghanistan. Here Mr Rumsfeld is a seer ("In his early days as defence secretary, Rumsfeld had clearly anticipated that the United States was going to be surprised by some attack, perhaps something along the lines of September 11 . . . ") and a tower of strength (he "left no doubt in Bush's mind that when the moment came, as it surely would, that the United States was threatened, he, as secretary of defence, would be coming to the president to unleash the military").

When the attack comes, Mr Rumsfeld insists on holding an emergency meeting inside the burning Pentagon, moving to another office only when a general insists that "the smoke is getting pretty bad".

DOJ_NMG_0074978

Though one of Mr Woodward's hallmarks is never to tell readers what, or if, he thinks about anything, his adjectives give the game away.

On first encounter, Mr Rumsfeld is a "small framed, almost boyish, former Navy fighter pilot who did not look his 69 years". During his first tour as defence secretary under President Gerald Ford, Mr Woodward tells us that Mr Rumsfeld was "a JFK from the GOP (Republican party) – handsome, intense, well educated, with an intellectual bent and an infectious smile".

A few pages later he describes Mr Rumsfeld, with a degree of reverence reserved for his most gushing sources, as "a walking example of what the novelist Wallace Stegner calls 'resilience under disappointment', the persistence of drive, hard work and even stubbornness when ambition has not been fully realised". He is a demanding executive with a core of iron.

In Mr Woodward's second Bush book, Plan of Attack, published in 2004, Mr Rumsfeld retains his aura, though it is dimming slightly with the failure to find any weapons of mass destruction in occupied Iraq.

His subject remains "small, almost boyishly dashing", "focused" and "intense". He still has the infectious smile, though it can now "convey impatience, even condescension" when he is interrogating the sloppy thinking of the bureaucratic midgets around him. Mr Rumsfeld can be "tough, unpleasant, unrelenting", but usually in pursuit of "outside the box thinking" in a hidebound military establishment.

Now we have Mr Woodward's third work in the series, State of Denial. Mr Rumsfeld – embattled and clearly no longer a source for what happens behind the scenes – has misplaced his good looks, his decency and his brilliance.

He still has that "boyish intensity" – Mr Woodward never lets go of an epithet once he has bothered to work one out – but these days he is "cocky" and unreasonably confident, a man whose "micro-managing was almost comic". The story begins with him burying everyone at the Pentagon in "snowflakes", unsigned notes that are "an annoyance", "intrusive" and "petty".

This Rumsfeld is on a perpetual power-trip, dressing down underlings for the sheer, sadistic pleasure of it. "Shut up," he is recalled to have shouted at some hapless peon decades ago. "I don't want any excuses. You are through and you'll not have time to clean out your desk if this isn't taken care of." Subordinates describe him in unprintable terms.

By the end of the book, Mr Woodward himself is confronting Mr Rumsfeld over his unwillingness to admit the Iraqi insurgency is growing and that his decisions have cost many lives. "How could he not see his role and responsibility?" Mr Woodward ponders, winding up his interview. "I could think of nothing more to say."

Something Mr Woodward might say, if he wanted to admit reality himself, is that he has changed his mind about Mr Rumsfeld without Mr Rumsfeld changing an iota. Love him or hate him, the defence secretary is the Rock of Gibraltar. He will experience personal growth when Dick Cheney turns vegan. But somehow, the fixed qualities that Mr Woodward cast as positive in books one and two have curdled in book three.

Mr Woodward never acknowledges changing his mind because he regards himself as a reporting machine, with no opinions of his own. He cannot say he is revising his judgments because he claims never to have made any.

But of course, Mr Woodward does have a consistent world view – Washington's conventional wisdom. When everyone viewed Mr Rumsfeld as a commanding hunk, Mr Woodward embodied the adoration. Now that we all know Mr Rumsfeld is a vicious old bastard, Mr Woodward channels the loathing just as fluidly. If the war in Iraq takes a turn for the better, Rumsfeld the Stud might well come roaring back in Mr Woodward's Bush at War IV: Big Brass Ones.

It is slightly maddening to see Mr Woodward reverse his point of view without acknowledging that he ever had one – then or now. You could charge him with flattering politicians only when they are on top. But you might as well accuse a weather vane of changing its mind about which way the wind should blow.

The writer is editor of Slate.com

Sad Choice On Security: GOP Arrogance Vs. Democratic Weakness (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, October 5, 2006

Just when Republicans thought they had Democrats caught in another election-year "terror trap," The Washington Post's Bob Woodward sprung them by refocusing attention on the mess in Iraq.

That's the politics of national security. At the moment, the advantage would seem to favor Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0074979

But the grim reality of the situation makes the politics seems trivial. Voters have a choice between Congressional Republicans who rarely question a bull-headed, arrogant administration that's slowly losing the war in Iraq and Democrats who simply can't be trusted to fight the nation's enemies.

Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," follows several others that tell the same story: the U.S. went into Iraq with too few troops to secure the country; Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld refused to plan for a post-invasion occupation or the possibility of an insurgency and intimidated top generals into going along with his under-manning of the operation.

The book portrays President Bush as being willfully blind to the realities unfolding in Iraq — and deceptive in conveying them to Congress and the nation.

I think Woodward fails to credit the need for a president to defend his war policies for the sake of maintaining political support and troop morale. On the other hand, if he failed to ask incisive questions in private — and whack heads, where appropriate — he was not fulfilling his role as a strong wartime leader.

With a few exceptions — Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to Bush's right, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) to his left — Republicans in Congress publicly have saluted the Bush-Cheney-Rumsfeld policy, even if many of them muttered in private and failed to provide adequate oversight.

It's not fair to say — as Democrats do — that Bush policy has been "stay the course" without nuance or change. There have been tactical and strategic changes on the military and political level.

But it's still true that Iraq has never been made secure, that the level of violence is mounting and that Iraqi politicians seem incapable of fashioning a unified country. And Bush has failed to convince Americans to be patient for a long struggle.

At the same time, most Congressional Democrats have one policy: get out of this "quagmire" as fast as possible, regardless of the consequences. "Liberals" want out starting immediately. "Moderates" want out next year. Very few have positive ideas on how to win.

Moreover, it's hard not to conclude from their rhetoric last week that Democrats regard Bush and Co. as a greater menace to America's security and liberty than Osama bin Laden.

There's no question that the administration's initial approach to handling terrorist detainees was unacceptable in a democracy. It was strictly (and typically) an executive-branch and military process without recourse to the courts or Congress.

Once the Supreme Court struck down that approach, the Bush administration came up with a pre-election Congressional strategy to legalize the detainee program — as well as the National Security Agency's terrorist wiretapping program — that set a new trap for Democrats to show voters that they are "weak" on terrorism.

It was a reprise of the GOP's 2002 sudden support of a Department of Homeland Security and its fashioning of a fight over civil service rules into a test of strength against terrorism.

Again, this year, the Democrats walked right into it. In the debate, Democrats (and a few Republicans) basically argued that non-citizen terrorist captives deserve the same constitutional protections as domestic criminal defendants, fulfilling GOP caricatures that they don't really regard the war on terror as a war.

During the debate on NSA spying, Rep. Maurice Hinchey (D-N.Y.) declared that "this bill is contrary to every basic principle of our country. If we pass [it], we are opening up new opportunities for an increasingly despotic administration to continue to erode the basic freedoms and liberties of the American people."

On final passage, 177 House Democrats (and 13 Republicans) voted against the NSA program — which is designed to intercept international, not domestic, communications — and 160 Democrats (plus seven Republicans) voted against the military tribunals bills, as did 32 Senate Democrats and one Republican.

On Sept. 25, the Senate Democratic Policy Committee held a hearing at which three retired military officers, veterans of the Iraq War, excoriated Rumsfeld and called for his replacement.

But on the issue of what to do in Iraq, the officers did not hew to the Democratic line — or the Bush line. Maj. Gen. John Batiste declared: "There is no substitute for victory and I believe we must complete what we started in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton said, "We need a Manhattan Project" to equip Iraqi forces with better armor and weapons and triple the U.S. training force. The U.S. Army also needs 60,000 more personnel, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0074980

Col. Thomas Hammes said the U.S. actually has a good military strategy — "clear, hold and build" — but it lacks the troops and resources to accomplish it. He called for "putting the U.S. government on a war footing," with tax increases to pay for it. And, he said, success might take 10 years.

"If we fail in Iraq," he warned, "I am convinced that our children will pay for the mistake." Sectarian civil war will spread to other countries, he said, and they will send forces into Iraq to protect their interests. Sunni areas will become "Afghanistan on steroids" for terrorists. And Iran will dominate the Gulf.

Neither the Bush administration nor Congressional Democrats have the will to do what's necessary to salvage the situation. Regardless of who wins the November elections, America seems headed for a catastrophic strategic defeat in Iraq. It will be left to the next president to pick up the pieces.

The Ghost Of The Oval Office (NYT)

By James Mann

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

ON the surface, it sounds implausible: why would former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, the world's best-known proponent of balance-of-power diplomacy, give advice to the Bush administration, whose professed strategy and ideals run contrary to his philosophy?

And, conversely, why would the president and his aides consult Mr. Kissinger? After all, their National Security Strategy of 2006 dropped the idea that America should even pursue a balance of power. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice declared last year that the United States has abandoned 60 years of trying to "buy stability at the expense of democracy" in the Middle East. What could possibly be more un-Kissingerian? Mr. Kissinger has warned for decades against placing too much emphasis on democracy, human rights or moral values in foreign policy.

Yet Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," describes how Vice President Dick Cheney has met with Mr. Kissinger at least once a month, and President Bush has talked to Mr. Kissinger frequently. The book portrays the 83-year-old Mr. Kissinger as the single most frequent outside adviser to Mr. Bush on foreign policy. The meetings are not some recent innovation; previous news reports have indicated Mr. Kissinger advised the administration back in Mr. Bush's first term, too.

One might at first be tempted to attribute this curious relationship to the simple notion of elitism — the idea that there are only a handful of officials who have actually run American foreign policy and therefore only a few people for Messrs. Bush and Cheney to consult.

But this explanation doesn't hold up. Brent Scowcroft and Zbigniew Brzezinski, who served as national security advisers for Mr. Bush's father and for Jimmy Carter, respectively, are among the same foreign-policy elite (and Mr. Scowcroft, in particular, has long shared Mr. Kissinger's philosophical commitment to realism in foreign policy). Yet the Bush administration has consulted with neither of these men to the same extent as it has Mr. Kissinger, perhaps because both have openly challenged current foreign policy more than he has.

So Mr. Kissinger's role seems to be unique. Yet it is not all that surprising, when you look at his own history and that of previous administrations. Since Mr. Kissinger left government in 1977, he and several presidents have subtly made use of each other in similar fashion.

Differences in ideology have rarely been obstacles to the mutual seductions of the Kissinger Schmooze. Mr. Kissinger maintains his access to the White House and insider status, while administrations obtain a sense of validation for their policies.

It also helps for a president to know that he is keeping Mr. Kissinger on board — that even if Mr. Kissinger were to conclude that an administration's policies were dead wrong, or stupid, or directly contrary to his own philosophy, he wouldn't say so in public. (In 2002, Mr. Kissinger was reported in newspaper articles to have broken ranks with the Bush administration on Iraq; but Mr. Kissinger, quickly made plain that his views had been misinterpreted.)

Ronald Reagan campaigned against Mr. Kissinger in 1976 when he challenged President Gerald Ford in the Republican primaries, not only condemning Mr. Kissinger's policies but promising that if elected, he would replace him as secretary of state. But once Mr. Reagan won the Republican nomination in 1980 and went on to the White House, Mr. Kissinger's relationship to the Reagan administration was not an adversarial one.

DOJ_NMG_0074981

When President Reagan branded the Soviet Union an "evil empire," thus seeming to contradict both Mr. Kissinger's past policies and his views of foreign policy, Mr. Kissinger minimized the significance of the speech; he wrote that it was up to Soviet officials to choose when to be insulted. Mr. Reagan appointed Mr. Kissinger to head a bipartisan commission on Central America in an effort to build a consensus for his administration's policy.

Mr. Kissinger's advisory role has not been not confined to Republican administrations. When Bill Clinton, campaigning for the presidency in 1992, denounced the deadly 1989 crackdown on the Tiananmen Square demonstrations in Beijing, he took aim at the underpinnings of the China policy that Mr. Kissinger had established. Yet two years later, when President Clinton announced he was abandoning efforts to link China's trade benefits to improvements in human rights, aides reported that Mr. Kissinger had been one of Mr. Clinton's leading outside advisers.

Some might hypothesize that Mr. Kissinger's perpetual re-emergence as éminence grise reflects the tendency of presidents to change their views after taking office and gradually move in Mr. Kissinger's direction. That explanation would apply to Mr. Clinton's turnabout on China policy, for example. But the theory doesn't work so well for Mr. Reagan, who even late in his administration was out of tune with Mr. Kissinger. In 1987, Mr. Kissinger complained that the Reagan administration was moving unwisely towards an arms-control agreement with Mikhail Gorbachev; it was one of the few instances where Mr. Kissinger has taken on a president in public, and in that instance Mr. Kissinger did so in the role of a hawk.

The current Bush administration does not appear to have gone through any evolution towards Kissingerian realism, at least not if you look at the president's public remarks. Although Mr. Bush gave one speech invoking democratic ideals on the eve of the Iraq war, it was not until his second inaugural address, in January 2005, that he really made democratic freedom the centerpiece of his foreign policy. He has done so ever since. So rhetorically, at least, Mr. Bush has been moving further and further away from a Kissingerian foreign policy.

There remains the possibility that Mr. Bush's actual views may differ from his pro-democracy rhetoric. Perhaps he talks about democracy in public but not in private. If so, that would help explain why he has been so quiet about the regular meetings with Mr. Kissinger.

More likely, however, the president and Mr. Kissinger do not see any need to try to reconcile the chasm between the administration's avowed commitment to spreading democracy and Mr. Kissinger's career-long admonitions against any such efforts. Mr. Kissinger is like the Oval Office furniture; for presidents, he is always in the background. Advising the White House is what he does. And presidents usually seem to think that a part of conducting foreign policy is to talk to Mr. Kissinger, even if it goes nowhere.

James Mann, the author of "Rise of the Vulcans: The History of Bush's War Cabinet," is an author in residence at Johns Hopkins University's Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies.

Tenet's Coming Memoirs (WT)

By Michael F. Scheuer

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

With Bob Woodward's book "The Anger of the Court Historian Spurned" in hand, we now await a book by George Tenet, the former director of Central Intelligence, to be published later this fall. The book will be of great interest to Americans, not only because of the position Mr. Tenet held under Messrs. Clinton and Bush, but because the CIA apparently afforded him office space and access to documents so that he could prepare a thorough work. This, parenthetically, is special treatment that is not given to other CIA officials. Indeed, the agency apparently has accommodated the research needs of Mr. Tenet, while making tortuous the publication efforts of fine CIA officers like Gary Schroen and Gary Bernsten, men who risked their lives to protect Americans.

Mr. Tenet, in many ways, holds the keys to the kingdom; he was at the very center of the policy deliberations in two administrations that yielded the disasters of September 11 and Iraq. His personal knowledge base has the clear potential to give Americans some truth about the lead-up to those landmark events. It will be interesting to see whether he uses that knowledge to inform his fellow citizens or to burnish his reputation as the reliable friend of politicians in both parties, always ready to take the blame for the mistakes of others.

DOJ_NMG_0074982

From my own perspective, I look forward to Mr. Tenet's description of what he told Presidents Clinton and Bush on three issues: hunting for Osama bin Laden, the mistaken bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade and the likely consequences invading Iraq would have on the war on terrorism.

On bin Laden, Mr. Tenet deserves high marks for being involved in the nuts-and-bolts of the chase and for understanding the threat al Qaeda posed to America long before September 11. In internal CIA meetings on each occasion that arose to kill or capture bin Laden, Mr. Tenet was always gung-ho to attack and assured his lieutenants, and lesser-ranked officers like myself, that he understood that the intelligence we had acquired was precise but not perfect, but that we were quite unlikely to get any of better quality. On leaving for the NSC meetings called to decide about an attack on bin Laden, Mr. Tenet invariably assured us that he would tell the principals that the intelligence was a solid as it was going to get and that it was time to act. And when he returned to Langley, he invariably would say he had laid it on the line and the president and the NSC refused to act. Oddly, Mr. Clinton and Richard Clarke now claim that Mr. Tenet always professed strong uncertainty about the quality of the information CIA officers risked their lives to obtain. Mr. Tenet ought to use his book to set the record straight so CIA officers know that he was not lying to them.

While now just a blip on the historical screen, the Air Force's mistaken bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade resulted in the dismissal of a young, just-married CIA employee who had assembled targeting information on a building in Belgrade thought to be vital to the Serbian government. After the bombing, Mr. Tenet inexplicably accepted blame for the mistaken attack.

Now, everyone in the intelligence community knows that while many agencies nominate targets for attack in wartime situations, only the U.S. military can make the decision to attack, and that it only makes such a decision after military targeters have reviewed the information provided by other agencies and confirmed that it is valid and up to date. The question of why a young CIA employee's career was sacrificed for the military's failure is one Mr. Tenet ought in fairness to explain.

Finally, many of Mr. Tenet's subordinates at the CIA -- especially in the Counterterrorist Center -- advised him that the invasion of Iraq would break the back of America's war against the Sunni militant movement led and inspired by bin Laden. This advice did not claim that Iraq was not a threat, but simply that the invasion of Iraq manifestly amounted to the more-than-millennium-old predicate for a defensive jihad -- the unprovoked infidel invasion of a Muslim country.

Mr. Tenet was advised that whatever the threat was from Saddam Hussein, the invasion of Iraq would validate bin Laden's call for a jihad across the Sunni world and would speed the accomplishment of bin Laden's basic goal: transforming himself and al Qaeda from a man and an organization into a philosophy and a movement. I think all Americans would be interested in learning how the president and his cabinet reacted when Mr. Tenet presented this analysis to them.

So let's all look forward to Mr. Tenet's book and to seeing what he will make of the opportunity to talk frankly to Americans. What will it be Mr. Tenet, truth teller or apple polisher?

Michael F. Scheuer, a 22-year veteran with the CIA, created and served as the chief of the agency's Osama bin Laden unit at the Counterterrorist Center.

Attacks In Baghdad Kill 13 U.S. Soldiers In 3 Days (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 4 -- Thirteen U.S. soldiers have been killed in Baghdad since Monday, the American military reported, registering the highest three-day death toll for U.S. forces in the capital since the start of the war.

The latest losses -- four soldiers who were killed at 9 a.m. Wednesday by small-arms fire -- are part of a recent spike in violent attacks against U.S. forces that have claimed the lives of at least 24 soldiers and Marines in Iraq since Saturday, the military said.

The number of planted bombs is "at an all-time high," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a military spokesman, defying American efforts to stanch the vicious sectarian bloodshed in Baghdad that threatens to plunge the country into civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0074983

"This has been a hard week for U.S. forces," Caldwell said. "Unfortunately, as expected, attacks have steadily increased in Baghdad during these past weeks." Independent databases showed the three-day toll for American troops to be the highest in Baghdad so far.

U.S. military officials said the surge in violence could be partly attributed to the increased exposure of American forces as they patrol the dangerous streets of Baghdad to try to quell reprisal killings between Shiites and Sunnis. The number of troops in the capital has been doubled since June to support the Iraqi government's new security plan, said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, another military spokesman.

"When you go into bad neighborhoods, you'll have more attacks," said Lt. Col. James A. Gavrilis, a Special Forces officer and expert on the Iraqi insurgency. "If we have more people in one area, there will be an opportunity." He said enemy fighters "are reacting to an opportunity to attack."

Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for the Iraqi government, said another likely cause for the spike in American troop deaths was a recent call by the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, encouraging Iraqis to "eliminate the infidels and the apostates" during the current holy month of Ramadan.

Seventy-four soldiers and Marines were killed in Iraq in September, representing the highest monthly toll since April, when 76 died, according to the Iraq Coalition Casualty Count.

Army Maj. Gen. James D. Thurman, commander of the Multinational Division Baghdad, said two weeks ago that attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces in Baghdad had reached an average of 42 a day -- with about six causing casualties or equipment damage -- up from 36 or 38 attacks.

"Why are we seeing an increase in attacks?" he said. "Well, we have twice as many forces operating throughout the city now. We're challenging the anti-Iraqi forces where they live and operate."

The disclosure of heavy American losses came on another day of horrific violence for Iraqis, with at least 59 people killed in separate incidents across the country, Iraqi police said. The single deadliest attack took place at 11 a.m. in Ramadi, a Sunni insurgent stronghold in western Iraq, when a suicide bomber blew up his car at an Iraqi army base, killing at least 19 people and wounding 10, according to a police official.

Caldwell also announced yesterday that an entire Iraqi police brigade -- comprising an estimated 800 to 1,200 officers -- had been pulled out of service and placed under investigation for alleged complicity with death squads. On Sunday, gunmen burst into a food factory in Amil, a Baghdad neighborhood under the brigade's control, and kidnapped 26 workers.

"There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely when, in fact, they were supposed to have been impeding their movement," Caldwell said. "The government of Iraq had lost trust and confidence in the 8th Brigade, 2nd National Police Division's ability to serve the public due to their poor performance and alleged criminal wrongdoings."

The move appeared to represent a new effort by Iraqi officials to root out corruption in the Iraqi security forces, which are widely believed to be infiltrated by militias and death squads that do more to exacerbate sectarian tensions than protect citizens. Caldwell said the brigade will undergo "anti-militia, anti-sectarian violence and national unity training."

The brigade's commander might be charged with a crime, and the head of the unit's second regiment has already been arrested, said Brig. Abdul Kareem Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman. "They are both under investigation to know how all this happened without the security forces interfering to stop it," he said.

Also on Wednesday, a top aide to Moqtada al-Sadr said the anti-American cleric has specific information that U.S.-led coalition forces plan to launch a major attack on Sadr City, a Shiite slum in Baghdad filled with his followers.

"They want to turn it into mass graves similar to the previous ones conducted by the former regime," said the aide, Sahib al-Amery. "The occupation forces want to start a sectarian crisis on the pretext that there are Shiite militias."

The United States and Sadr have clashed frequently since the 2003 invasion, and some military officials have been calling for more aggressive moves against the Sadr-controlled Mahdi Army, which is considered to be a militia by nearly everyone in Iraq. On Wednesday, though, Amery disputed that characterization.

DOJ_NMG_0074984

"The Mahdi Army is a doctrinal and ideological army, not a militia," he said. "It has no camps or headquarters, and its weapons are self-owned by its members. We in the Shiite areas, we have no terrorist groups or organizations. These are found in the Sunni areas only."

Fight To Clear Baghdad Of Insurgents Gets Fiercer (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD — American casualties in Iraq are mounting as U.S. and Iraqi forces have stepped up a block-by-block battle to loosen the grip of militia violence on Baghdad. At least 19 American servicemembers have been killed in combat since Saturday, many of them in the capital, according to the Defense Department.

"This has been a hard week for U.S. forces," said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq. "We are all looking at that and are very much aware of it."

Four U.S. soldiers were killed by small-arms and indirect fire northwest of Baghdad on Wednesday. Indirect fire can refer to mortars or rockets. Eight American troops were killed in firefights and bombings Monday in Baghdad. It was the deadliest single day in the capital since July 2005.

U.S. and Iraqi forces are engaged in a high-stakes fight in Baghdad to clear out militias and insurgents.

"Certainly with this operation, we're hitting close to home and infringing on their freedom of movement and their ability to conduct these types of activities," said Lt. Col. Michelle Martin-Hing, a U.S. military spokeswoman in Iraq. "What we're seeing now is some push-back."

The increased presence of U.S. troops in the capital and the recent start of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month, may also account for the increase in American casualties, said Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, a U.S. battalion commander operating in northwest Baghdad.

Most of the violence in Baghdad, a city of 6 million, is the result of civil unrest. "Violence in Baghdad is the most prominent feature of the conflict in Iraq in this period, as Sunni and Shiite extremist death squads pursue their sectarian agendas," according to a Pentagon report to Congress.

Civilians also pay a heavy price. The report said the Baghdad coroner took in more than 1,800 bodies in July, 90% of whom appeared to have been assassinated.

A series of bombings in Baghdad on Wednesday killed 12 people.

Some of the death squads may be linked to Iraqi government security forces.

Wednesday, the U.S. command said Iraq's government suspended a brigade of up to 700 police officers for suspected involvement with death squads.

"There was some possible complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely when (the police brigade) should have been impeding them," Caldwell said. "The forces in the unit have not put their full allegiance to the government of Iraq and gave their allegiance to others."

The Iraqi Interior Ministry said that the commander of the unit, a lieutenant colonel, had been detained for investigation and that a major general had been suspended and ordered transferred.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the chief ministry spokesman, said a random selection of troops in the suspended unit was being investigated for ties to militias.

Baghdad Bombings Hit "All-time High" (WT)

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Bomb attacks in Baghdad have hit an all-time high, the U.S. military said yesterday, while the death toll throughout Iraq for American soldiers rose to 22 in the past four days.

Iraqi authorities for the first time pulled a brigade of about 700 policemen out of service yesterday for investigation of suspected ties to death squads.

The police face criminal vetting and lie detector tests as part of a "retraining" process designed to weed out militia members who have used the cover of their uniforms to kidnap, torture and commit mass murder, U.S. officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0074985

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the U.S. military spokesman, said the number of car bombs in Baghdad hit the highest level of the year last week and that bombs reported in general were "also at an all-time high."

The explosion of violence in Baghdad comes amid a major military operation by U.S. and Iraqi forces in the capital to stop bombings and tit-for-tat sectarian killings.

For the second time in two days, four U.S. soldiers were killed in a single incident around Baghdad, this time in what appears to have been a substantial skirmish involving mortars or rockets and gunfire to the northwest.

It took the American death toll in the past four days to 15 in and near Baghdad and 22 in total.

Gen. Caldwell described it as a "hard week" for U.S. forces, who typically suffer two to three deaths a day on average in Iraq.

Fourteen persons were killed and 75 wounded when a car bomb struck a government motorcade in Baghdad. Police said the industry minister, a Kurd, was in the motorcade but aides said no senior officials were in the convoy.

The blast in the Christian Karrada commercial area damaged buildings and left blood and mangled cars in the street.

The suspension of the police brigade was the first time the Iraqi government has taken such dramatic action to discipline security forces over possible links to militiamen.

Baghdad's Sunnis widely fear the Shi'ite-led police, saying they are infiltrated by militias and accusing them of cooperating with death squads who snatch Sunnis and kill them.

The brigade was responsible for a region of northeast Baghdad, where gunmen on Sunday kidnapped 24 workers from a frozen-food factory. Hours later, the bodies of seven of the workers were found dumped in a district miles away. Sunni politicians have said all those who were kidnapped were Sunnis; the region has a mixed population with a slight Shi'ite majority.

The Interior Ministry spokesman said the brigade was being investigated because it "didn't respond quickly" to the kidnapping. Sunnis blamed Shi'ite militias for the abduction and accused police of allowing the gunmen to escape and move freely with their captives.

Gen. Caldwell said the police brigade in the area had been ordered to stand down and was undergoing retraining. He said some were being investigated and that any found to have militia ties would be removed.

"The government of Iraq was very clear as we go through this process that if that [unit] comes out at 30 percent of what it went in with, that's OK," he told reporters.

"There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely when, in fact, they were supposed to have been impeding their movement," Gen. Caldwell said.

The suspended brigade had about 650 to 700 members, and the Interior Ministry said Tuesday that its commander of the unit, a lieutenant colonel, has been detained for investigation. The major general who oversees the brigade and two others in the area has been suspended temporarily and ordered transferred.

The U.S. military appeared to have a key role in getting the brigade sidelined. Gen. Caldwell said problems with the unit had emerged during a broad brigade-by-brigade assessment of police in Baghdad carried out by the U.S. military over the summer -- and the decision to act was made by the Interior Ministry on Tuesday.

The sectarian spiral of revenge killings between Shi'ites and Sunnis has become the deadliest violence in Iraq, with thousands slain in recent months. "Over the past three months, murders and executions [by death squads] have caused the majority of civilian deaths in Iraq," Gen. Caldwell said.

Car bombs, as well as other explosions and shootings, killed 34 persons across the country yesterday.

Gen. Caldwell said the number of car bombs and roadside bombs that went off or had been found and defused over the past week was the highest this year. He declined to give firm numbers, but said, "The trend line has been up over the last couple of months."

But he also said the military has killed or captured an increasing number of suspected members of al Qaeda in Iraq, the most feared Sunni insurgent group. In September, 110 al Qaeda suspects were killed and 520 detained -- including a driver of the group's leader, Abu Ayyub Masri, captured on Sept. 28.

Iraqis Suspend Police Brigade (LAT)

By Kim Murphy And Doug Smith

DOJ_NMG_0074986

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi authorities said Wednesday that they have suspended an entire brigade of as many as 1,200 police officers for suspected connections to kidnappings and executions.

The Interior Ministry said it would recall and retrain the national police's 8th Brigade, based in the capital, after witnesses reported that men wearing police uniforms were behind the kidnapping Sunday of 26 workers at a south Baghdad meat processing plant.

Six of the workers later were found dead. One who had been shot and left for dead apparently crawled away to a military checkpoint, authorities said.

The decommissioning comes after street protests erupted at one of the police unit's checkpoints in the capital, and U.S. military officials requested that one of the three battalions in the brigade be recalled.

"There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely, when in fact they were supposed to be impeding their movement, that perhaps they did not respond as rapidly when reports were made," said Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for the U.S.-led coalition forces in Iraq.

He said the Iraqi government had "lost trust and confidence in the ... division's ability to serve the public due to their poor performance and alleged criminal wrongdoings."

The decommissioning is the latest in a series of moves being undertaken by Iraqi and U.S. military authorities to combat the possible infiltration by insurgents or sectarian combatants into Iraq's army and security services.

The crackdown on the police came on another deadly day for U.S. troops, four of whom were killed by small-arms fire while on patrol northwest of Baghdad, according to U.S. military authorities. A fifth soldier died of wounds sustained a day earlier near Kirkuk, bringing the total since Saturday to 21 U.S. military fatalities.

Nationwide, nine Iraqi police officers died in violence. Six were killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdadi, in Al Anbar province. One was killed and three were wounded during a demonstration at a police station in central Baghdad. Two more died in an attack on a police patrol in Baqubah, north of the capital.

In Baghdad, a car bomb apparently aimed at a convoy belonging to Industry Minister Fawzi Hariri killed 14 civilians and injured more than 70. Hariri wasn't in the car.

Ministry of Health statistics released Wednesday show that 2,667 civilians died violently in September, and 2,994 were injured, a level consistent with the summer's high monthly tallies. A substantial number of them fell victim to death squads, which often pull passersby off sidewalks, seize people from their homes, or drag motorists out of their cars. Their bodies often are found with gunshot wounds and bearing signs of torture.

Authorities said they had documented a near-record number of bomb attacks, including both car bombs and roadside explosives.

Government and military officials increasingly fear that the police and other security services have links to corruption and sectarian violence. Since June, the Interior Ministry has fired 1,700 officers suspected of corruption, abuse of authority or other violations, a ministry spokesman told The Times.

In the incident Sunday at the frozen-meat processing plant in the south Baghdad neighborhood of Amil, about half a dozen men claiming to be police officers entered and began asking employees for identification cards before ordering most of them into a truck and driving away.

At another location, the employees were beaten and then separated into Sunnis and Shiites, with the Shiites permitted to leave, according to a survivor who was interviewed by investigators from the 172nd Stryker Brigade Combat Team.

A military source said the kidnappers asked one man, "Why are you working with these Sunnis?" before releasing him.

All of the shooting victims were Sunnis.

Cartridge casings found at the scene of the kidnapping match those used in handguns carried by Iraqi police, but differ from those most commonly used on the street, military investigators said.

Wednesday's actions came after Army Lt. Col. John Norris, commander of the 172nd Stryker Brigade's 23rd forward battalion, issued a request to decommission the first of the Iraqi unit's three battalions.

U.S. military officials said the Interior Ministry already had opened an investigation of possible connections or cooperation between the brigade and death squads operating in the capital, and it moved to decommission the unit after the protests and Norris' request.

"The case that was building against the 8th Brigade of the Iraqi national police that works in Amil was based on corruption, infiltration, complacency and possibly committing sectarian murders in their area of responsibility," Norris said in an interview.

"They set up checkpoints throughout the town, they run patrols throughout their area of responsibility, so the question that begs to be answered is, why were they having such a spike in murders in their area?" he said. "When they have a significant number of checkpoints that should facilitate controlling traffic and providing security."

He said the apparent disparity raised a question: "Are they contributing to security, or are they causing the poor security conditions?"

Interior Ministry spokesman Alaa Taie said the decommissioning and retraining will allow the government to determine whether charges lodged against the police unit have any basis.

"Were there deficiencies and failures that resulted in the kidnapping ... and is it true that there was cooperation between the police and the militias? This is what we hope to find out," he said.

A report for the Council on Foreign Relations last year said there was "widespread" infiltration of security forces by insurgents, including hard-core fighters who slipped through the hiring checks and sympathizers who helped militias and insurgents. Some police appeared to help the insurgents out of intimidation and fear, the report said.

U.S. authorities who were overseeing the early formation of the police forces were forced to rely on local expertise in evaluating who was suitable, said report author Sharon Otterman, former associate director of the council.

"The other big issue is who, exactly, were they trying to keep out of the forces? At the beginning, it was more a concern of looking for former Baathists," she said. "Now what we're seeing is infiltration of every kind of group — the Shia militias, not to mention the Sunnis, and everybody else."

Sunni lawmakers have complained of Shiite infiltration of security services not only in Baghdad, but in many quarters of Iraq. Others complain that Sunni Aran militias are working hand in hand with the police to target other groups.

"The security has deteriorated, and the fact is clear that these infiltrations are partly responsible," said Mohammed Daini, a Sunni member of parliament. Daini has alleged that senior army officers in the Diyala region appear to have connections to Shiite militias or the Iranian Revolutionary Guard.

"There is an outrageous intervention by Iranian intelligence [in the police]," Daini said. "We can say that death squads are inside the Iraqi government, through their existence in the army and the police. And this is known to the Americans."

U.S. military officials said members of the 8th Brigade would be retrained by Iraqis under U.S. guidance, and some officers might lose their jobs or face prosecution.

Taie said authorities had not received any direct evidence that sectarian militias had infiltrated the police brigade, but he said the issue of infiltration was "natural" with a police force formed under conditions of chaos, constant threat and sectarian violence.

"When you try to found an institution under terrible circumstances of disturbed security, infiltrations can be possible," he said. "But it's important that the Ministry of Interior and the elected government are working to restore security and follow up on not only the corruptors, but the terrorists."

Iraq Suspends Police Brigade In Baghdad (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 4 — The Iraqi Interior Ministry has suspended an entire Iraqi police brigade on suspicions that some members may have permitted, or even participated in, death squad killings, American military and Iraqi government officials said Wednesday.

The move was seen as the furthest Iraqi officials have ever come toward tackling the festering problem of militias thought to be operating within the ranks of its own largely Shiite forces.

DOJ_NMG_0074988

The suspension involved the transfer of about 800 special police commandos out of their base in the Aalam neighborhood in western Baghdad to a training site north of the capital. The troops were not disarmed, according to an Iraqi Interior Ministry spokesman, but two of their most senior commanders were detained.

American officials have been pressing the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki for months to take action against the militias, but they have proved difficult to dislodge, in part because so many are affiliated with Iraqi political parties. His interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani, was appointed for his relative independence from the parties, but as a result he lacks essential political backing to enforce his will.

Murders and executions carried out by the death squads are the main cause of Iraqi deaths now, according to the American military. Putting a stop to the killings is at the heart of American military policy.

Deaths of American troops continued to rise, with six more announced by the military on Wednesday, five of them in Baghdad. American deaths have spiked recently as the military sweeps Baghdad, home to a quarter of Iraq's population of some 25 million, trying to bring the violence under control. The deaths bring the total troops who have died since Saturday to 23.

The suspended unit is the 8th Brigade Second Division of the Iraqi national police, which is known by its nickname, Falcon. It fell under suspicion after a large-scale kidnapping was carried out largely unhindered in its area of operation on Sunday, an Interior Ministry spokesman said. In that case, 26 workers were marched out of a frozen food factory in the Amel neighborhood. The bodies of at least 10 of them were found soon after.

The brigade "did nothing to follow the kidnappers or fight them," said the spokesman, Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf, and so Mr. Bolani removed the brigade commander and a battalion commander on Tuesday, he said.

Iraqi officials said the brigade commander, Najim Juma al-Eqabi, was under review for management failings, and that the battalion commander, who was not identified, had been taken into police custody, apparently under suspicion of deeper involvement.

Justice for those implicated in sectarian killings and abuse has been elusive in the past, and it remains to be seen whether suspicions about the unit or its commanders will result in legal action. Arrest warrants for 52 Iraqis, including one division commander, have been issued, but none so far have been carried out. It was not clear on Wednesday night whether the two commanders were among them.

Mass kidnappings have become relatively common, but this is the first time the Iraqi government has taken any kind of serious action against official forces that should have prevented or responded to one.

"It's significant to take a whole brigade offline," said Mathew Sherman, a former senior State Department adviser to the Interior Ministry. "They have finally collected enough intelligence, and enough U.S. pressure has been exerted, that they are taking action."

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief American military spokesman in Iraq, said the unit had been operating in an area where American sweeps had not reduced the number of killings. The brigade operated in the neighborhoods of Bayaa, Saidiya, Amel, and Turath, General Khalaf said.

General Caldwell, who announced the unit's suspension at a news conference on Wednesday, said, "There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death-squad elements to move freely when in fact they were supposed to have been impeding their movement, that perhaps they did not respond as rapidly when reports were made."

An American military official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said that some of the members of the unit had been directly implicated in death-squad killings.

The war here has evolved from spectacular suicide bombings with heavy fatalities carried out mainly by Sunni radicals to secret neighborhood revenge killings done by death squads of both sects. The Shiites squads have posed a particularly difficult challenge, in part because they have infiltrated the forces of the government itself. Sunni Arab detainees have long charged that Shiites seeking revenge are operating torture chambers in Interior Ministry prisons. Shiites in the ministry have said such allegations are exaggerated.

A human rights report published by the United Nations mission in Iraq found clear evidence of systematic abuse and torture at a prison in eastern Baghdad known as Site 4, where more than 1,400 prisoners were reported to be crowded into a small area. American officials have been pressing the Iraqi government to bring those responsible to justice.

DOJ_NMG_0074989

One American lever of last resort is the Leahy Law, which prohibits the financing of foreign security forces that commit "gross violations of human rights" and are not brought to justice. American officials have acknowledged that they have warned the Iraqi government that aid might be curtailed if it does not comply.

General Caldwell also announced some progress in the effort against Sunni Arab insurgents. The driver and personal assistant of Abu Ayyub al-Masri, an Egyptian who has been identified by the American military as the new leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, was captured in Baghdad on Sept. 28. General Caldwell said the man was suspected of having helped plan the bombings of two hotels in Baghdad last year, the Sheraton and the Hamra.

On Wednesday, at least 14 Iraqis were killed and more than 80 wounded in and around Baghdad, most in a triple bomb attack on an Interior Ministry convoy. The minister was not injured, but three of his guards were killed, officials said. A suicide bomber detonated near an Iraqi Army base in Ramadi, in western Iraq, killing only himself, [a news organization] reported.

Iraq Pulls A Police Brigade For Alleged Involvement In Death Squads (MCT)

By Jay Price

McClatchy Newspapers, October 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The Iraqi government has pulled an entire national police brigade of about 700 officers out of Baghdad because so many of its members appeared to be involved in sectarian killings, the U.S. military said Wednesday.

Removing the brigade would immediately improve security in the city, said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell IV, a spokesman for the U.S. military in Baghdad. Caldwell also said that a weekend curfew had helped reduce the number of dead Iraqis discovered throughout Baghdad this week.

But U.S. fatalities in Baghdad have remained high, with 18 American soldiers killed since Saturday, Caldwell said. Eight of them died on Monday - the highest single-day death toll in more than a year.

Last week also set a record for the number of car bombs and roadside bombs that exploded or were disarmed, Caldwell said. He declined to provide precise numbers, however.

At least 12 people were killed and 70 injured on Wednesday when two roadside bombs exploded in southeast Baghdad as a convoy from the Ministry of Industry passed by. As emergency workers rushed to the area, a second bomb detonated. Three of the dead were guards for the industry minister, but the minister wasn't in the convoy at the time.

In Diyala Province, gunmen going door to door with gasoline containers burned down 22 houses in the past two days, police said. The latest seven to be torched were in Abu Seda village, where the bodies of seven members of the same family were also found Wednesday morning.

Caldwell said Iraqi officials ordered the police brigade from Baghdad after 26 workers, most of them Sunni Muslims, were kidnapped Sunday from a meat-packing plant in a neighborhood the brigade was supposed to be protecting. The next day, uniformed gunmen driving what appeared to be government trucks kidnapped 14 people from a shopping district that specialized in computers.

Sunnis long have claimed that security forces laced with members of Shiite Muslim militias are responsible for many of the killings and kidnappings that have become rampant in this city. About 100 Sunnis demonstrated Wednesday in the neighborhood where the meat plant was located, carrying signs saying that the security forces should leave.

Caldwell said it was clear that officers from the unit, the 8th Brigade, 2nd National Police Division, had turned a blind eye to the death squads operating with their force. In some cases, he said, the brigade let killers move freely in the neighborhoods. The brigade also may have been slow intentionally to investigate reports of the killings and kidnappings.

Some of the officers are now subjects of investigations, Caldwell said.

Iraqi leaders made the decision late Tuesday night to order the unit shipped out for "retraining," and on Wednesday the brigade was taken to a training camp north of the city, Caldwell said. The police officers would be thoroughly questioned, given lie detector tests and their criminal histories checked.

Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf, a spokesman for the Iraqi Ministry of Interior, which oversees the police, said the brigade's commander had been detained for questioning.

DOJ_NMG_0074990

Caldwell said that the decision to withdraw the unit was initiated by the Iraqis, but that U.S. troops first detected problems in September during a routine evaluation of each of the country's 27 national police brigades. That evaluation included checks of the units' equipment and interviews with residents in the neighborhoods they patrolled.

Coalition forces also announced Wednesday that they'd captured a former driver and personal assistant of the al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Ayyub al Masri, along with 31 others during a series of raids on Sept. 28. He was the second Masri associate captured in September.

Iraq Pulls Police Brigade Out Of Service (AP)

By David Rising

AP, October 4, 2006

Iraqi authorities pulled a brigade of about 700 policemen out of service Wednesday in its biggest move ever to uproot troops linked to death squads, aiming to signal the government's seriousness in cleansing Baghdad of sectarian violence.

The government move came amid steadily mounting violence, particularly in the capital. A U.S. military spokesman said the past week had seen the highest number of car bombs and roadside bombs in Baghdad this year.

Four U.S. soldiers patrolling in Baghdad were killed by gunmen on Wednesday, the U.S. military said, also announcing the deaths of two other soldiers a day earlier in Baghdad and the northern city of Kirkuk. The deaths brought to 21 the number of Americans killed in combat since Saturday.

The suspension of the police brigade was the first time the Iraqi government has taken such dramatic action to discipline security forces over possible links to militiamen, though some individual soldiers have been investigated in the past. Baghdad's Sunnis widely fear the Shiite-led police, saying they are infiltrated by militias and accusing them of cooperating with death squads who snatch Sunnis and kill them.

The brigade was responsible for a region of northeast Baghdad with a slight Shiite majority, where gunmen on Sunday kidnapped 24 workers from a frozen food factory. Hours later, the bodies of seven of the workers were found dumped in a district miles away.

Sunni politicians have said all those who were kidnapped were Sunnis. They blamed Shiite militias for the abduction and accused police of allowing the gunmen to escape and move freely with their captives.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the chief ministry spokesman, said the brigade was being investigated because it "didn't respond quickly" to the kidnapping.

The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, said the police brigade in the area had been ordered to stand down and was undergoing retraining. He said some were being investigated and that any found to have militia ties would be removed.

"The government of Iraq was very clear as we go through this process that if that (unit) comes out at 30 percent of what it went in with, that's OK with the government of Iraq," he told a Baghdad news conference.

"There is clear evidence that there was some complicity in allowing death squad elements to move freely when, in fact, they were supposed to have been impeding their movement," Caldwell said.

The U.S. military appeared to have a key role in getting the brigade sidelined. Caldwell said problems with the unit had emerged during a broad brigade-by-brigade assessment of police in Baghdad carried out by the U.S. military over the summer — and the decision was made by the Interior Ministry to act Tuesday.

U.S. forces have been carrying out raids and arrests of militia members for the past month as part of a wide-scale U.S.-Iraqi sweep of Baghdad launched in August, which has seen the number of American troops in the capital double.

Forces have been moving from neighborhood to neighborhood, searching houses, confiscating weapons and arranging services like water and electricity for residents in an attempt to stop sectarian violence and insurgent attacks. The rise in U.S. deaths in recent days may be linked to their increased presence in the capital, commanders have said.

But at the same time, Sunnis have accused the Shiite-led government of balking at sending its security forces against the Shiite militias, many of which are linked to parties in the coalition.

DOJ_NMG_0074991

The suspended brigade had about 650-700 members, and the Iraqi Interior Ministry said Tuesday that its commander of the unit, a lieutenant colonel, has been detained for investigation. The major general who oversees the brigade and two others in the area has been suspended temporarily and ordered transferred.

Khalaf said a random selection of troops in the suspended unit were being investigated for ties to militias.

The sectarian spiral of revenge killings between Shiites and Sunnis has become the deadliest violence in Iraq, with thousands slain in recent months. "Over the past three months, murders and executions (by death squads) have caused the majority of civilian deaths in Iraq," Caldwell said.

The violence has also threatened to undermine the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki as Shiite and Sunni parties in his coalition accuse each other of backing militias.

On Monday, al-Maliki announced a new security plan to unite the feuding parties, creating local committees in which Sunnis and Shiites will work together to manage efforts to stop the violence on a district-by-district level.

But contentious details of the plan still must be worked out — and Shiite and Sunni parties for a second day on Wednesday put off negotiations.

At the same time, Sunni-led insurgents have continued their attacks targeting civilians, Iraqi officials and U.S. and Iraqi troops.

Car bombs, as well as other explosions and shootings, killed 34 people across the country Wednesday. In the deadliest attack, a string of two bombs and an explosive-packed vehicle blew up in a district of stores and auto shops in a mainly Christian neighborhood of Baghdad, killing 12 people and wounding 56, police said.

Hours later, after sunset and the end of the day's Ramadan fast, gunmen opened fire on a popular cafe in an overwhelmingly Shiite district of southeast Baghdad, killing four patrons and wounding seven others.

Caldwell said the number of car bombs and roadside bombs that went off or had been found and defused over the past week was the highest this year. He declined to give firm numbers, but said, "The trend line has been up over the last couple of months."

But he also said the military has killed or captured an increasing number of suspected members of al-Qaida in Iraq, the most feared Sunni insurgent group. In September, 110 al-Qaida suspects were killed and 520 detained — including a driver of the group's leader, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, captured on Sept. 28.

Military Hones A New Strategy On Insurgency (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 — The United States Army and Marines are finishing work on a new counterinsurgency doctrine that draws on the hard-learned lessons from Iraq and makes the welfare and protection of civilians a bedrock element of military strategy.

The doctrine warns against some of the practices used early in the war, when the military operated without an effective counterinsurgency playbook. It cautions against overly aggressive raids and mistreatment of detainees. Instead it emphasizes the importance of safeguarding civilians and restoring essential services, and the rapid development of local security forces.

The current military leadership in Iraq has already embraced many of the ideas in the doctrine. But some military experts question whether the Army and the Marines have sufficient troops to carry out the doctrine effectively while also preparing for other threats.

The subtleties of the battle were highlighted Wednesday when the Iraqi Interior Ministry suspended a police brigade on suspicion that some members had been involved in death squads. The move was the most serious step Iraqi officials had taken to tackle the festering problem of militias operating within ministry forces. [Page A19.]

The new doctrine is part of a broader effort to change the culture of a military that has long promoted the virtues of using firepower and battlefield maneuvers in swift, decisive operations against a conventional enemy.

“The Army will use this manual to change its entire culture as it transitions to irregular warfare,” said Jack Keane, a retired four-star general who served in 2003 as the acting chief of staff of the Army. “But the Army does not have nearly enough resources, particularly in terms of people, to meet its global responsibilities while making such a significant commitment to irregular warfare."

DOJ_NMG_0074992

The doctrine is outlined in a new field manual on counterinsurgency that is to be published next month. But recent drafts of the unclassified documents have been made available to The New York Times, and military officials said that the major elements of final version would not change.

The spirit of the document is captured in nine paradoxes that reflect the nimbleness required to win the support of the people and isolate insurgents from their potential base of support — a task so complex that military officers refer to it as the graduate level of war.

Instead of massing firepower to destroy Republican Guard troops and other enemy forces, as was required in the opening weeks of the invasion of Iraq, the draft manual emphasizes the importance of minimizing civilian casualties. "The more force used, the less effective it is," it notes.

Stressing the need to build up local institutions and encourage economic development, the manual cautions against putting too much weight on purely military solutions. "Tactical success guarantees nothing," it says.

Noting the need to interact with the people to gather intelligence and understand the civilians' needs, the doctrine cautions against hunkering down at large bases. "The more you protect your force, the less secure you are," it asserts.

The military generally turned its back on counterinsurgency operations after the Vietnam War. The Army concentrated on defending Europe against a Soviet attack. The Marines were focused on expeditionary operations in the third world.

"Basically, after Vietnam, the general attitude of the American military was that we don't want to fight that kind of war again," said Conrad C. Crane, the director of the military history institute at the Army War College, a retired Army lieutenant colonel and one of the principal drafters of the new doctrine. "The Army's idea was to fight the big war against the Russians and ignore these other things."

A common assumption was that if the military trained for major combat operations, it would be able to easily handle less violent operations like peacekeeping and counterinsurgency. But that assumption proved to be wrong in Iraq; in effect, the military without an up-to-date doctrine. Different units improvised different approaches. The failure by civilian policy makers to prepare for the reconstruction of Iraq compounded the problem.

The limited number of forces was also a constraint. To mass enough troops to storm Falluja, an insurgent stronghold, in 2004, American commanders drew troops from Haditha, another town in western Iraq. Insurgents took advantage of the Americans' limited numbers to attack the police there. Iraqi policemen were executed, dealing a severe setback to efforts to build a local force.

Frank G. Hoffman, a retired Marine infantry officer who works as a research fellow at an agency at the Marine base at Quantico, Va., said that in 2005, the Marines sometimes lacked sufficient forces to safeguard civilians. As a result, while these forces were often effective "in neutralizing an identifiable foe, they could not stay and work with the population the way the classical counterinsurgency would suggest."

The effort to develop the new program began a year ago under Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, commander of the Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, former commander of the Marine Corps Combat Development Command and the current chief of the First Marine Expeditionary Force. Colonel Crane, Lt. Col. John A. Nagl and Col. Douglas King of the Marines were among the major drafters.

Academics and experts from private groups were asked for input. A draft was completed in June and was circulated for comment. Almost 800 responses were received, but military officials said they would not alter the substance of the new doctrine.

"We are codifying the best practices of previous counterinsurgency campaigns and the lessons we have learned from Iraq and Afghanistan to help our forces succeed in the current fight and prepare for the future," Colonel Nagl said.

In drafting the doctrine, the military drew upon some of the classic texts on counterinsurgency by the likes of T. E. Lawrence of Arabia, and David Galula, whose ideas were partly informed by his experience in Algeria.

Colonel Crane said that many of the ideas adopted for the manual had been percolating throughout the military. "In many ways, this is a bottom-up change, " he said. "The young soldiers who had been through Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia, Kosovo, and now Iraq and Afghanistan, understood why we need to do this."

DOJ_NMG_0074993

As the manual is being drafted, the military has also revised the curriculum at its war colleges and training ranges to emphasize counterinsurgency. At the National Training Center in California, the old tank-on-tank war games against a Soviet-style enemy have been supplanted by combat rehearsals in which troops on their way to Iraq and Afghanistan engage in mock operations with role players who simulate insurgents, militias and civilians.

Dennis Tighe, a training program manager for the Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, said the rehearsals were vital for preparing troops for their new counterinsurgency mission. But the Army is stretched so thin and so many units are focused on rehearsing for Iraq and Afghanistan at the training center that concerns have grown that the Army may be raising a new group of young officers with little experience in high-intensity warfare against heavily equipped armies like North Korea.

"That is one of the things folks are a little concerned about," Mr. Tighe said.

While the counterinsurgency doctrine attempts to look beyond Iraq, it cites as a positive example the experience in 2005 of the Army's Third Armored Cavalry Regiment, which worked with Iraqi security forces to clear Tal Afar of insurgents, to hold the town with Iraqi and American troops, then to encourage reconstruction there, an approach known as "clear, hold, build."

One military officer who served in Iraq said American units there generally carried out the tenets of the emerging doctrine when they had sufficient forces. But protecting civilians is a troop-intensive task. He noted that there were areas in which there were not enough American and Iraqi troops to protect Iraqis adequately against intimidation, a central element of the counterinsurgency strategy.

"The units that have sufficient forces are applying the doctrine with good effect," said the officer, who is not authorized to speak on military policy. "Those units without sufficient forces can only conduct raids to disrupt the enemy while protecting themselves. They can't do enough to protect the population effectively and partner with Iraqi forces."

"Just A Comma" Becomes Part Of Iraq Debate (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz., Oct. 4 -- When the president speaks, every word can be subject to scrutiny. Even the punctuation marks.

As he heads out on the campaign trail, haunted by an unpopular war, President Bush has begun reassuring audiences that this traumatic period in Iraq will be seen as "just a comma" in the history books. By that, aides say, he means to reinforce his message of resolve in the long struggle for Iraqi democracy.

But opponents of the war have seized on the formulation, seeing it as evidence that Bush is indifferent to suffering. To them, it sounds as if the president is dismissing more than 2,700 U.S. troop deaths as "just a comma." And a lively Internet debate has broken out about the origins of the phrase, with some speculating that Bush means it as a coded message to religious supporters, evoking the aphorism "Never put a period where God has put a comma."

Presidential utterances have long drawn enormous notice. But instant transcripts and the Internet have focused an even more powerful microscope on the nation's leader. The approaching midterm elections have intensified the already close scrutiny of the president's words as he sharpens his rhetoric.

As Bush wound up a three-day campaign swing out west on Wednesday, for example, he attacked Democrats for voting last week against legislation authorizing warrantless telephone and e-mail surveillance.

"One hundred and seventy-seven of the opposition party said, 'You know, we don't think we ought to be listening to the conversations of terrorists,' " Bush said at a fundraiser for Rep. Rick Renzi (R-Ariz.) before heading to Colorado for gubernatorial candidate Bob Beauprez.

Asked about the president's statement, White House aides could not name any Democrat who has said that the government should not listen in on terrorists. Democrats who voted against the legislation had complained that it would hand too much power to the president and had said that they wanted more checks in the bill to protect civil liberties.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) called Bush's comment outrageous: "Every member of Congress, from both parties, supports listening in on terrorist communications, but the president still hasn't explained why we have to break the law to do it. It is time for the president to stop exploiting the terrorist threat to justify his power grab."

DOJ_NMG_0074994

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino defended Bush's remark as a reasonable extrapolation of the Democratic position. "Of course, they aren't silly enough to say they don't want to listen in on terrorists, but actions speak louder than words, and people should know what the Democrats' voting record is," she said.

The comma remark, though, offers an especially intriguing case study in how a few words can trigger many interpretations. Bush used it in an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer aired on Sept. 24 in talking about Iraq. He noted the bloodshed shown on television but hailed the resiliency of the Iraqi people and cited the election last December in which 12 million came to the polls despite the violence.

"Admittedly, it seems like a decade ago," Bush went on. "I like to tell people when the final history is written on Iraq, it will look like just a comma because there is -- my point is, there's a strong will for democracy." The president used a similar line at a campaign event last week in Alabama and again on Tuesday in Stockton, Calif.

Critics of Bush began e-mailing and blogging about the remark within minutes of the CNN interview. The Carpetbagger Report blog called it stunning "even by Bush's already-low standards" and added: "Everything we're seeing is 'just a comma.' I'm sure that will bring comfort to the families of those who have sacrificed so much for Bush's mistakes."

Then Ian Welsh, on his Agonist blog, postulated a theory about the hidden meaning of the comment, citing the "never put a period" saying and calling it a "dog whistle" comment that only some would understand: "He is constantly littering his speeches with code words and phrases meant for the religious right. Other people don't hear them, but they do, and most of the time it allows Bush both to say what those who aren't evangelical or born again want to hear, while still reassuring the religious right [what it] wants to hear."

But it turns out that the phrase "never put a period" originated not with a Christian conservative figure or biblical passage but with Gracie Allen, the comedienne wife of George Burns. And the phrase is a favorite not of the religious right but of the religious left. The United Church of Christ, which is devoted to fighting for what it calls social justice and opposes the war, adopted the phrase in January 2002.

"I needed something short and succinct," said Ron Buford, the marketing director who came up with it. "When I saw the Gracie Allen quote, I was up all night thinking about it -- God is still speaking, there's more for us to know."

When he heard about Bush's comment, Buford was stunned. "It's ironic that, as sawy as they are about using these quotes to strengthen their base, that he would use a quote that we've been using lately," Buford said.

Aides said it is ridiculous to believe Bush is sending subliminal messages. "People have too much time on their hands," said Bush counselor Dan Bartlett. "I can assure you, you don't need a secret decoder ring to decipher what he's saying."

All Bush means, he said, is the struggle to build Iraqi democracy will take years. "He's making a historical analysis -- that these brief periods seem long and protracted now, but when you look back at them in history, they won't seem that way. He's definitely not discounting the loss of life or the sacrifice people are making."

Troops Polled Say Armed Forces Stretched Too Thin Overseas (PPG)

By Jerome L. Sherman

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A solid majority of American soldiers returning from the fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan say that U.S. armed forces are stretched too thin, according to a poll released yesterday by a veterans group.

VoteVets.org , a group headed by an Army reservist based near Pittsburgh, found that 63 percent of veterans of both conflicts describe the Army and Marine Corps as "overextended," while many soldiers also complained about encountering emotional and physical problems when they came back from active duty.

"We hope that this poll is a wake-up call for Congress," said Jon Soltz , who served in Iraq in 2003 and is now a captain with a reserve unit at the Charles E. Kelly Support Facility in Oakdale and chairman of VoteVets.

At a news conference in Washington yesterday, Mr. Soltz was joined by Gen. Wesley Clark, a former NATO commander and one-time Democratic presidential candidate, who said the federal government isn't providing sufficient resources to support the troops on the battlefield.

DOJ_NMG_0074995

It's a charge that Army officials hotly deny, pointing toward huge expenditures for body armor, fortified transport vehicles and expanded mental health programs. Last week, Congress approved a $447 billion defense spending bill for 2007, including $70 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The United States has about 150,000 troops deployed in both countries.

"Obviously the U.S. Army will be the first to tell you that this is an unusually busy time" said Paul Boyce, an spokesman with the Army's public affairs office. But he said the government is focused on easing the strains of long or repeated tours of duty. He cited "unprecedented efforts" to monitor combat stress, using lessons from the Vietnam and Gulf wars.

Concerns about lengthy troop deployments aren't new, but Mr. Soltz claims that VoteVets' poll has an unusual sweep. It was conducted over a two-week period last month by Lake Research Partners, whose pollsters talked to 453 veterans from across the country and all sections of the military. Forty-seven percent of the veterans described themselves as Republicans, while 22 percent said they were Democrats. Others said they were political independents or declined to answer.

Other poll findings:

Thirteen percent of participants said they were affected by military "stop-loss" policies that require some units to stay in the field for extended time periods.

One in four veterans has had nightmares since returning to the United States.

Thirty-two percent of National Guard or Reserve veterans said their families experienced "economic hardships" because of their overseas deployments. Many National Guard and Reserve veterans also said they should get full access to the medical benefits provided to active duty personnel.

Mr. Soltz said his group, which is funded with private money and advocates on behalf of a new generation of veterans, is nonpartisan. But some critics say VoteVets is too closely tied to Democrats like Gen. Clark. The group's political action committee has also paid for advertisements attacking some Senate Republicans, including Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Soltz said VoteVets has supported both Republicans and Democrats, and yesterday's news conference was not an effort to back one party before the upcoming mid-terms elections, which could determine control of Congress.

Gen. Clark, a potential presidential candidate in 2008, said he wants to push political leaders to make sure they are doing all they can for American soldiers.

"Wearing an American flag lapel and claiming to be patriotic -- that's not sufficient," he said.

Congress Sets Aside $20M For Wars' Ends (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, October 4, 2006

The military's top generals have warned Iraq is on the cusp of a civil war and that U.S. troops must remain in large numbers until at least next spring. But if the winds suddenly blow a different direction, Congress is ready to celebrate with a $20 million victory party.

Lawmakers included language in this year's defense spending bill, approved last week, allowing them to spend the money. The funds for "commemoration of success" in Iraq and Afghanistan were originally tucked into last year's defense measure, but they went unspent amid an uptick in violence in both countries that forced the Pentagon to extend tours of duty for thousands of troops.

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., is the original sponsor of the provision, which Democrats agreed to add to last year's defense bill. Senate Republicans kept the authorization in the 2007 bill. With elections five weeks away, Democrats are pointing to it as another example of where the GOP has gone astray in handling the war in Iraq.

"If the Bush administration is planning victory celebrations, Americans deserve to know what their plan is to get us to a victory in Iraq," said Rebecca Kirszner, spokeswoman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

McConnell's spokesman, Don Stewart, said he thought the finger-pointing by Democrats was silly because the provision was added last year by unanimous consent.

"Apparently they were for honoring the troops before they were against it," Stewart said.

DOJ_NMG_0074996

Carolyn Weyforth, spokeswoman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said, "Republicans are confident we will be victorious in the ongoing war in terror, and we look forward to a time when those funds can be used to honor the men and women who have risked and given their lives."

Under the language, the president could "designate a day of celebration" to honor troops serving in the two wars. The president also could call on the nation "to observe that day with appropriate ceremonies and activities" and issue awards to troops who have served honorably.

The Pentagon could spend up to $20 million of its $532 billion budget in 2007 for the commemoration, minus any private contributions it might receive for such an event.

The money will be available for the 2007 budget year, which began Oct. 1.

Some 140,000 U.S. troops remain in Iraq, with a drawdown not expected until at least early next year.

About 20,000 more are in Afghanistan. Last year, Bush administration and Pentagon officials had hoped thousands of troops could be brought home before the Nov. 7 elections.

Proclaiming victory in the Iraq war has already proven to be tricky business.

President Bush was slammed by critics for delivering his "Mission Accomplished" speech in May 2003 aboard an aircraft carrier. While troops had successfully stormed Iraq and toppled Saddam Hussein's regime in Baghdad, the fight over control in the nation against a violent insurgency had just begun.

Vice President Dick Cheney also was ridiculed for suggesting last year that the insurgency was in its "final throes."

Behind The Victory Money Lies Vietnam (NYT)

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 4 — The mystery over who championed legislation authorizing $20 million in spending for a celebration of United States success in Iraq and Afghanistan was resolved on Wednesday.

The office of the Republican whip, Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, acknowledged that he had pushed the bill out of lingering anger that Vietnam veterans had to “sneak back” home after that war and out of a desire that this generation of troops be thanked.

Mr. McConnell sponsored language in last year’s military spending bill, which authorized up to $20 million for a “commemoration of success” in Washington saluting the end of the Iraq and Afghanistan conflicts. No money was set aside or used because fighting continues.

The senator wrote language for the new budget bill that rolls over the authorization into 2007.

“People came home from Vietnam and had to sneak back in and they were spit upon,” said Don Stewart, communications director for the senator’s office. For Iraq and Afghanistan, he said, Mr. McConnell felt the troops should be able to “attend ceremonies, get awards.”

The Hunt Continues (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, October 4, 2006

House Intelligence Committee chairman Rep. Peter Hoekstra is still pressing U.S. intelligence agencies to look for possible weapons of mass destruction in Iraq—even though intelligence officials say further work is unlikely to reveal anything new about Saddam's WMD programs.

In recent weeks, congressional and intelligence sources say, Hoekstra has prodded the Defense Intelligence Agency and the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency to follow up on new leads about possible WMD sites in the country. One intelligence official, who asked not to be identified because of political sensitivities, said the agencies have devoted “hundreds of man hours” to the hunt.

The search has not been entirely fruitless. The DIA has discovered another 300 old chemical shells lying around the war-torn country. That's in addition to the 500 sarin shells mentioned in a declassified Pentagon intelligence report revealed by Hoekstra and Pennsylvania Republican Sen. Rick Santorum last June. But the recently found shells, like the previous ones, dated back to before the 1991 Persian Gulf War and were decayed and essentially useless.

DOJ_NMG_0074997

In short, U.S. intelligence-community officials say, the find doesn't change the conclusion of Charles Duelfer, chief of the U.S. Iraq Survey Group, who said two years ago that Saddam Hussein did not possess a WMD arsenal on the eve of the Iraq invasion, nor did he have any clear plan to revive his dormant weapons programs in the future.

The Bush administration has not been particularly eager to embrace Hoekstra's mission. In June, after Santorum and Hoekstra touted the allegd discovery of WMD, senior intelligence officials downplayed the find. The shells discovered in Iraq, they said, were all manufactured more than a decade earlier. "This does not reflect a capacity that was built up after 1991," a senior Defense official told reporters at the time. The munitions "are not the WMDs this country and the rest of the world believed Iraq had and not the WMDs for which this country went to war."

Even so, the Michigan Republican, who has clout with the intelligence community by virtue of his committee chairmanship, still insisted that the discovery of the decaying shells proved that "Iraq was not a WMD-free zone, that there are continuing threats from the materials that are or may still be in Iraq." In June, Hoekstra told reporters that he intended "to put additional pressure on the Department of Defense and the folks in Iraq to more fully pursue a complete investigation of what existed in Iraq before the war." Since then, intelligence officials say, Hoekstra has made good on his word and has continued to urge agencies to look for fresh evidence that might vindicate the administration's original pre-war claims.

Jamal Ware, a spokesman for the intelligence-community chairman, confirmed to NEWSWEEK that Hoekstra recently passed along photographs and other reports about possible WMD sites that had been forwarded to the committee by U.S. soldiers, former intelligence officials and Iraqis following the June press conference with Santorum. "People who have been over there [in Iraq] ... they've sent us information and we've referred that on to the appropriate agencies," Ware said. In one case, he said, some soldiers sent the committee photographs of equipment and other material that the troops "thought were interesting." Hoekstra then asked the intelligence community to look into the photos and find the location of the sites—a request that apparently explains the involvement of the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency, the Pentagon's mapping unit, in the latest hunt.

Ware said that Hoekstra was not "pressing" the intelligence agencies to do anything other than the "necessary due diligence" and played down any suggestion that the Republican chairman's motives were political. Hoekstra's main concern, he said, is that the Pentagon find all munitions dumps and sites that could still pose a hazard to U.S. soldiers. "Any effort that chairman Hoekstra has made in this area has been aimed at insuring the safety of our troops overseas," he said.

That concern is a valid one, according to one Pentagon official who asked not to be publicly identified talking about sensitive intelligence matters. In at least one case in May 2004, two U.S. soldiers in Iraq became ill after handling homemade bombs, presumably crafted by Iraq insurgents, which were rigged using pre-1991 chemical shells. U.S. intelligence officials believe it is unlikely the insurgents who made the bombs knew the shells contained chemical agents. The soldiers later recovered. The U.S. intelligence official was unaware of any other reports of homemade bombs in Iraq that contained chemical agents.

Though Hoekstra describes his efforts as a safety measure, others in the U.S. intelligence community see it as a futile effort to bolster a dead argument about Saddam's supposed WMD. They believe Hoekstra is wasting the agencies' time with offbeat allegations from untested sources. One such source Hoekstra touted was Georges Sada, a one-time Iraqi Air Force general who claimed in a book published earlier this year that he knew of hundreds of tons of chemical weapons being flown from Iraq to Syria prior to the U.S. invasion. Sada, who first made the claims to promote his book, admitted he never actually saw any of the weapons. But his allegations were prominently featured on Fox News and conservative media outlets. Hoekstra met with Sada and later dispatched House Intelligence Committee staffers overseas in an effort to verify the Iraqi's claims. That search, too, came up emtpy.

Not Guilty Pleas From 2 Marines In Iraqi's Death (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Two Marines pleaded not guilty Wednesday to murdering an Iraqi civilian in Hamdaniya and then trying to cover up the crime.

DOJ_NMG_0074998

The pleas marked the beginning of court-martial proceedings at Camp Pendleton in California for eight servicemen charged in the April incident. Pfc. John J. Jodka and Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda are accused of breaking into the home of Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, taking him out to a hole, shooting him and then planting a shovel and a gun nearby to make him look like an insurgent. Jodka is one of five Marines accused of firing at Awad, though all eight are charged with murder.

Jodka and Magincalda face up to life in prison if convicted.

Col. Steven Folsom, a military judge, also imposed a temporary gag order on attorneys involved in both Marines' cases, citing concerns that pretrial publicity could taint potential members of the court-martial panel, comparable to a civilian jury.

Magincalda's trial date was set for Feb. 13 and Jodka's for March 5. Folsom said the trial schedule was adjusted to accommodate a possible fact-finding trip to Iraq.

Uncertainty, Violence Darken Afghans' Hope (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, October 5, 2006

DOAB, Afghanistan — For the first time, the girls in this village were starting to learn — reading, writing, geography, history, math, science. They were starting to dream, too: Star student Roya Noori, 15, illiterate two years ago, wanted to become an architect. Harzoo Mohammedy, 14, planned to go to medical school. And Zuhal Noori, 12, saw herself at the controls of a commercial jet.

Then the learning stopped.

The new schoolhouse came under rocket fire last spring from the surrounding hills. Mysterious letters turned up at night, threatening to kill any girls who stayed in school and their principal.

The Afghan National Police, who were a five-minute drive away, did little, says Issa Noori, principal of the girls' school. Outgunned, they patrolled during the day and stayed safely inside their compound at night. Insurgents ruled the dark. The girls' school here in Wardak province closed in May and won't reopen until the government can guarantee the students' safety.

“This area is outside of government control,” Noori says. “No one can protect us.”

U.S.-led military forces launched Operation Enduring Freedom on Oct. 7, 2001, toppling the Taliban. Five years later, the situation is sobering. Rising insecurity threatens early accomplishments. From Kandahar in the south to Mazar-e-Sharif in the north, there is a growing sense that the democratically elected, U.S.-supported government of President Hamid Karzai and international forces can't shield ordinary citizens from insurgents and criminals.

“No one thinks the Taliban are going to roll into town next week and take over,” says Paul Fishstein, director of the Kabul think tank Afghanistan Research and Evaluation Unit. “But there is a lot of anxiety about what the future will bring.”

An insurgency, raging in the south and in eastern provinces along the Pakistan border, has begun to creep into provinces that had been considered secure: Wardak, Kunduz, Ghazni, Balk. In the past two weeks, suicide bombers have struck Herat, a center of Persian culture in western Afghanistan, and Kabul, seat of the Afghan government and headquarters of the NATO force deployed to Afghanistan to establish security.

A thriving opium industry has spread corruption and lawlessness across the country and provided cash to the Taliban.

The insurgents are often called — or call themselves — Taliban, which would make them some of the same Muslim fighters who set up a harsh Islamic state and ruled from 1996 until 2001. But “it's more complicated than just the government vs. the Taliban,” Fishstein says. “You've got a toxic brew of factors and interests. You've got Talibs. You've got drug dealers. You've got smugglers and criminals. You have a people with a stake in chaos and in maintaining a weak state.”

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the U.S. commander in Afghanistan, says some of the fighting involves Afghan tribes, warring over local issues such as water rights. If one tribe calls itself pro-government, he says, its rival might declare itself pro-Taliban.

Rebuilding Afghanistan was bound to be difficult. The country has been shattered by three decades of war. According to the CIA's 2006 estimates, the typical Afghan will be dead by age 44; more than 60% of Afghans can't read; nearly one in six Afghan babies die in infancy. Afghan laborers are lucky to find work for $2 or $3 a day, the World Bank says.

DOJ_NMG_0074999

"If we were under the impression that all of a sudden, after 25 years of war, everything would be wonderful — no, we were fooling ourselves," says Hassina Sherjan, founder of Aid Afghanistan, which ran the Doab girls' school.

No mistake, there has been progress. Afghans elected a president two years ago and a parliament last year — a breakthrough in a country ruled for three decades by a succession of communist apparatchiks, plundering warlords and medieval Taliban mullahs.

The U.S. government has spent $3.7 billion on aid to Afghanistan, helping build or repair more than 1,000 schools, enroll more than 5.3 million students in school, vaccinate 4 million Afghans against polio and pave more than 600 miles of road. Fueled by foreign aid, the economy is booming. The Asian Development Bank predicts the Afghan economy to grow 12% this year after expanding 14% in 2005.

So why is the Taliban gaining strength and jeopardizing the gains of the past five years? The short answer: The U.S.-backed Karzai government's inability to establish its authority and credibility with ordinary Afghans "opened the door for the Taliban," Eikenberry says.

The lost time allowed the Taliban to regroup in neighboring Pakistan and prepare a comeback. The Karzai government is widely seen as corrupt, beholden to unpopular local warlords and out of touch with average Afghans.

"In many cases, it's not that the people support the Taliban; it's that they're alienated from the government," Fishstein says. "There's a perception that justice goes to the highest bidder." The Taliban, by contrast, is known for imposing impartial but Draconian justice in the areas they control.

Critics say the Karzai government hasn't rooted out entrenched warlords and officials enriching themselves in the drug trade.

"The government has the obligation to use the judicial system, infant as it is, to impose the rule of law and re-establish confidence in the central government," Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, told the U.S. House Committee on International Relations in September. "The 100 beds at the new maximum-security prison at Pul-i-Charki (near Kabul) should be filled up as soon as possible with major traffickers and corrupt officials."

At a checkpoint outside the eastern city of Jalalabad, police officers stop traffic and strut around with sticks and batons, banging on the hoods of cars and shouting at bewildered and frightened drivers. Occasionally, they let a vehicle continue on the road to Kabul.

No explanation is offered for why some get through and others don't. The unlucky travelers suspect that money is changing hands. "These are crazy people, corruption people," says Hafizullah Turab, 44, a Jalalabad writer and movie director who is stuck in traffic.

Police corruption is no mystery. Even police colonels earn only $85 a month (though pay raises are coming). "They have to be corrupt to survive," says police Gen. Ahmad Sani, chief of police in northern Afghanistan's Kunduz province. And police are often deployed far from their homes. By contrast, the Taliban pays recruits $12 a day and lets them fight where they live, says Samuel Chan, a researcher with the Center for Conflict and Peace Studies, a Kabul think tank.

The cops are outgunned, too. Criminal gangs and insurgents "are using rocket launchers and machine guns," says Wardak Gov. Abdul Jabbar Naeemi. "The police are using only Kalashnikovs, AK-47s. We don't have enough bullets."

Kunduz police chief Sani complains that his men drive around in dilapidated pickups. "Sometimes we have to tow them back because they are not working," he says. "The narco-traffickers are driving the latest Land Cruisers. We cannot keep up with them."

Some fault a half-hearted nation-building effort by the United States and the international community. According to the RAND Corp. think tank, international aid to Afghanistan amounts to $57 per person vs. $209 in Iraq. Troop levels also are low by international standards.

RAND reports that Afghanistan has just one Afghan or foreign soldier for every 1,000 people, compared with seven in Iraq, 19 in Bosnia and 20 in Kosovo.

RAND analyst Seth Jones estimated in the spring that Afghanistan needed another 80,000 troops (for a total of 200,000) to establish order. Last month, NATO failed to scrounge up 2,500 reinforcements it wanted to send to Afghanistan, though Poland came through with 1,000 troops.

DOJ_NMG_0075000

The Afghan government and its international backers also have been losing the propaganda war to the Taliban.

"The Taliban make outrageous claims," says British Army Lt. Gen. David Richards, NATO commander in Afghanistan. "We need to be more dynamic in rebutting them. We have to make sure we're telling the truth, which takes longer."

Instead of talking about Western concepts such as democracy and the rule of law, the Taliban offers local villagers practical help — protecting farmers who grow opium poppies from the government's poppy-eradication program, for instance. "Just because people were glad to see the backs of the Taliban doesn't mean they want everything the West has to offer," Fishstein says.

In a paper written in May, Amrullah Saleh, head of Afghanistan's National Directorate of Security, describes a meeting between U.S. forces and villagers in Ghazni province. The U.S. delegation included a woman dressed in military fatigues — offensive to villagers who believe women should rarely venture outside the home and then only when covered head-to-toe in a burqa. Saleh suggested limiting contact between international forces and Afghan villagers to prevent inevitable cultural clashes.

An hour's drive west of Kabul, Wardak province should be a success story — and for a while, it was. Since the Taliban was overthrown, the province has undergone a dramatic makeover. Newly paved roads connect Wardak and its farmers to the markets in Kabul. New refrigeration plants keep their apples and potatoes from spoiling. A 50-bed provincial hospital has replaced one half its size. Girls in Doab and other Wardak villages were finally attending school.

The progress in Wardak is being chipped away by a strengthening insurgency and emboldened criminal gangs. Last month, gunmen kidnapped a Colombian aid worker and two Afghan employees of a French relief group in Wardak's Jalrez district. Human Rights Watch has reported attacks and threats on Wardak girls' schools, including the one in Doab.

"Their weapon is destruction and terror. Our weapon is education and development," says Sherjan of Aid Afghanistan. "If they attack one school, we should build three more."

Wardak is still safer than lawless Kandahar and Helmand in the south. Wardak's Gov. Naeemi says his province is secure. He dismisses the shadowy figures behind recent trouble as bandits. "They are calling themselves Taliban," he says. "They are robbers."

Regardless, the threatening "night letters" and rockets have had an effect. "Last year, this was the best province," principal Noori says. "Now, I can't defend myself from the insurgents. No one can in Afghanistan."

Noori, 45, wears tinted glasses and a scraggly salt-and-pepper beard. He tucks his unkempt hair under a black prayer cap. He tells his story in his home overlooking Doab, an ethnic Pashtun village of mud compounds and apple orchards. Inside, Noori serves a generous breakfast of fried eggs, fresh butter, flat bread and cups of green tea sweetened with heaping spoonfuls of sugar. A cow bellows outside. The smell of dung hangs over the village.

Noori, who was born and raised in Doab, became sympathetic to women's rights while he was in sixth grade. When his father taught him and his four sisters to read, the girls caught on faster.

"My sisters were smarter than me. But they just stayed at home, taking care of the animals and the house. I went to school (at Kabul University)," he says.

In the late '70s, he was imprisoned as an Islamic fundamentalist by Afghanistan's communist government. Released, he fled to Pakistan and worked with a Swedish aid group schooling Afghan refugees. He was hired as principal when Hassina Sherjan's Aid Afghanistan set up a girls' school in Doab two years ago. "Hassina's school was wonderful," he says. "She provided pens, paper, even clothing."

The school was popular with local people and soon had 300 students, including 100 who attended classes in three neighboring villages.

Things started to go wrong about 10 or 11 months ago, Noori says. Insurgents emerged in the Wardak countryside, issuing warnings against girls attending school. They attacked Turkish engineers paving the road that runs past Doab on the way to Logar province. Two of the engineers fled into the village, and Noori offered them refuge for several hours until the insurgents were gone.

Noori met with local clerics, convinced that some of them were working secretly with the insurgents. He explained that the school taught nothing offensive to Islam. "They couldn't argue with me. I'm a good Muslim," he says. The threat grew, however, and the school finally closed when the insurgents vowed to kill the students.

DOJ_NMG_0075001

Noori believes that some of his neighbors were behind the intimidation. “The insurgents recruited some of the villagers,” he says. “In Afghanistan, if you pay people, they'll do anything.”

Human Rights Watch doubts that the Wardak insurgents belong to the Taliban. In a July report, the group notes that Wardak is a stronghold of the fundamentalist warlord Abdul Rasul Sayyaf, now a member of Afghanistan's parliament.

Like many Afghans, Noori believes that Pakistan is supporting the insurgency in an effort to keep Afghanistan weak and malleable — an allegation the Pakistani government has repeatedly denied. “We have a very bad neighbor,” he says. “The first step toward progress is schools. If you can destroy a country's schools, they can't do anything.”

Harzoo Mohammedy, the student who dreams of becoming a doctor, says she and her fellow students were willing to brave the threats they faced. “We were scared, but all the girls wanted to keep going to school. We didn't care,” she says.

Noori hopes the Doab school will reopen in a few months: “We'll wait until the government gets a little stronger, and we can defend ourselves.” He shrugs off the threat to his own safety. “Sometimes we need to struggle for the right things,” he says. “It is God's decision when we die.”

Reconstruction Seen Key To U.S. Exit (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, October 5, 2006

NATO's top military commander said yesterday the U.S. exit strategy from Afghanistan depends on the effectiveness of reconstruction and aid, more so than the number of troops.

"Afghanistan will not be resolved by military means," said U.S. Marine Gen. James L. Jones, who commands the Western alliance.

"We are always looking for more capability, more equipment, but generally speaking, the troop strength under the current threat envelope is adequate," Gen. Jones said.

"The real challenge is how well the reconstruction mission and the international aid mission is focused," he told the Council on Foreign Relations. "And fundamentally, this is the exit strategy for Afghanistan."

The general's statement came amid a growing recognition in Washington that defeating the Taliban is not just a question of putting more boots on the ground.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist on Tuesday stated that victory in Afghanistan would not happen until Afghan and international officials wooed more tribal leaders away from the Taliban and into the political process.

Gen. Jones said yesterday that winning the battle against Afghanistan's flourishing opium trade was crucial to weaning the country away from insurgent forces and drug cartels, which were fomenting an environment of violence and corruption.

"It is truly the Achilles' heel of Afghanistan," said Gen. Jones, who is supreme allied commander in Europe and commander of the U.S. European command.

NATO yesterday confirmed it was to taking military command of the 14 volatile eastern provinces of Afghanistan, expanding its command of security operations throughout the country.

The change, effective today, will place 12,000 American troops under NATO, expanding the force to more than 30,000. Some 8,000 U.S. troops will continue to function outside NATO control, those tracking al Qaeda or involved in air operations.

The overall level of American forces will remain around 20,000.

Gen. Jones said more had to be done to systemize the NATO forces, particularly erasing restrictions put on the military by individual nations that are hampering operations against the Taliban and putting soldiers at risk.

"There are about 50 restrictions that have an operational impact, that impact on the commander of [NATO's] ability to make operations," said Gen. Jones.

He said the alliance was working to whittle down those restrictions, which include different rules of engagement, rules of detention, size of force and geographic boundaries. Forces from some countries cannot be used at night; others cannot directly engage the Taliban.

"The capability we have is directly related to the caveats," he said. "It is not a showstopper, but it is certainly something we have to keep working on."

DOJ_NMG_0075002

Kerry Chides Frist For Taliban Comments (AP)

By Holly Ramer

AP, October 4, 2006

Democratic Sen. John Kerry ridiculed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist for trying to clarify his comment on bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the Afghanistan government.

"They're not clarifying. He did another Terri Schiavo diagnosis from a one-hour tape," Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, said Wednesday of the Tennessee Republican.

On Monday, Frist said the war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and that he favored bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government.

The remarks drew immediate criticism from Democrats. They argued Frist was waving the white flag of surrender to the Taliban, who harbored the al-Qaida organization blamed for the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

A Frist spokeswoman later said the senator believes Afghan tribesmen at risk of being lost to the Taliban should be brought into the government, not Taliban fighters themselves.

Kerry, mentioned as a possible 2008 presidential candidate, was campaigning in New Hampshire for state Senate candidate Beth Roth. Frist also is considered a White House hopeful.

Frist, a former heart surgeon, took a leading role last year in the fight to get Schiavo's feeding tube reinserted. He later was criticized for relying on a video to question her doctors' diagnosis that Schiavo was in a permanent vegetative state.

Kerry said Frist's Taliban comments sound like claims by the Bush administration about progress being made in Iraq, despite differing reports from those directly involved. The Massachusetts senator said he requested a private briefing with CIA officials earlier this week.

"I will tell you their outlook was bleak. It was completely different from what the administration is saying publicly, and they told me that is what they are saying to the administration today," Kerry said.

He added: "We need an administration that tells America the truth. We don't need a cut-and-run policy in Afghanistan where the real war on terror is and a stay-and-lose policy in Iraq."

Frist's spokeswoman, Carolyn Weyforth, said Kerry has absolutely no room to accuse Frist of cutting and running.

"It is Senator Kerry and his colleagues who have voted again and again to tie our hands in the ongoing war on terror instead of giving us all tools necessary to fight a 'smarter, more effective war on terror,'" she said, echoing one of Kerry's frequent campaign promises.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

HP Insiders Indicted In Corporate Spy Scandal (LAT)

By James S. Granelli

The Los Angeles Times, October 5, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. — California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer filed criminal charges against ousted Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn and four others in the corporate spying scandal that has rocked the Silicon Valley icon, according to people familiar with the case.

The state's top prosecutor accused the five of conspiracy and three other felonies for their alleged roles in stealing the private phone records of directors, reporters and their families.

The scandal came to light a month ago when the Palo Alto computer and printer maker released initial details of its efforts to find out who was leaking boardroom information to the media.

Dunn, who initiated an internal investigation, said she did not know that outside detectives were using subterfuge to gain access to the phone records.

Besides Dunn, those named in the criminal complaints filed in Santa Clara County Superior Court were ousted HP chief ethics officer Kevin Hunsaker, private investigator Ronald DeLia and outside investigators Matthew DePante of Melbourne, Fla. and Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo., Associated Press reported.

DOJ_NMG_0075003

They each face four felony charges: use of false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility, unauthorized access to computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes.

HP Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd was not charged.

Dunn Charged Over HP Leaks (FT)

By Kevin Allison

Financial Times, October 5, 2006

California's top prosecutor yesterday filed criminal charges against Patricia Dunn, Hewlett-Packard's ousted chairman, and four others in connection with the computer maker's controversial investigation probe into boardroom leaks.

The charges, expected for weeks, marked a low point in a spying scandal that has sullied HP's reputation as a paragon of corporate virtue and thrown a spotlight on the shadowy world of company investigations.

The felony complaint filed by Bill Lockyer, attorney general, charged all five defendants with fraudulent wire communications, wrongful use of computer data, identity theft and conspiracy.

Mr Lockyer said the HP leak investigation was "a misguided effort". "People inside and outside HP violated privacy rights and broke state law," he said.

The four other defendants are Kevin Hunsaker, a former HP lawyer, and private investigators Ronald DeLia, Bryan Wagner and Matthew DePante.

Mark Hurd, chief executive, and Ann Baskins, who resigned as the company's general counsel last week, were not charged but Mr Lockyer said the investigation remained open.

Ms Dunn's lawyer said she was a victim of a "disinformation campaign". In a statement, Jim Brosnahan of law firm Morrison & Foerster said: "These charges are being brought against the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons. They are the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

Calls to lawyers representing Mr Hunsaker and Mr DeLia went unreturned yesterday. HP said only that it was continuing to co-operate with state and federal investigators.

HP came under criminal investigation last month after the company admitted its operatives had posed as journalists, board members and employees to obtain private telephone records – a controversial and potentially illegal practice known as pretexting.

Ms Dunn was forced to step down as chairman amid mounting criticism of the investigation's tactics, which extended far beyond telephone records to included physical surveillance and other questionable operations.

Events reached a climax last week as the scandal's protagonists testified on Capitol Hill about their roles in the probe.

Ms Dunn said she was not responsible for what happened, saying she received repeated assurances that the methods being used by HP's investigators were legal and part of an accepted array of methods.

News of the charges followed reports that Ms Dunn was preparing to undergo for treatment for cancer. Ms Dunn had previously stepped down as chief executive of Barclays Global Investors to fight cancer in 2002.

HP's shares rose 1.6 per cent yesterday to $38.02 ahead of the announcment.

Dunn, Four Others Charged In Hewlett Surveillance Case (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Former Hewlett-Packard Co. chairman Patricia C. Dunn and four others were charged with fraud and conspiracy in California yesterday, one month after HP disclosed that it had conducted a wide-ranging spying operation to identify the source of leaks to the news media.

A criminal complaint was filed in Santa Clara County Superior Court by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer. In addition to Dunn, former HP chief ethics director and senior legal counsel Kevin Hunsaker, who supervised a key phase of the operation, was charged, along with three outsiders who did surveillance work for the Silicon Valley computer icon.

All five were charged with four felonies under California statutes. Each count carries a maximum prison sentence of three years and a maximum fine of $25,000.

The charges were filed on an extraordinary day in which Lockyer, who is seeking election as state treasurer, declared in a statement that "people inside and outside HP violated privacy rights and broke state law" during the company's "misguided" effort to plug media leaks.

The charges came one day after Dunn, 53, learned from her doctor that her advanced ovarian cancer had recurred and she needed to undergo chemotherapy, according to a source close to Dunn. It is her third bout with cancer in recent years; she previously suffered from breast cancer and melanoma.

Dunn's attorney, Jim Brosnahan, issued a statement last night saying the charges "are being brought against the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons. They are the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

Charged along with Dunn and Hunsaker, 41, were Boston security contractor Ronald R. DeLia, 56, and private investigators Bryan Wagner, 29, of Littleton, Colo., and Matthew Depante, 27, manager of Action Research Group of Melbourne, Fla. They were accused of participating in long-running HP surveillance operation that involved the use of false pretenses to gain access to personal phone records of HP board members, journalists and their families, a practice known as pretexting.

Each was charged with fraudulent wire communications, wrongful use of computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit those three crimes. The complaint alleges that the defendants used "false and fraudulent pretenses" to obtain confidential information from a phone company, including billing records, belonging to 12 people. Dunn, who first stepped down as chairman and then resigned from the board last month, repeatedly has said that she was given assurances that the methods used in the leak probe were legal.

The criminal charges come a few days after Dunn, Hunsaker and the company's chairman and chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, appeared before a congressional investigative subcommittee to answer questions about the surveillance methods HP used.

The tactics, in addition to pretexting, included following or watching board members, journalists and their family members at home and at conferences; and conducting a sting operation on a reporter.

The two-phase spying operation began in 2005 and ended this past spring.

According to court papers filed yesterday, the telephone, fax and cellphone accounts of more than 24 people were accessed in the HP probe. HP's investigators reviewed 33 months' of phone records and about 1,750 calls from 590 telephone numbers.

The charges are the first in the case, which is also being investigated by the FBI.

Dunn told the House Energy and Commerce oversight investigations subcommittee last week that she had been assured that the phone records were obtained legally, a claim that legal observers expect to be the heart of her defense.

At one point during Dunn's testimony last week, the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Joe Barton, asked her if it was not correct that the fraudulent practice of obtaining phone records had been used in 2005.

"I believe it did use pretexting," she said.

Her attorney then whispered something to her.

"I've just been corrected," she said. "I don't know."

The complaint says that Dunn knew since at least June 2005 that the phone records were being obtained by deceptive means.

Hunsaker, DeLia and Wagner, one of the two investigators charged, refused to testify before the congressional panel last week, invoking their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. The other investigator, Matthew Depante, was not called to testify, but his father, Joseph Depante, owner of Action Research, also invoked the Fifth Amendment.

No one answered a phone call placed to Matthew Depante's home yesterday, but his attorney, Richard Preira of Miami Beach, said Depante was "not guilty."

"The conduct he is alleged to have engaged in is not a violation of the California penal code or the United States code," Preira said.

A lawyer for Hunsaker did not return calls seeking a comment. DeLia, a reached by telephone last night, said he was not guilty of the charges and declined to comment further.

On the federal level, phone pretexting is likely a violation of the criminal wire fraud statute, former federal prosecutors said.

Congress adjourned last Friday without passing pending legislation to specifically make phone pretexting a crime. Jennifer S. Granick, a cyber law professor at Stanford Law School, said that the evidence released so far suggests that Dunn was aware of the methods used to obtain phone records.

"Generally, you don't have to know that something is against the law in order to be committing an offense," said Granick, who was a criminal defense lawyer in California for nine years. "Ignorance of the law is no defense."

Robert Weisberg, a Stanford University law professor, said the statutes Lockyer is citing are highly technical and do not specifically address or describe phone pretexting: "I think it's kind of dicey whether you can really apply the state laws to [Dunn]."

A California law has since been passed that specifically outlaws phone pretexting, he added, but it is not retroactive.

Friends said Dunn has been battling three forms of cancer since 2001 and has channeled some of her energy into charity and cancer-fighting work. She stepped down as chief executive of Barclays Global Investors in 2002 after the breast cancer and melanoma were diagnosed.

"She has become a real role model to women going through cancer," said Mary Bitterman, who joined the Barclays Global board of directors shortly before Dunn stepped down. Dunn spoke of her involvement with the Charlotte Maxwell Complementary Clinic, a program that provides cancer care to poor patients, she said.

Friends said Dunn has long maintained a concern for rules and ethics, making her indictment ironic to many who worked with her, first at Wells Fargo and then Barclays Global after the firms merged.

"She's so ethical. The fact that this happened is beyond belief," said Rich Koppes, an attorney and former general counsel of the California Public Employees' Retirement System. He said Dunn was always concerned with and interested in good corporate governance. Some legal observers said they thought that Lockyer, who last year pulled out of the race for governor of California, was using the case to enhance his political career.

"I can't say this shouldn't be done," said Jamie Wareham, global chairman of litigation in the District office of Paul, Hastings, Janofsky and Walker LLP, a Los Angeles-based law firm. But, he said, "I think the timing is outrageous."

California Charges Dunn, 4 Others In H-P Scandal (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman And Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, sending a stern message to corporate America, filed criminal charges against former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairman Patricia Dunn and four other people in connection with the company's investigations into boardroom leaks.

The charges, which stem from H-P's allegedly illegal tactics for acquiring personal phone records, move the H-P imbroglio into an important new phase. The affair already has mushroomed into one of the nation's most embarrassing corporate scandals in years. The criminal proceedings are likely to have implications that go far beyond the particulars of the case, setting precedents for boardrooms, corporate ethicists and private investigators across the nation.

"This is the first time to my knowledge that the chairman of the board of a major American company is being charged with a privacy violation," said Joel Reidenberg, a professor at Fordham University Law School in New York and director of its center on law and information policy. "This sends a very powerful message to corporate America that privacy matters."

Each of the five defendants, who were charged in state court in Santa Clara, faces four felony charges: fraudulently obtaining private information from a public utility; accessing computer data without permission; identity theft and conspiracy to commit those same crimes. Each charge carries a maximum penalty of three years in prison and a fine of up to $10,000.

Mr. Lockyer's targets in the case suggest he is pursuing links from top to bottom in the chain of action behind the debacle. That chain started with Ms. Dunn who, disturbed by H-P-related leaks to the media, launched two boardroom investigations, in 2005 and in 2006. The probes ultimately backfired this summer after venture-capitalist Thomas Perkins quit H-P's board in a huff and accused the company of improperly obtaining his personal phone records as part of its leak investigation. The Wall Street Journal brought the backroom battle to light in a page-one article on Sept. 6.

DOJ_NMG_0075006

Along with Ms. Dunn, Mr. Lockyer yesterday charged H-P's former chief ethics lawyer, Kevin Hunsaker, and three outside investigators who helped H-P try to discover which of its directors might be leaking information to the press. Documents have emerged suggesting that Mr. Hunsaker worked with H-P's outside investigators to pry into private phone records, use operatives to tail certain H-P directors and journalists, spring a sting operation on an unsuspecting reporter in an effort to get her to reveal her source, and contemplated sending spies into newsrooms disguised as janitors.

Also charged yesterday were Ronald DeLia of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., Needham, Mass., who led both leak probes from start to finish, Matthew DePante of Action Research Group, Melbourne, Fla., and Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo. Mr. DePante allegedly helped H-P obtain the phone records it sought, and Mr. Wagner allegedly did some of the so-called pretexting, impersonating others to obtain their records from phone carriers.

A Santa Clara County judge issued arrest warrants for all five defendants, and set bail ranging from $100,000 for Mr. DePante to as little as $5,000 or even nothing for Ms. Dunn and Mr. Hunsaker, for whom the judge held open the possibility of being released on their own recognizance.

The case against Ms. Dunn, who is scheduled to start six months of chemotherapy tomorrow for recurrent ovarian cancer, rests on prosecutors' claim that she knew H-P's investigators were obtaining phone records through fraud. She has said she thought the records came from publicly available sources. "As her many supporters fully expect, she will fight these charges with everything she has," said James Brosnahan, Ms. Dunn's lawyer.

Though the attorney general didn't name H-P as a defendant in the complaints, the charges signal the beginning of a potentially lengthy legal process that could keep the company's name in the headlines for months or years.

H-P's former general counsel, Ann Baskins, wasn't charged in the case, although she was named in the prosecutors' court affidavit yesterday as having participated in a key conference call in June of 2005. At that time, Mr. DeLia "explained pretexting, telling Dunn and Baskins that it involved investigators requesting information from operators orally, over the phone, 'pretending' to be someone else if necessary," prosecutors wrote.

Also not charged was Tony Gentilucci, who resigned as H-P's manager of global security investigations in the wake of the probe. Both he and Ms. Baskins declined to testify at a House subcommittee hearing on the matter last week, invoking their Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination. Their attorneys couldn't be reached for comment.

Mark Hurd, H-P's chief executive officer, isn't expected to be targeted by prosecutors. Mr. Hurd told the House subcommittee that he attended briefings where the investigation was discussed, adding that he didn't recall hearing about the tactics investigators used. However, a memo by H-P's law firm, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, says Mr. Hurd told attorneys for the firm in August 2006 that he recalled that during one meeting, "probably on July 22, 2005," somebody "mentioned obtaining phone records off the Web" as part of the probe.

"There currently is no evidence that Mark Hurd engaged in criminal conduct. However, our investigation remains open and continues," Mr. Lockyer said yesterday at a news conference.

Lawyers for Mr. Hunsaker and Mr. DeLia didn't return phone calls. Messrs. DePante and Wagner didn't return phone calls. Messrs. Hunsaker and DeLia last week declined to testify before the House subcommittee, citing their Fifth Amendment rights, as did Mr. DePante's father, Joseph, the owner of Action Research, who wasn't charged yesterday.

H-P, meanwhile, issued a statement saying: "H-P is continuing to cooperate with state and federal investigators looking into the boardroom leaks issue. The company has no further comment."

During the leak investigations in 2005 and 2006, H-P investigators obtained the personal phone records of at least a dozen people, including directors and employees, as well as journalists and other outside parties. Among them were two Wall Street Journal reporters, including Pui-Wing Tam, whose page-one story last year about friction between the H-P board and then-Chief Executive Carly Fiorina set off the first leak investigation.

The disclosure of the investigations prompted a series of probes by state and federal agencies, as well as last week's high-profile House subcommittee hearing. Some in Congress are seeking to pass a bill that would clearly define pretexting as illegal. Some lawyers involved in the H-P investigation argue that the practice isn't illegal, except when financial records are involved.

California laws are clearer, however. One of the statutes under which Ms. Dunn and the four others were charged yesterday, Penal Code Section 538.5, specifically outlaws "executing a scheme or artifice to obtain, from a public utility," customers'"billing records."

The California statute also makes clear that it isn't just the people who obtain such information who could be criminally liable, but "every person who transmits or causes to be transmitted" the information. That provision could prove particularly important in prosecutors' case against Ms. Dunn, who instigated the leak probes and has acknowledged knowing that personal phone records were scrutinized.

Ms. Dunn, who testified for hours before the House subcommittee, spearheaded the probes, which began in the spring of 2005 following leaks from the board that year and intensified after other leaks in early 2006. She acknowledged learning from Mr. DeLia that personal phone records were being obtained during the investigation, but said she believed it was a customary H-P practice and didn't learn of the term "pretexting" until much later.

Though Mr. Lockyer said publicly three weeks ago that his office had enough evidence to charge people with crimes both inside and outside H-P, his investigation bogged down over H-P's unwillingness to share certain documents with prosecutors, according to lawyers familiar with the case. The logjam broke in the past several days, these people said, after prosecutors obtained some 700 pages of internal H-P emails, investigative reports and legal papers from congressional investigators in Washington, who had gathered the documents from H-P for last week's House hearing.

Among the congressional documents is a series of memos written in August by H-P's outside lawyers at Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, which H-P retained this summer to review the conduct of the leak investigations. H-P had been resisting providing the Wilson Sonsini documents to prosecutors in Sacramento, citing attorney-client privilege, these lawyers said. The memos include write-ups of interviews with all the main players in the spying imbroglio, including Ms. Dunn and Mr. Hurd. Prosecutors quoted extensively from the law firm memos in their affidavit yesterday.

Wilson Sonsini's conclusions differed markedly from Mr. Lockyer's. In a presentation to H-P's board in August, the firm essentially exonerated Ms. Dunn from wrongdoing, finding she "reasonably relied on repeated assurances of legality by HP legal." The Wilson Sonsini report said that, at the time of the investigations, no laws specifically barred people from using false pretenses to obtain others' phone records.

HP Scandal May See Felony Charges (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — California's Attorney General sought felony indictments against five people in the Hewlett-Packard snooping scandal Wednesday — including former chairman Patricia Dunn.

Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed criminal complaints against Dunn, former HP lawyer Kevin Hunsaker and private investigators Ronald DeLia, Matthew DePante and Bryan Wagner.

Each faces four felony charges: using fraud to obtain confidential information from a public utility, unauthorized access to computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit those crimes. Penalties could include prison time and fines.

Notably absent from the list is HP CEO Mark Hurd, who has tried hard to distance himself from the scandal. That's a relief, says tech analyst Crawford Del Prete at researcher IDC, because Hurd is doing a good job of running the computer giant. HP shares closed up 2% at $38.02 Wednesday.

The investigation is still open, Lockyer's office says. A grand jury will most likely hear the case next, a process that could take months, says Stanford University law professor Robert Weisberg.

Dunn, Hunsaker and the three detectives were all part of a team trying to find out which HP board member was leaking information to the press. The team used trickery to obtain the private phone records of journalists, board members and employees (a technique called pretexting).

Dunn spearheaded the leak hunt. Last week, she told the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which is also investigating the matter, that she left details to HP staffers and didn't know about the pretexting.

Hunsaker ran the project within HP and was aware of pretexting, internal HP documents released by the committee show. He repeatedly said it was legal.

There's a chance he is right. There are few laws specifically prohibiting pretexting. That's why Lockyer is prosecuting under fraud laws, Weisberg says.

DeLia's detective firm, Security Outsourcing Solutions, was hired by HP to do most of the investigative work. DeLia in turn hired detective firm Action Research Group, where Matthew DePante works.

Wagner is a former employee of Action Research, according to the complaint's supporting documents. He told investigators that he destroyed his computer when his uncle warned him of the HP investigation after reading about it in the newspaper.

Unlike Dunn, who is fighting advanced ovarian cancer, Hunsaker, DeLia and Wagner each refused to answer questions before the committee last week, citing their right against self-incrimination. Matthew DePante was not called. But Joseph DePante, the owner of Action Research, was. He also declined to answer questions because of self-incrimination concerns.

Ex-Leader Among 5 Charged In Hewlett Case (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 4 — Hewlett-Packard's former chairwoman was among five people charged Wednesday with illegally gathering phone records of board members, journalists and others in an effort to find the source of news leaks.

The felony charges, filed by the California attorney general's office, are the first stemming from a spying operation that ended last spring but came to light a month ago in disclosures by a disgruntled former director.

The case has rocked the company, forcing out the chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, along with the general counsel, a second director and two other senior officers. A House subcommittee held hearings on the case last week, and federal prosecutors have also been considering charges.

It was Ms. Dunn who authorized the operation, aimed at tracing leaks from the board, and put it into the hands of outside investigators. Those charged with her Wednesday included the company lawyer who supervised one phase of the operation and three detectives.

The charges stem from the use of pretexting, a form of deception, to obtain private calling records from phone company employees.

"We plan to aggressively prosecute this case," Bill Lockyer, the state's attorney general, said at a news conference in Sacramento. "However, the investigation into this matter remains active and still incomplete."

The company's general counsel, Ann O. Baskins, who resigned hours before the House hearing last week, was not among those charged. Nor was Mark V. Hurd, the chief executive, who has overseen a resurgence in Hewlett-Packard's business that has buoyed its stock even in the face of the recent upheaval.

"There currently is no evidence that Mark Hurd engaged in criminal conduct," Mr. Lockyer said.

Concerns over leaks from the board predated the ouster of Carleton S. Fiorina as chairwoman and chief executive in early 2005. In a memoir to be published next week, Ms. Fiorina says that she ordered an initial leak investigation shortly before her departure. [Page C1.]

The charges against Ms. Dunn, who is expected to appear in court within 24 hours, come as she battles ovarian cancer. "I truly hope Ms. Dunn wins her fight against this disease," Mr. Lockyer said. "However, her illness has no impact on her culpability."

A criminal complaint filed in San Jose, Calif., accuses all the defendants of four charges: using false pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility, unauthorized access of computer data, identity theft and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes.

Mr. Lockyer said the first three charges each carried a maxiumm penalty of three years in prison and a fine of $10,000.

A conspiracy conviction can bring a $25,000 fine and one year in prison.

Arrest warrants were issued for the five, who include Kevin T. Hunsaker, a former senior lawyer at Hewlett-Packard; Ronald R. DeLia, a Boston-area private detective; Joseph DePante, owner of Action Research Group, an information broker in Melbourne, Fla.; and Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colo., who is said to have obtained private phone records while working for Mr. DePante.

An investigation was begun by Ms. Dunn in 2005 — involving leaks that were apparent in news articles just before and after Ms. Fiorina's ouster — but it ended inconclusively. A second phase began in January 2006, after news reports about a management meeting indicated further leaks, and the effort was turned over to Mr. Hunsaker for supervision.

Ms. Dunn resigned from the board last month under pressure because of the methods used. Mr. Hunsaker, a senior counsel and director of ethics, was fired after he refused to resign, his lawyer said.

Robert M. Morgester, deputy attorney general for the state's special crimes unit, wrote in a supporting document to the charges filed Wednesday that "both Dunn and Hunsaker were aware that the records were to be obtained by fraud or deceit." He said Mr. Hunsaker provided continuous guidance to Mr. DeLia on which records to obtain.

The criminal complaint notes that the pretexting in the case involved the home, office, cellphone and fax numbers of 24 people. Mr. Morgester wrote that Mr. DePante's firm, Action Research, analyzed 33 months of calls and retrieved information on 590 numbers that figured in those individuals' phone records.

The complaint states that in April 2005, Ms. Dunn gave Mr. DeLia the home, office and cellphone numbers for company directors. In June 2005, Mr. DeLia told Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins, the general counsel, that phone records were obtained "by ruse" from a telecommunications carrier.

In addition to getting phone records directly from customer service representatives, the operation also involved access to records kept online. State investigators said they were able to find Mr. Wagner by tracking a cookie left on his computer when he used it to gain access to online records at AT&T. A cookie is a piece of computer code that identifies what computer has visited a particular Web site.

Although the operation for gathering of phone records stretched across the country and back again, California claims jurisdiction in the case because the detectives were paid by Hewlett-Packard, which is based in Palo Alto, Calif., and the planning was done there as well.

Of the charges against Ms. Dunn, Mr. Lockyer, the attorney general, said, "The person who orchestrated these illegal practices should be held accountable, not just those who carried them out."

Ms. Dunn's lawyer, James J. Brosnahan of Morrison & Foerster in San Francisco, said in a statement: "These charges are being brought against the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons. They are the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

The charges are yet another blow for Ms. Dunn. On Tuesday, a representative said Ms. Dunn was to begin six months of chemotherapy on Friday for recurrent advanced ovarian cancer. A friend said that she had Stage 4 ovarian cancer. She has survived breast cancer and melanoma, a skin cancer.

Stage 4, in which the cancer has spread beyond the abdomen to other parts of the body, is the most advanced, and only 29 percent of women with that stage are still alive after five years. The disease is so dangerous because it often has no symptoms until it has become advanced and has started spreading inside the abdomen.

Alison Davis, a managing partner at Belvedere Capital Partners, a private equity firm in San Francisco, called the charges against Ms. Dunn unbelievable.

"She stands for integrity and doing the right thing more than anyone else I can think of," said Ms. Davis, who was chief financial officer of Barclays Global Investors, where Ms. Dunn served as chief executive.

Ms. Baskins, who as general counsel was Mr. Hunsaker's boss and was involved in both the 2005 and 2006 phases of the investigation, may have escaped charges because she never passed on any phone numbers to a pretexter.

Her lawyer, Cristina C. Arguedas, with the firm of Arguedas, Cassman & Headley of Berkeley, Calif., said, "Ann Baskins did nothing that could possibly warrant a charge being filed against her."

Other criminal defense lawyers said prosecutors might have a difficult time proving intent. To do so, they would have to show that the defendants had some appreciation of the wrongfulness of their actions.

"It can be a squishy concept," said Matthew J. Jacobs, a former federal prosecutor and a partner in the Silicon Valley law firm of McDermott Will & Emery.

Getting a legal opinion and taking steps to establish the legality of an action can show a lack of criminal intent. Ms. Baskins repeatedly asked for verification that the methods the investigators used were legal.

The question of intent could also be raised for those charged, Mr. Hunsaker and Ms. Dunn in particular, several defense lawyers said. Ms. Dunn, who is not a lawyer, relied on the lawyers' advice. The documents provided by the company show Mr. Hunsaker asked for legal opinions and did his own research to verify that what was done was considered legal.

In one set of e-mail exchanges between Mr. Hunsaker and Anthony R. Gentilucci, the company's manager of global investigations, Mr. Hunsaker raises the question of legality. Mr. Gentilucci replied, "I think it is on the edge, but above board." Mr. Hunsaker's response was, "I shouldn't have asked."

Mr. Hunsaker's lawyer, Michael Pancer, said in a recent interview that his client meant that he should not have asked because he knew that Mr. Gentilucci would have checked on the legality of the method.

Lawyers for Ms. Dunn and Mr. DeLia did not respond to requests for comment.

Mr. Wagner said he had been advised not to comment on the charges against him. He said, however, "If I would have known it was this high-profile, I wouldn't have done it."

Mr. DePante's lawyer, Richard J. Preira of Miami Beach, Fla., said that "his conduct is not illegal" and that his client was a scapegoat. He also said, "the prosecutors are trying to fit a square peg in a round hole."

Indeed, other defense lawyers and legal scholars not involved in the case said it would not be an easy one for the attorney general despite the mountain of documents provided by the company. The problem is that California had no law against the specific act of pretexting. So the prosecutors have to stitch together a set of laws to charge the defendants.

Defense lawyers are likely to try to exploit the weak seams. Take, for instance, the law that makes it a crime to use electronic media to take information owned by a public utility. The first problem, said Robert Weisberg, a Stanford University law professor, is whether a phone company can be considered a public utility anymore. The identity theft law makes it a crime to steal something of value — credit, goods, services, or medical information — Mr. Weisberg notes, but a defense lawyer could argue that phone records have no monetary value.

California made pretexting a crime, but the law, signed on Saturday by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, does not go into effect until Jan. 1. It would not apply to any of the pretexting in the Hewlett-Packard case. Under that law, the penalty for a violation would be $2,500 and up to a year in county jail. Repeated violations would result in a $10,000 fine and a year in jail.

Investigations Continue At HP (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins And Jon Swartz

USA Today, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Hewlett-Packard still faces a thicket of federal investigations after California's attorney general filed criminal complaints against former chairman Patricia Dunn and four others tied to HP's boardroom news-leak scandal.

HP said in a statement on Wednesday that it "is continuing to cooperate with state and federal investigators." It said it would have no further comment.

Attorney General Bill Lockyer's complaints on Wednesday did not name any current HP executives, including Chairman and CEO Mark Hurd, who is leading an important restructuring of the Silicon Valley computer and printer maker.

Still, HP's criminal defense attorneys at Morgan Lewis & Bockius must defend the company against investigations by the:

•U.S. Attorney and FBI. Last month, the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco and the FBI acknowledged they were conducting an investigation into the HP spying scandal. At the time, the FBI said it was reviewing possible fraud and identity theft violations.

HP, in a Sept. 11 filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, said it had been informally contacted by the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, requesting information "similar" to that sought by Lockyer's office.

Luke Macaulay, spokesman for San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, on Wednesday said the inquiry is continuing.

•SEC. The agency's enforcement division is investigating the circumstances around Tom Perkins' resignation as HP director in May to protest the news-leak probe.

The agency is looking at two SEC filings HP made: One on Sept. 6, in which the company first disclosed the news-leak investigation and its role in spurring Perkins to quit. The second filing, on May 22, reported Perkins' resignation without explaining the circumstances.

The SEC also has asked HP for information about the company's news-leak investigation itself. The agency on Wednesday had no comment, spokesman John Nester said.

•Congress. The House Energy and Commerce Committee has been examining HP's use of "pretexting," a shady technique where investigators posed as HP directors, employees and journalists to get private phone records.

Dunn, Hurd and 12 other witnesses appeared before a committee hearing last week. Among the five individuals named in Lockyer's complaint, only Dunn agreed to testify before the panel. The other four refused, citing their right against self-incrimination.

Committee spokesman Terry Lane said Chairman Joe Barton, R-Texas, had no comment on Lockyer's criminal complaints.

California Attorney General Charges HP Insiders, Detectives In Spy Probe (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 5, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-California's attorney general filed criminal charges Wednesday against former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and four others involved in the corporate spying scandal at the computer and printer company.

Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed the charges in Santa Clara County Superior Court naming Dunn, ousted HP chief ethics officer Kevin Hunsaker, private investigator Ronald DeLia, and outside investigators Joseph DePante of Melbourne, Florida and Bryan Wagner of Littleton, Colorado.

They each face four felony counts: use of false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility; unauthorized access to computer data; identity theft; and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes. Each charge carries a fine of up to $10,000 (â‚¬7,900)and three years in prison.

HP chief executive Mark Hurd is not among those charged, nor was HP's former General Counsel Ann Baskins, who had some oversight of the company's investigation of media leaks.

The scandal erupted last month when HP disclosed that detectives it hired to root out a series of boardroom leaks secretly obtained detailed phone logs of directors, employees and journalists. The detectives used a potentially criminal form of subterfuge known as pretexting to masquerade as their targets and trick telephone companies into turning over the records.

"I am innocent of these charges," DeLia said in a prepared statement he read to The Associated Press. "I've been a professional private investigator for more than 30 years. I respect the law and I did not break the law in the HP investigation."

He refused to elaborate on his statement or take questions.

Dunn - who initiated the investigation - said she did not know until after the fact that the detectives went to such extremes to unearth clues about the leaker's identity. She resigned from HP's board last month amid the uproar over the spying campaign, which has also prompted the resignation of two other board members.

Dunn, 53, who has survived breast cancer and melanoma, will begin chemotherapy treatments for advanced ovarian cancer on Friday at the University of California, San Francisco, according to a person close to Dunn who asked to remain anonymous because a formal announcement wasn't planned.

Lockyer scheduled a 7 p.m. EDT (2300 GMT) news conference in Sacramento to discuss the case. Lawyers for Dunn and the others charged did not return calls seeking comment.

HP said in a statement it is cooperating with Lockyer as well as federal authorities who are also exploring possible criminal charges. The Palo Alto-based company declined further comment.

HP's stock has largely been immune to the scandal swirling around its board, and Wednesday was no exception. It rose 60 cents, or 1.6 percent, to close at $38.02 on the New York Stock Exchange. Earlier in the day it reached a 52-week high of $38.14.

The criminal case against Dunn and the others may be difficult to prove if they can show they were simply relying on legal opinions assuring them HP's tactics were legal, said Jamie Wareham, a Washington, D.C. defense lawyer specializing in corporate law.

"It was a stupid and unethical thing that occurred, but it may not have been a crime," he said.

Wareham questioned whether Lockyer rushed the charges to generate publicity in the weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 election. Lockyer, a Democrat, is running for state treasurer.

"He formed a judgment that a crime was committed way too early, but he had nothing to lose," Wareham said. "Normally you would want to take more time to understand the defense's position in the case so you don't get egg in your face or waste taxpayer money."

Hunsaker, who directed the investigation, left the company on Sept. 26; DeLia runs a Boston-area detective firm called Security Outsourcing Solutions, a longtime HP contractor commissioned to conduct the leak probe.

DeLia in turn hired DePante's company to gather information, and DePante hired Wagner to obtain the private phone records of HP directors and journalists.

HP eventually identified director George Keyworth II as the source of a leak to a CNET Networks Inc. reporter. Keyworth resigned after the scandal went public in early September.

Another director, venture capitalist Thomas J. Perkins, resigned from the board in May after learning about the tactics used by HP's investigators. He then pressured the company to publicly disclose the reason for his departure, leading to the regulatory filing that revealed the investigators' use of pretexting.

The FBI and a congressional panel are also looking into the HP pretexting scandal. Dunn testified last week before the panel, saying she didn't know about any potentially illegal tactics used in the investigation and wasn't responsible for the probe.

Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., a senior member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Lockyer's move "indicates that prosecutors are beginning to move forward to address the violations that occurred here."

Still, Markey added, congressional action is needed to tighten the penalties on pretexting. A bill, approved earlier by the committee, has been stalled in the House.

"We need to pursue a new direction in this country that ensures consumers will no longer be vulnerable to intrusions into their families' privacy, either by their employer, by the government or by criminals seeking to turn information into money," he said.

AP Business Writers Michael Liedtke in San Francisco, Brian Bergstein in Boston and Marcy Gordon in Washington contributed to this report.

Ex-Hewlett-Packard Chair Dunn Charged In Leak Case (Update9) (BLOOM)

By Joel Rosenblatt And Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, October 5, 2006

Oct. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co. ex-Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and four others were charged with conspiracy and fraud by California's attorney general in the first prosecution stemming from a probe of illegally obtained phone records.

An internal inquiry into boardroom leaks at Hewlett-Packard, the world's second-largest personal computer maker, has been the subject of an investigation by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer. Dunn, 53, authorized the internal probe, which used fake identities to obtain the private phone records of board members and journalists, a tactic called pretexting.

The charges, filed today in state court in San Jose, are another black eye for Dunn, who has said she relied on investigators and isn't responsible for their conduct. Hewlett- Packard Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd, who said he wasn't aware investigators were using pretexting, wasn't charged. The Palo Alto-based company is also being investigated by the Justice Department and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

``One of our state's most venerable corporate institutions lost its way as its board sought to find out who leaked confidential company information to the press," said Lockyer. ``In this misguided effort, people inside and outside HP violated privacy rights and broke state law."

Dunn's lawyer said earlier today that his client has advanced ovarian cancer and will undergo chemotherapy this week.

Hunsaker, DeLia

Also named in the complaint were Kevin Hunsaker, the company's former director of ethics and the executive who ran the internal probe, outside investigator Ronald DeLia of Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. and Bryan Wagner and Matthew Depante, two private detectives hired on the company's behalf. Lockyer said the investigation is continuing.

``Patricia Dunn and Kevin Hunsaker were the key actors in the decision processes that led to pretexting," said James Post, a professor of management at Boston University. ``The chair of the board must be the No. 1 advocate for ethical standards."

The five defendants were charged with conspiracy, wire fraud, illegal use of computer data and identity theft, court papers said. If convicted, they each face up to 12 years in prison. The maximum fine for conspiracy to commit identity theft is $25,000. The other counts carry maximum fines of $10,000.

As part of the conspiracy charge, prosecutors claimed Dunn gave DeLia home, cellular and office telephone numbers for Hewlett-Packard board members. DeLia allegedly told Dunn and then-General Counsel Ann Baskins on June 15, 2005, that the telephone records were obtained by ``ruse from the telecommunication carrier," prosecutors said.

Voluntary Surrender

Lockyer said he will seek to arrange the voluntary surrender of Dunn and Hunsaker. He said he was aware of reports that the former chairwoman is undergoing treatment for cancer and said he hopes she beats the disease.

Dunn's illness has no impact on her guilt, Lockyer said at a press conference today in Sacramento.

The attorney general, the state's top prosecutor, said he has no evidence of wrongdoing by Hurd. Arrest warrants are being sought for the other defendants, said Robert Anderson, chief deputy attorney general.

Lockyer's charges come less than a week after Dunn and Hurd, 49, faced a congressional committee that put the computer maker at the center of a national debate over privacy abuses.

The charges show ``prosecutors are beginning to move forward to address the violations that occurred," said U.S. Representative Ed Markey of Massachusetts, ranking Democrat on the House Telecommunications committee, in a statement today.

Congressional Inaction

Markey criticized what he called the lack of Congressional action to increase the penalties for pretexting in order to obtain phone records, and to outlaw purchases or sales of the Social Security numbers used to obtain access to such records or other personal information.

House Republican leaders have refused to take up proposed legislation approved by the Energy and Commerce Committee in each of these areas, Markey claimed. Kevin Madden in House Majority Leader John Boehner's office confirmed a vote hasn't been scheduled.

Representative John Dingell, a Michigan Democrat, called Hewlett-Packard's actions a ``case study in deceit, dishonesty" and ``probably criminal" behavior.

James Brosnahan, a lawyer for Dunn, of Orinda, California, said his client will fight the charges.

`Wrong Reasons'

``These charges are being brought against the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons," the lawyer said in a statement. ``They are the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

John Kiernan, a lawyer for DeLia, 56, of East Sandwich, Massachusetts, didn't return a call seeking comment. Michael Pancer, a lawyer for Hunsaker, 41, of Menlo Park, California, declined to comment.

Richard Preira, attorney for Depante, 27, of West Melbourne, Florida, didn't return calls or e-mails seeking comment. Wagner, 29, didn't return voicemail messages left at his home in Littleton, Colorado.

The company said in a statement that it's continuing to cooperate with state and federal investigators, and declined further comment.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard fell 17 cents to $37.85 at 7:27 p.m. in trading after the close of the New York Stock Exchange.

The shares have remained unaffected by the scandal after analysts and investors said customers will likely continue to buy the company's PCs.

`Tempest in a Teapot'

``This doesn't have much to do with the actual running of the company. It's more of a tempest in a teapot," said Barry James, who oversees $1.8 billion as chief investment strategist at James Investment Research in Dayton, Ohio, including 495,000 Hewlett-Packard shares. ``The market has moved on."

At least six investigators in Massachusetts, Florida, Colorado and Georgia hired by Hewlett-Packard faked the identities of directors, employees and reporters who were the subject of the leak inquiry in an effort to obtain their telephone records.

The company also sought the phone records of former CEO Carly Fiorina and Hewlett-Packard's outside attorney, Larry Sonsini, name partner of Palo Alto-based Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

Hewlett-Packard's internal investigation, started last year to learn who leaked boardroom discussions to reporters, became a scandal in the weeks following the company's Sept. 6 disclosure that some of the tactics used may have been illegal. Company Director George Keyworth resigned last month after admitting he was the source of some of the leaks.

`Rogue Investigation'

In recent weeks Dunn, Baskins, Hunsaker and Anthony Gentilucci, the company's global security chief, have all left the company because of their involvement in a probe that CEO Hurd called a ``rogue investigation."

When interviews with board members in early 2005 failed to pinpoint the source of the leaks, Dunn turned to contractor DeLia and his company, Boston-based Security Outsourcing, which used pretexting to download phone records from AT&T Inc. A Florida- based firm and another in Littleton, Colorado, were also involved in obtaining phone records, according to a review by the Energy and Commerce committee.

Hundreds of telephone calls were gathered using pretexting for two current Hewlett-Packard employees, seven former or current board members or their families and nine journalists or their family members, Michael Holston, a lawyer hired by Hurd to review the company's conduct, said on Sept. 22.

33 Months

According to the court papers filed today, pretexting in the case compromised over 24 different individuals' telephone, fax and cellular accounts. During 33 months of call monitoring, there were approximately 1,750 calls made from all of the numbers.

Social Security numbers for targets of the probe were used to obtain the phone records, said Holston of Philadelphia-based Morgan, Lewis & Bockius. Gentilucci, who resigned last week, provided at least one employee's number to DeLia, Holston said. Baskins and Gentilucci are cooperating with Lockyer's probe, Anderson, his deputy, said.

Hunsaker, a six-year Hewlett-Packard veteran, invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination at a hearing in Washington on Sept. 28, as did Gentilucci, Baskins, DeLia and other investigators called to testify.

In a Jan. 30 e-mail exchange between Hunsaker and Gentilucci, Hunsaker learned how pretexting worked from Gentilucci, who described the tactic as ``on the edge."

Hunsaker replied ``I shouldn't have asked."

Spyware

Hewlett-Packard also followed directors at their homes and on vacation and planted spyware on one reporter's computer. Investigators considered sending staff posing as administrative help and cleaning crews to spy on newsrooms, according to documents supplied by Hewlett-Packard and released by the House committee on Oct. 2.

Dunn has portrayed herself as a victim of investigators who kept her out of the loop and corporate legal experts who misled her about the legality of the tactics used. Company e-mails show she received regular updates from Hunsaker, the documents show.

The case is People v. Dunn, Santa Clara County Superior Court in San Jose, 06-1027481.

Five Indicted In HP Scandal, But Former GC Escapes Charges (LAW)

By Cheryl Miller, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 5, 2006

Former Hewlett-Packard General Counsel Ann Baskins escaped criminal charges Wednesday, even as state prosecutors charged five others in connection with the computer company's boardroom spying scandal.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed charges in Santa Clara County Superior Court against former Chairwoman Patricia Dunn; ousted HP senior counsel and ethics director Kevin Hunsaker; private investigator Ronald DeLia; records dealer Joseph DePante; and Bryan Wagner, who did work for DePante.

All five face felony charges of fraudulently obtaining confidential records, identity theft, accessing computer data without authorization, and conspiracy in connection with HP leaders' hunt in 2005 and early 2006 to find out who was leaking information from closed-door board meetings to the media. Investigators hired by the company allegedly used pretexting -- using a ruse or false identity -- to obtain the phone records of 24 individuals, including reporters and board members.

"One of our state's most venerable corporate institutions lost its way as its board sought to find out who leaked confidential company information to the press," Lockyer said in a prepared statement. "In this misguided effort, people inside and outside HP violated privacy rights and broke state law."

Like Baskins, Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd and former security chief Anthony Gentilucci were not charged Wednesday, although both were involved with the internal probe, records show.

Baskins' attorney Cristina Arguedas declined to comment on the charges, as did an attorney for Gentilucci. In a press release, Dunn's lawyer, James Brosnahan, said the attorney general had charged "the wrong person at the wrong time and for the wrong reasons." He also cryptically called the charges "the culmination of a well-financed and highly orchestrated disinformation campaign."

Baskins did not testify at last week's congressional hearing on the HP scandal, invoking her constitutional right under the Fifth Amendment not to incriminate herself. She resigned her post as general counsel the same day.

Dunn, who did testify before the House Energy and Commerce Committee, suggested Baskins had approved the questionable tactics used in the investigation, while outside counsel Larry Sonsini testified that he had asked Baskins about pretexting and had been told by her that it was legal.

According to internal company documents released by the congressional panel, Baskins was sent copies of a number of e-mail exchanges between Hunsaker -- who oversaw the investigation code-named "Kona" -- DeLia and other investigators, which chronicled efforts to trick a reporter into unwittingly divulging her company sources.

In a sworn complaint, Deputy Attorney General Robert Morgester said that "DeLia recalled that Baskins was curious about pretexting and concerned about its legality and had asked DeLia whether it was lawful. DeLia replied that he was aware of no laws that made pretexting illegal, and was aware of no criminal prosecutions for such activities."

Speaking for an article published last month in The Recorder, Arguedas called Baskins -- who had not yet resigned from HP -- "a person of great integrity" who was "at the top of her profession."

"I'm not aware of her doing anything wrong at all," Arguedas said.

Trying to discern why the attorney general didn't charge Baskins "is like asking why isn't it raining," said Rory Little, a former prosecutor and currently a professor at Hastings College of the Law.

"The short answer is, there's no guarantee she won't be indicted," Little said. "And we don't know what evidence she has. She may be talking to the AG. Or she may have provided exculpatory evidence."

The scandal became public when board member Thomas Perkins resigned in protest of the investigation methods and later complained that HP did not report his reasons for doing so to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Director George Keyworth was identified as the source of the leak. He resigned from the board in September.

The attorney general filed charges under a section of the Penal Code that makes it illegal to seek "utility" records under false pretenses.

All four counts carry a maximum prison sentence of three years under current law. A recently signed state law that goes into effect Jan. 1 punishes those who use pretexting to obtain or sell phone records with fines of up to $2,500 or a year in county jail.

In a press conference Wednesday, Lockyer said the current case will rely on "numerous state laws" protecting consumers' privacy as well as the state Constitution.

"Our state Constitution includes one of the country's most expansive rights to privacy," he said.

Reporter Justin Scheck also contributed to this story.

Jobs Knew Apple Manipulated Some Option Grants (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, October 5, 2006

Steve Jobs knew that Apple Computer Inc. manipulated some of its stock-option grants, the company said, citing the conclusions of an internal probe that found 15 instances of improperly backdated options and raised "serious concerns" about the conduct of two former Apple executives.

Federal prosecutors in San Francisco have begun to investigate Apple's options practices, and Apple-appointed lawyers met with prosecutors and securities regulators Tuesday, a person familiar with the matter said.

Apple's own probe found that Mr. Jobs, the company's chief executive, wasn't aware of the accounting implications of the manipulated options, and that there was "no misconduct" by him or any other member of current management. But the conclusions suggest that Mr. Jobs, who is one of the country's most-revered technology icons and widely considered Apple's creative nucleus and the embodiment of its brand, could face further scrutiny.

Authorities are examining whether companies fabricated the date on which options were granted to executives and other employees -- a practice known as backdating -- to give the options extra value. Backdating can run afoul of securities laws. To date, more than 100 companies are under federal investigation.

In a statement released late yesterday, Apple left open a number of questions, including whether Mr. Jobs was aware that backdating grants to give them more value was improper and was contrary to statements in the company's own securities filings. Apple also didn't address how the numerous instances of backdating occurred or spell out the role of the board, which administers option grants, in any improprieties. (See Apple's statement1)

Apple said that Mr. Jobs knew of manipulated grants in a "few instances" but that he didn't receive any grants he knew carried dates that had been favorably selected. Earlier, Apple had said one grant to Mr. Jobs was problematic.

An Apple spokesman declined to elaborate beyond yesterday's statement, though he added that the irregular options grants accounted for 6% of the company's total grants between 1997 and 2002, the period being investigated. Apple, of Cupertino, Calif., said the backdating extended from 1997 to 2002, and included 15 dates. The company has said it expects to restate its financial results to account for extra compensation expense related to the backdated options.

Apple didn't name the former executives whose actions it cited, but it said that director Fred Anderson, an ex-executive who served as finance chief during the time of the backdated grants, resigned from Apple's board. Mr. Anderson informed Apple's board of his resignation on Saturday night by email, a person familiar with the matter said.

In a letter to the board reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Anderson said he was resigning to "avoid even the appearance of any conflict of interest" in light of the imminent release of the probe's findings. Mr. Anderson added in his letter that he has always conducted himself "with the utmost integrity and in accordance with the highest ethical standards." The resignation was announced yesterday.

Kevin V. Ryan, the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, has made the stock-options manipulation investigations a top priority of his office, which created a stock-options task force in July. On July 20, Mr. Ryan's office charged two former executives from Brocade Communications Systems Inc. with criminal fraud violations for their alleged roles in a backdating scheme at the San Jose technology concern.

Aitan Goelman, a lawyer for Zuckerman Spaeder LLP in Washington, D.C., said the chance Mr. Jobs will face criminal prosecution is "infinitesimal," assuming Apple's probe was thorough. Prosecutors typically need to show criminal intent to make fraud cases, defense lawyers say, and Apple's disclosures don't suggest that Mr. Jobs had any.

Still, Mr. Goelman said Mr. Jobs could face civil action from the Securities and Exchange Commission. Apple said yesterday that it was providing details of the former executives' actions to the SEC.

In his statement, Mr. Jobs struck a contrite note. "I apologize to Apple's shareholders and employees for these problems, which happened on my watch. They are completely out of character for Apple," Mr. Jobs said.

Mr. Jobs didn't respond to a direct request for comment by email.

DOJ_NMG_0075017

Apple isn't the only company connected to Mr. Jobs to have favorably priced options. Top executives of Pixar Animation Studios, the computer-animation company Mr. Jobs co-founded, received option grants priced at the stock's annual lows in four years between 1997 and 2003 -- a statistically remarkable occurrence that suggests the dates may have been manipulated.

Mr. Jobs never received any options from Pixar, which was acquired by Walt Disney Co. earlier this year. But Pixar filings say the company's board, of which Mr. Jobs was chairman, performed the functions of a compensation committee, including granting options.

Options typically give their recipients the right to buy stock in the future at its price at the time of the grant, called the exercise price. If the stock goes up from the exercise price, the recipient can profit.

It isn't clear which 15 grants Apple's outside lawyers deemed to be troublesome. But in several cases between 1997 and 2001, Apple executives received grants dated just ahead of sharp increases in the company's share price. One grant, dated Jan. 17, 2001, went to Mr. Anderson and three other top officers, but not Mr. Jobs. Apple's shares leapt the next day, rising a total of 29% by the end of the month. The four executives later exercised many of those options for total profits of more than $100 million.

Mr. Anderson's resignation from the Apple board represents a rift between the company and an executive credited with helping revive Apple's fortunes in the late 1990s. A person familiar with the matter said Apple hasn't informed Mr. Anderson whether he is one of the two former officers of the company accused of inappropriate actions.

"Fred was a very successful CFO at Apple, where he played an integral part in saving that company, its employees and shareholders from financial ruin," said Roger McNamee, a co-founder of Silicon Valley private-equity firm Elevation Partners, where Mr. Anderson is currently a partner.

Mr. Jobs himself received a mammoth grant dated Jan. 12, 2000, which corresponded with the bottom of a sharp plunge in Apple's share price. The grant of 40 million shares, adjusted for splits, was announced a week later; by that time Apple's stock had risen 22%. The grant was, by one measure, the most valuable ever given to a corporate executive. Mr. Jobs later exchanged those options for millions of shares of restricted stock.

Nancy Heinen, Apple's former general counsel, left the company without explanation in early May. Ms. Heinen didn't return a message left at her home phone number, and an Apple spokesman wouldn't say if she was one of the former officers referred to in the company's statement.

Cristina Arguedas, Ms. Heinen's attorney, said Ms. Heinen hasn't been told that she is a target of any investigation. "Nancy has had a long career and is a well respected lawyer in Silicon Valley," Ms. Arguedas said.

In after-hours trading yesterday, Apple shares were down 58 cents to $74.80.

Jobs Didn't Know Of Stock Options' Accounting Issues (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, October 5, 2006

Apple CEO Steve Jobs was aware of the company's practice of backdating stock-option grants but unaware of the accounting implications, the company said Wednesday.

A three-month investigation by a committee of Apple's board resulted in former chief financial officer Fred Anderson resigning his seat on the board Wednesday.

“I apologize to Apple shareholders and employees for these problems, which happened on my watch,” Jobs said. “They are completely out of character for Apple.”

In August, Apple said its quarterly report would not be filed on time because it was reviewing its practices for granting stock options and that it might have to restate past earnings results. It confirmed Wednesday that it will restate some results to record non-cash charges for compensation expense relating to past stock-option grants.

The review discovered that dates on stock-option grants made on 15 dates from 1997 to 2002 preceded the approval of the grants, Apple said Wednesday.

The board found that Jobs was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected but didn't receive or benefit from the grants and was unaware of the accounting issues. Apple said its investigation found no misconduct by any member of Apple's current management team.

DOJ_NMG_0075018

Jobs said Apple will work to resolve the remaining accounting issues "as quickly as possible" and to put measures in place "to ensure that this never happens again."

Apple's investigators looked at 650,000 e-mails and documents and conducted interviews with more than 40 current and past Apple employees, directors and advisers.

Dozens of other companies are entangled in some sort of stock-option trouble, mostly over backdating.

"What the report confirms is that the black eye on Apple we anticipated is indeed a black eye," says Gene Munster, an analyst at equity firm Piper Jaffray. "The scope of the number of grants is bigger than I expected, but the good news is this is all in the past."

His biggest concern was the impact on Jobs. "He offered an honest assessment and comes out fine, and that's what really matters."

Apple said the investigation raised "serious concerns" regarding the actions of two unnamed former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock-option grants. Apple will provide all details regarding their actions to the Securities and Exchange Commission, it said.

Apple stock fell 58 cents in after-hours trading to $74.80.

Apple Says Jobs Knew Of Options (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 4 — Apple Computer said on Wednesday that an internal review had found that Steven P. Jobs, the chief executive, knew that the company was backdating some stock options granted to employees to inflate their value.

The company said Mr. Jobs did not knowingly receive any backdated options and had not benefited from the practice, and that he did not understand its accounting implications. A company spokesman, Steve Dowling, said it was possible that there had been "irregularities" with some options granted to Mr. Jobs, but he declined to elaborate.

Apple, riding high on the popularity of its iPod music player, repeated that it would most likely need to restate past financial statements, but said it had not yet determined the amount or for which periods.

"I apologize to Apple's shareholders and employees for these problems, which happened on my watch," Mr. Jobs said in a statement. "They are completely out of character for Apple." Mr. Jobs said the company was working to resolve the remaining issues quickly.

Apple revealed in June that it had discovered irregularities related to stock options awarded between 1997 and 2001.

By doing so, it joined more than 100 companies, including Microsoft, that have announced investigations into their options practices.

At the time, Apple said it was examining a grant made to Mr. Jobs that may have been improper. Mr. Dowling would not discuss the specifics of that grant on Wednesday.

Apple also announced that Fred D. Anderson, an Apple director who was chief financial officer from 1996 to 2004, the period when the questionable grants were made, had resigned from the board, and said he had told the company that "he believes it is in Apple's best interests" that he leave.

Mr. Anderson is now managing director of Elevation Partners, a high-profile private equity company he helped found after leaving Apple.

Roger McNamee, Elevation's chief executive, said in an e-mailed statement that he had confidence in Mr. Anderson, whom he considered to have "uncompromising character," and that he would remain part of the company.

Apple's statement said the financial investigation "raised serious concerns" about the activities of two other former Apple officers, but did not name them. The company said it would share details with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Apple said the investigation found no misconduct by anyone on the company's current management team. Mr. Dowling said the company was not required to discuss Mr. Jobs's role in the options grants, but was doing so in the interest of full disclosure. He said Mr. Jobs was not available for an interview.

Apple shares fell 66 cents, or 0.9 percent, in after-hours trading, after rising $1.30 in regular trading to close at $75.38.

DOJ_NMG_0075019

Charles R. Wolf, an analyst with Needham & Company, said that investors were likely to respond favorably in the long term, and that he did not expect Apple's restatement of earnings to be significant or to hurt its future performance.

"The major risk in the backdating of options was that somehow Steve Jobs was actively involved," Mr. Wolf said. "The announcement today eliminated that possibility."

Mr. Wolf said it was within reason that Mr. Jobs would not have paid attention to the backdating, particularly given that it was common and legal. "I don't think he'd know an asset from a liability," Mr. Wolf said of Mr. Jobs. "That's not his game."

One unusually large grant to Mr. Jobs had been under scrutiny. Apple disclosed on Jan. 19, 2000, that he had received options to buy 10 million shares, effective Jan. 12. Those options carried a strike price of $87.19, the stock's lowest closing price in the two months up to that date; by Jan. 19, the stock had risen to $106.56.

The options later became worthless as Apple's stock price declined. Mr. Jobs canceled most of his options in 2003 and was given restricted stock instead.

A week after Apple disclosed its investigation, two shareholder lawsuits filed in California charged current and former Apple executives and directors with manipulating stock grants. Those suits are still pending.

Apple said on Wednesday that stock option grants made on 15 dates between 1997 and 2002 appeared to have grant dates that preceded the approval of those grants. The company said the last one came in January 2002. Mr. Dowling said that the 15 dates represented 6 percent of all stock grants during the period.

At the time of the options grants, it was not uncommon for companies to disclose stock option awards days or weeks after a grant was made. But the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which addresses corporate accountability, now requires companies to report option grants within two days.

Apple reported the findings after a special committee of outside directors, lawyers and accountants completed a three-month investigation, examining more than 650,000 documents.

Apple CEO Apologizes In Options Scandal (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 5, 2006

Apple Computer's chief executive, Steve Jobs, apologized yesterday for a stock options scandal that he said "happened on my watch," after a three-month internal investigation uncovered "serious concerns" with the actions of two former executives.

Jobs was aware "in a few instances" that unnamed company executives had gone back in time to cherry-pick dates when stock prices were low to increase the likelihood that employees would turn greater profits. But Jobs did not "receive or otherwise benefit from these grants," the Cupertino, Calif., company said in a statement after the markets closed.

Apple disclosed in June that Jobs had received one of the grants, but it was eventually canceled and he did not profit from it. Jobs was "unaware of the accounting implications" of the stock maneuvers, the company said, a conclusion that could provide him some regulatory cover.

The company declined to identify the two former executives whose conduct over the accounting and reporting of stock option grants had raised investigators' questions. But in the same statement, Fred Anderson, the company's finance chief from 1996 until 2004, announced he would resign from its board of directors for the "best interests" of the company. Apple's longtime general counsel, Nancy Heinen, resigned earlier this year. Anderson could not be reached for comment, and Heinen's lawyer did not return phone calls.

Apple will provide the results of its investigation, which covered interviews with more than 40 current and former employees and a review of 650,000 e-mail messages and documents, to the Securities and Exchange Commission, spokesman Steve Dowling said in a telephone interview.

Stock options give employees the chance to purchase stock at a set price and within a specific period of time. Employees profit based on the difference between the stock price on the date of the award and the date they sell the shares. Options were a popular tool in the 1990s for companies to recruit and retain employees.

In recent months, securities regulators have said they are investigating more than 100 public companies for altering the dates of option awards to ensure greater potential profits for employees. In some cases, executives appear to have selected dates when the stock price was lower, after the fact, increasing the likelihood that they and favored employees would profit. Backdating is not in itself illegal, but companies must disclose such maneuvers to investors and board members.

Apple's problems with stock options broke into public view four months ago. The review of the transactions, by John Potter at the law firm Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges LLP, flagged an undisclosed number of backdated stock option awards that were made on 15 dates between 1997 and 2002. No members of the company's current management team were implicated in the probe, according to the news release.

Apple previously announced it would need to restate earnings from 2003 to 2005. But the company said yesterday that it was continuing to explore which periods required restatements. Apple has not assessed the possible charges or their tax and accounting implications, the statement said.

"We will now work to resolve the remaining issues as quickly as possible and to put the proper remedial measures in place to ensure that this never happens again," Jobs said.

Jonathan D. Hoopes, a managing director at ThinkEquity Partners LLC in New York, called Apple's problems "unfortunate." But Hoopes still carries a positive outlook on Apple, which he said was well positioned to increase its stock price and its profitability with strong back-to-school and holiday seasons. Apple's stock fell 58 cents to $74.80 in after-hours trading as of 8 p.m.

"If Steve [Jobs] would have taken the fall, it would have been a much different story," said Hoopes, who neither owns Apple stock nor does banking business with the company.

Apple Presents Stock Option Findings To Feds (LAW)

By Justin Scheck And Petra Pasternak, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 5, 2006

A day before Apple Computer publicly announced results of an internal investigation over stock option backdating, the company's lawyers held a meeting with federal prosecutors in San Francisco to spell out what they'd found.

Lawyers for Apple wouldn't comment on Tuesday's meeting with the feds. "I really can't say anything about it," said John Potter, the partner at Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges who conducted Apple's internal investigation for a board committee. And George Riley, a partner at O'Melveny & Myers who represents the company, was similarly taciturn. "To be clear: we have no comment on the story," he wrote in a Wednesday e-mail.

Apple publicly revealed Wednesday that 15 option awards between 1997 and 2002 "appear to have grant dates that precede the approval of those grants," according to a public document filed with the SEC.

The company's CEO, Steve Jobs, apparently "was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected" but was unaware of the accounting ramifications and didn't personally benefit, the filing said. Board member and former CFO Fred Anderson resigned, it added.

The investigation also raised "serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants," the company said in the filing, though it did not specifically name any executives. "The company will provide all details regarding their actions to the SEC."

Apple is one of dozens of companies under government investigation for stock option backdating. Because of the central role general counsel often play in the issuance of stock options, they have been at particular risk in backdating probes. In August, federal prosecutors in Brooklyn charged former Comverse GC William Sorin for his role in backdating at that company. That same month, McAfee Inc. said it received a subpoena relating to the firing of its general counsel, Kent Roberts.

Longtime Apple GC Nancy Heinen left the company earlier this year for undisclosed reasons. She subsequently retained Cristina Arguedas, the top Bay Area criminal attorney who is also representing former Hewlett-Packard general counsel Ann Baskins.

Arguedas would only say Wednesday that "Nancy Heinen has had a long career, and is a well-respected lawyer in Silicon Valley, and is well-known for her integrity."

Reached Wednesday afternoon, Heinen likewise declined to comment. "I'm in the grocery store, I'm not gonna talk," she said with a small laugh.

A spokesman for the Northern District of California U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment on the Apple investigation.

The plaintiffs bar immediately descended on Apple after the company first announced it had stock option problems at the end of June. A derivative suit filed in U.S. district court in San Jose does not name Heinen as a defendant, however.

But Jeffrey Krinsk, name partner at San Diego's Finkelstein & Krinsk, said his firm plans to name Heinen in another derivative class action as an officer who had either been a recipient of backdated stock options, or who had known about Apple's practices. The firm plans to file in state court by the end of the week.

"We believe there's liability directed at her for her acts and practices in connection with backdating," Krinsk said.

Lay's Lawyers Want Judge's Ruling To Wipe Record Clean (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, October 5, 2006

Lawyers for deceased former Enron Chairman Ken Lay want a judge to rule right away on whether to clear his name.

They say in court papers filed this week that U.S. District Judge Sim Lake should rule on the nearly two-month-old request because an effort by prosecutors to change federal law to preserve Lay's conviction bore no fruit before Congress adjourned.

